

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. ARMY ORGANIZATION—TERRITORIAL TITLES OF REGIMENTS—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to cause a re-consideration of the proposal to efface the present numerical and other distinctions in regiments of the line and militia by the substitution of novel (so-called) "territorial" titles, inasmuch as this proposed substitution is known to be viewed as subversive of esprit de corps, and is in consequence most distasteful to the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates generally, whilst it has not the advantage of increasing the Army by a single additional trained or untrained soldier; the proposed re-organization being moreover practically but a fuller development of the present twin (or linked) battalion system which the Report of Lord Airey's Committee has already proved to have been attended with the most disastrous results,—(The Earl of Gallway) 518

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

SECOND SESSION OF THE TWENTY-SECOND PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 29 APRIL, 1880, IN THE FORTY-THIRD YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

MINUTES.] — PUBLIC BILL—First Reading—
Bridges (South Wales)* (83).

THE LATE EARL OF BEACONS-

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise to move the Address of which I have given Notice, and which is as follows:—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty will give directions that a Monument be erected in the collegiate church of St. Peter, Westminster, to the memory of the late Right Honourable the Earl of Beaconsfield, K.G., with an inscription expressive of the high sense entertained by the House of his rare and splendid gifts, and of his devoted labours in Parliament and in great offices of State; and to assure Her Majesty that this House will concur in giving effect to Her Majesty's directions."

My Lords, very few arguments are required to induce your Lordships to agree to that Motion; and for this reason, and for some others, I shall confine my observations within narrow limits. This is not the time, and I am not the person, to give a biographical sketch of one so well known as Lord Beaconsfield, and it would still less become me to analyze, in any degree, his policy or his political actions. For me to give my approval of these would give a stamp of insincerity to my remarks, which would be displeasing to your Lordships, and which would not be creditable to myself. My Lords, our long experience of Constitutional Government has convinced nearly all Englishmen that Party Government is necessary for the good working of Representative Institutions, and that Party organization is needful in order to establish a strong and efficient Government under the Constitution. But, owing to the same experience, together with other favouring circumstances, there is no country where the relations of political opponents are more free from personal bitterness, none where the readiness is greater at the proper moment to drop Party feelings and exclusively to consider that which is for the national dignity. I believe it is for the dignity of the nation that from time to time, and on exceptional occasions, Parliament should recognize the public services of statesmen, not as a proof of universal approval of the particular policy which they may have pursued, for that would be impossible, but as an acknowledgment of unusual abilities devoted in eminent positions to the service of the State. My Lords, it is impossible for anyone to deny that Lord Beaconsfield played a great part in English history. No one can deny his rare and splendid gifts, and his great force of character. No one can deny how long and how continuous have been his services, both with regard to the Crown and Parliament. I doubt whether to many public men can the quality of genius be more fitly attributed. It was by his strong individuality, unaided by adventitious circumstances, that he owed his great personal success. My Lords, I myself, assisted by some of those social advantages which Mr. Disraeli was without, came into the House of Commons at an early age, and six months before he took his seat in that Assembly. I thus heard him make that speech famous for its failure, a speech which I am convinced, if it had been made when he was better known to the House of Commons, would have been received with cheers and sympathy, instead of derisive laughter; but which, owing to the prejudices of his audience, he was obliged to close with a sentence, which, like a somewhat similar ejaculation of Mr. Sheridan, showed the unconquerable confidence which strong men have in their own power. My Lords, the last time that Lord Beaconsfield spoke in this House a speech of an argumentative character was a few weeks ago. I think it was about 10 o'clock on the second evening of the debate on Afghanistan that Lord Beaconsfield sent me a message saying that he purposed speaking directly. I sent back a strong remonstrance. Two noble Lords who formerly held Office, and a third with remarkable power of speaking, wished to take part in the debate. Lord Beaconsfield, however, persisted, and I thought I was justified in making a rather strong complaint of his having done so. I have since learned with regret that Lord Beaconsfield had, just before he received that message from me, swallowed one drug and had inhaled another drug, in quantities nicely adapted so as to enable him to speak free from the oppression of his complaint during the time that that speech required for delivery. I cannot help thinking that such incidents as these, although not very great in themselves—one at the beginning, and the other at the end of a Parliamentary career which lasted 44 years—were proofs of that determination which he possessed, and that contempt for obstacles which might have alarmed weaker men. My Lords, I remember another small fact connected with this House which appeared to me indicative of Lord Beaconsfield's self-control and his great patience. Almost any man coming into this Assembly as Prime Minister, and with a great oratorical reputation, would have been impatient for an opportunity of display. I dare say your Lordships remember how silent and how reticent Lord Beaconsfield was for two or three months after he came into your Lordships' House; and it was only when an unfounded charge was made against him that he took the opportunity of making a speech by which he immediately obtained that hold over your Lordships' House which he had so long maintained in "another place." Some men exercise influence over others by possessing in a stronger degree the qualities and the defects of those whom they influence. Others produce the same effect from exactly contrary causes. It is probable that Lord Beaconsfield, with few prejudices of his own, and more or less tolerant of those of others, belonged to the latter class. I never knew a greater master, in writing, in speaking, and in conversation, of censure and of eulogy. His long habit of sparkling literary composition, his facility in dealing with epigram, metaphor, antithesis, and even alliteration, gave him a singular power of coining and applying phrases which at once laid hold of the popular mind, and attached praise or blame to actions of the contending Parties in the State. Lord Beaconsfield had certainly the power of appealing in his policy, in his character, and in his career, to the imagination of his countrymen and of foreigners, a power which was not extinguished even by death. With certain exceptions, Lord Beaconsfield was singularly tolerant with regard to his political opponents, and very appreciative of their merits. I believe no more happy compliment was ever paid to Lord Palmerston and Lord Russell than by Mr. Disraeli in the House of Commons; and I have heard one of Mr. Cobden's dearest friends quote, as the most touching speech he ever heard, the tribute which Mr. Disraeli paid in the House of Commons to his great and victorious Free Trade opponent. I myself can boast of having been treated in this House by successive Leaders of the great Conservative Party in it with great kindness and great fairness; but I am bound to say that by none was that great fairness and forbearance more remarkably displayed than by Lord Beaconsfield during the few years that I had the honour of sitting opposite him, and on some previous occasions with regard to Foreign Affairs. My Lords, the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon), on Thursday, speaking on the authority of an intimate friend, told your Lordships how kind and good-natured a man in private life Lord Beaconsfield was. I believe that to be perfectly true, notwithstanding the singular power of destructiveness which he possessed, and sometimes exercised. I remember being told by one, to whom the constant devotion of Lord Beaconsfield during his life was one of the characteristic traits of his character, that not only was he a kind and good-natured man, but that he was singularly sensitive to kindness shown to him by others. There is one reason, my Lords, why this House should pay respect to the memory of Lord Beaconsfield, which is not altogether of a disinterested character. It has been said of the British aristocracy, sometimes as a matter of praise, sometimes of blame, that they are proud, wealthy, and powerful. There is an element, however, of a democratic character mixed with this aristocratic constitution of the House of Lords, which has certainly added to its wealth and strength, possibly to its pride. It is the unexclusiveness which is peculiar to the Institution. Of the smoothness with which the portals of this Assembly roll back before distinguished men, without reference to caste or to blood, of the welcome which is given to such, of the distinguished place which is assigned to them in our ranks, I know no brighter or more brilliant example than that of Lord Beaconsfield. My Lords, I beg to move the Resolution of which I have given Notice.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : My Lords, the noble Earl, in the graceful language with which he has moved the erection of this last and melancholy tribute to a political opponent, justly said, not only that contested questions were in no degree affected by the action that he or your Lordships might take, or by the language that he used, but also that not many words were needed to commend this Motion to the acceptance of Parliament. My Lords, it is true that in this case not many words are needed; because one of the most striking phenomena attending on Lord Beaconsfield's brilliant and remarkable career has been the deep interest with which, through his illness and after his death, his fate was followed, not only by his own friends and adherents, but by men of every class and degree in this country, and by distinguished men of great influence and power in other countries also. My Lords, whatever else may be said of the deceased statesman, this, at least, can never be gainsaid—his memory will ever be associated with many and great controverted issues; but the historian must always add that, when the fierce struggle was over, and the great career was closed, there was no doubt what the verdict was of his countrymen upon the services he had rendered. This unanimity of opinion with respect to one whose measures were necessarily much contested will suggest various explanations. That his Friends and Colleagues should mourn his loss and regard his memory is only too natural. I have not the same title to speak on this subject as many of those beside me have, because my close political connection with him was comparatively recent. But it lasted through anxious and difficult times, when the character of men is plainly seen by those who work with them. And upon me, as I believe upon all others who have worked with him, his patience, his gentleness, his unswerving and unselfish loyalty to his Colleagues and his fellow-labourers, have made an impression which will never leave me as long as life endures. But these feelings could only affect the limited circle of his immediate adherents. The impression which his career and character have made on the vast mass of his countrymen must be sought elsewhere. To some extent, to a great extent, no doubt, it is due to the peculiar character of his genius—to its varied nature, to the wonderful combination of qualities which he possessed, and which rarely reside in the same brain. To some extent it is also due to the circumstances to which the noble Earl has gracefully and eloquently alluded—the social difficulties of his early life, and the steadfast perseverance by which they were overcome. These facts were impressed on his countrymen, who love to see exemplified that open career to all persons, whatever their initial difficulties may be, which is one of the characteristics of their institutions of which they are most proud. They saw in Lord Beaconsfield's life a proof that whatever difficulties may attend the beginning of a man's fame, if the genius and perseverance are there, the most exalted position and the widest influence are open to any subject of the Queen. But there was another cause. Lord Beaconsfield's leading principles with respect to the greatness of his country, more and more as life went on, made an impression on our country. Zeal for the greatness of England was the passion of his life. Opinions might differ, and did differ, deeply as to the measures and steps by which expression was given to that dominant feeling; but more and more as his life went on and drew near to its close, as the heat and turmoil of controversy were left behind, as the gratification of every possible ambition negatived the suggestion of any inferior motive, and brought out into greater prominence the sacredness and strength of this one intense feeling, the people of this country recognized the force with which this desire dominated his actions, and they repaid it by an affection and reverence which did not depend upon, nor had any concern with, their opinion as to the particular policy pursued. My Lords, this was his great title to their attachment—that above all things he wished to see England united, powerful, and great. The questions of interior policy which divided classes, he had to consider them—he had to form his judgment upon them and take his course accordingly; but it seems to me he treated them always as of secondary interest, compared with this one great question—how the country to which he belonged might be made united and strong. The feeling which he showed was repaid to him abundantly; and it is because this conviction spread itself to all classes—both among those who were his friends and those who were his opponents—that this Vote which has been moved by the noble Earl, and which I have risen to second, is no expression of any Party or sectional feeling, is no representation of any opinion upon any controverted question, but is the homage and recognition of an united people to the splendid genius and the magnificent services they have lost.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty will give directions that a Monument be erected in the collegiate church of St. Peter, Westminster, to the memory of the late Right Honourable the Earl of Beaconsfield, K.G., with an inscription expressive of the high sense entertained by the House of his rare and splendid gifts, and of his devoted labours in Parliament and in great offices of State; and to assure Her Majesty that this House will concur in giving effect to Her Majesty's directions.—(The Earl Granville.)

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, I think it would be very natural if, after the two able speeches to which we have listened, this Motion should be at once agreed to; but I should be making a great sacrifice to my own feelings were I not on this occasion to express my opinion, not upon the great talents and political powers of Lord Beaconsfield, but upon the virtues of his private life, and the remarkable and laudable lines he has always followed both as regards his friends and his foes. My excuse, my Lords, for speaking of him is the intimate acquaintance I had with him. I knew Lord Beaconsfield at an earlier period than my noble Friend—before he had been a Minister. I was a Member of the first Cabinet in which he sat. I was with him in four Cabinets afterwards. I was in the last Cabinet as in the first; and, with all that constant occasion of knowing him well, of seeing him, hearing his sentiments, and observing his manner and character, I must say I have not known a more complete character as far as regarded the good-nature, amiability, and sincere friendship which he always displayed. Men who have seen him sitting in this place, where he gained so much honour, might naturally think that, with his unmoved countenance, with not a shadow upon his cheek, however he might have received the thrusts of the greatest gladiators of the day, he was a man without the common feelings of human nature. But that was not the case. I knew no man who felt disappointment more, or so much enjoyed triumph. It was his indomitable courage which enabled him to master his features, as it supported him through all the difficulties of his career. He had every domestic virtue which I consider a man need have. He was supported—fortunately for him, for he always said so—by a most amiable and devoted wife, to whom he was himself equally devoted. He has often told me that without her fortitude and great devotion to him, encouraging him when he was disappointed, and sharing with him his triumphs, he could not have succeeded in life as he had done. I remember, when at last he was deprived of the support of his wife, he said to me with tears in his eyes—"I hope some of my friends will take notice of me now in my great misfortune, for I have no hope; I have now no home; and when I tell my coachman to drive home, I feel it is a mockery." Lady Beaconsfield was equally devoted to him. I recollect a remarkable story, which illustrates this devotion; it is one which your Lordships have, perhaps, heard; but he told it to me himself. One day, when Lord Beaconsfield was driving to the House of Commons, having a very important speech to make, the servant, in closing the door of the carriage, shut it on Lady Beaconsfield's finger. She had the courage not to cry out or say a word, and not to move until he was out of sight, lest it might disturb him and interfere with the speech he had to make. A very short time before his death an incident occurred which showed the extraordinary courage and perseverance which existed in his character. I was walking with him, and we met an old friend, a gentleman who had formerly been very active in public life, and who had reached the age of 84, and was still looking, for that age, very young. Lord Beaconsfield said to him—"How is it you maintain your youthful appearance and your health in the way you do?" Our friend answered—"My Lord, by enjoying all the repose I can." I could not attempt to give your Lordships an idea of the tone in which Lord Beaconsfield exclaimed—"Repose! good Heavens! repose!" I think his manner and intonation impressed one more than anything else with the invincible power of work—his determination never to give way while he could do work in the service of his country—which he possessed. It was with great satisfaction that I heard the Motion made by my noble Friend. My noble Friend behind me (the Marquess of Salisbury) has said most truly that one of the most powerful passions of Lord Beaconsfield's breast was the desire to maintain the power and the honour of England; and therefore it is our duty, and a most melancholy duty it is, to raise a monument to this great and distinguished Englishman.

QUESTIONS.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY — ALLEGED MISCONDUCT AT BALLINAMON.

MR. SEXTON (for Mr. BIGGAR) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it a fact that the police under sub-inspector Barry of Ballinamon, when out assisting bailiffs to serve ejectments on the "King" property near Ballinamon did, when they found a house tenantless, search it, and, if they found no one in charge drank all the milk and sucked all the eggs they could find on the premises; and, if the allegation is true, will he take means to have the guilty parties punished?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I have made inquiries into the facts of this matter, and I am glad to say that these charges against the constables are quite unfounded.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND) — ALLEGED ILLEGAL SENTENCES — MR. TRAILL, R.M.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the proceedings in the Exchequer Division of the High Court of Justice in Ireland on the 25th April, in the case of Egan v. Traill, the defendant being a resident magistrate of Parsonstown, and the action one of three brought against him for having illegally sentenced to imprisonment and hard labour persons who had been arrested by the police on a charge of assault, Mr. Traill having gone on a Sunday to the police barrack where the men were in custody, and although they offered bail and asked to be remanded to petty sessions, refused to postpone the cases, and imposed on the men sentences of imprisonment varying from eight days to one month. The men were in gaol for the whole of these respective periods, and the affidavit stated that they had to sleep upon plank beds; whether Baron Fitzgerald stated when refusing Mr. Traill's application, that he "had sentenced three several men to imprisonment illegally;" whether when excusing Mr. Traill's conduct his counsel stated that he, being only a major in the Army, "could not be expected to know the law accurately as he was not a lawyer;" whether the Government will consider Major Traill's removal from such a responsible legal position, and upon whose recommendation Major Traill was appointed, and by whom it was sanctioned; and, whether if it be true, as appears from the Return of Stipendiary Magistrates lately presented to this House, that Major Traill has been acting for the last fifteen months for another resident magistrate absent on sick leave, the Government will at once take steps to appoint a competent person in the place of the absent official?

Mr. Sexton

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I have instituted an inquiry into the circumstances referred to in the Question, and what I understand to be the case is this. Sixteen persons were arrested on a charge of assault in September last at the place named, and detained in the lock-up. Three of these persons were the persons alluded to in the Question. Two of them who had committed the offence were convicted by the magistrate named; but this conviction was illegal, because they were tried at the gaol by one magistrate, and not at petty sessions before more than one magistrate. I have received no official report of the proceedings referred to, nor of the language used by Mr. Justice Fitzgerald at the trial; but I have no reason to believe that it has been inaccurately given in the newspaper reports. The commitment was made by the magistrate in ignorance of the law; and Major Traill has been sufficiently penalized for the error he made by becoming the defendant in three actions. He was appointed by the late Government to do duty in the place of the resident magistrate, who had asked for leave of absence, and has since resigned in consequence of ill health. A successor to Major Traill will be sent to Parsonstown in a few days' time.

CRIME (SCOTLAND) — ALLEGED OUTRAGE AT BRAEHEAD, DUNFERMLINE.

MR. SEXTON (for Mr. BIGGAR) asked the Lord Advocate, If his attention has been called to the following paragraph from the daily newspapers:—

"A daring outrage was committed at Braehead, near Dunfermline, about midnight on Sunday. While Thomas Nickol, coachman at Lassadie House, and his wife and family were sitting at the fireside they were startled by a terrific noise, and on going to the door they found at a little distance from the window of the room in which they had been sitting a flask, about five inches in length by three inches in diameter, which had evidently been filled with some explosive substance and a lighted fusee applied to it. It is presumed that the perpetrators of the outrage must have thrown the flask with the intention that it should pass through the window; but, fortunately, it struck against the sash, and fell on the outside as it exploded. It is believed that the act was prompted by a feeling of revenge towards Mr. Nickol for evidence which he gave in court lately against some poachers in the district ;”

and, if any arrests have been made ; and, if not, whether the Government intend to apply for additional powers for the better protection of life and property in Scotland ?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. M'LAREN) : Sir, the Executive in Scotland have sufficient power to deal with any agitation that may arise. But, as long as the land agitation in Scotland is in the hands of two hon. Gentlemen opposite, who lately addressed meetings in Edinburgh and Glasgow, I am confident that it will not be necessary to put those powers into execution. The matter referred to in the Question had no connection with any agrarian movement, and it is undergoing investigation by the authorities.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL WAR (CASUALTIES).

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can state what is the total loss in killed, wounded, and incapacitated by sickness amongst Her Majesty's forces in the late war with the Boers, and what is the approximate estimate of loss among the camp followers and teamsters ?

MR. CHILDERS : Sir, I cannot yet give a full answer to the hon. Member's Question, especially the latter part. But the numbers of killed and wounded are—officers, 29 killed and 20 wounded ; non-commissioned officers and men, 366 killed and 428 wounded. We have no Returns of death from sickness.

CRIMINAL LAW (SCOTLAND)—CASE OF MR. FRASER.

MR. CAMERON asked the Lord Advocate, If his attention has been called to the case of Mr. Fraser, Inspector of Poor in the parish of Glenelg, who was tried on a charge of manslaughter at the late assizes in Inverness, which was with the concurrence of the presiding judge withdrawn by the Crown Prosecutor before the case for the defence was opened ; and, whether, seeing the great annoyance and expense to which Mr. Fraser has been exposed in meeting so serious a charge, he will recommend to the Treasury that, as the prosecution was undertaken by the Crown, and as no case was made out for the consideration of the jury, Mr. Fraser should be reimbursed for his necessary expenses out of the public funds ?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. M'LAREN) : Sir, the prosecution referred to by the hon. Member was instituted after very careful inquiry, and after consultation by Crown counsel. Although the case broke down at trial, the learned Judge who presided expressed his opinion that it was a proper case to be brought to trial ; and after reading the Papers I have no hesitation in concurring in that opinion. There are no public funds out of which the costs of an accused person can be paid, and I do not think that this is a case for proposing a special Vote for the expenses to which the accused party has been put.

POST OFFICE—COMMUNICATION WITH THE NORTH OF SCOTLAND.

MR. CAMERON asked the Postmaster General, Whether he is able to state if arrangements have been made with the Highland Railway Company by which an acceleration of the mails between Perth and the North may be effected ; and, whether he is aware of the great loss and inconvenience suffered by those now engaged in the fishing on the West Coast of Scotland, in consequence of the delay in repairing the cable to Stornoway, and if he can hold out any hopes that the cable will be put into working order within a short time ?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, that no arrangements had been entered into with the Highland Railway Company for the acceleration of the mail referred to ; but negotiations were about to be entered into with that Company. With regard to the second part of the Question, the delay in the repair of the cable to Stornoway was due to the difficulty of obtaining a cable ship. He hoped steps would be taken to obviate that difficulty in future. He was glad, however, to be able to state that a few days since a suitable cable vessel was obtained, and that vessel was now being got ready with the greatest speed possible. It would proceed to Stornoway in the course of a day or two, and he hoped no delay would occur again,

WILD FOWL ACT, 1880—SALE OF BIRDS.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can state what is the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown with regard to the right to offer for sale birds which, under the Wild Fowl Act of 1880, it is lawful to kill?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had consulted the Law Officers of the Crown with regard to the matter referred to in the Question, and their opinion was that on the construction of the Statute it was doubtful; but as the question was one likely to come before the Courts for decision, it would not be desirable to express any definite opinion on the subject. If the decision should be adverse legislation would be necessary.

ARTIZANS' AND LABOURERS' DWELLINGS ACT (1868) AMENDMENT ACT, 1879, SECTION 18—PUBLIC HEALTH ACT, 1875, SECTION 90.

MR. J. HOLLOND asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether any action has been taken by the local authorities under "The Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Act (1868) Amendment Act, 1879;" and, if so, whether any account of the funds spent in carrying out the Act has been presented by the local authorities in accordance with Section 18; and, whether the Local Government Board has made any bye-laws under Section 90 of "The Public Health Act, 1875?"

MR. DODSON: Sir, as far as I have been able to ascertain, action has not been taken by the local authorities under this Act, except in two or three instances. Forms of account of expenditure have been sent by the Secretary of State and the Board to all the urban authorities; but the Returns received do not show any expenditure, save in one or two cases. The Local Government Board have issued model bye-laws under Section 90 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and are now making suggestions to the local authorities on the point. The actual making of the bye-laws rests, however, with the local authorities, and not with the Board.

TURKEY—THE ALBANIAN LEAGUE.

MR. SUMMERS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs,

Whether he can give the House any information with regard to the origin and nature of the conflicts that have recently taken place between the Albanians and the Turks?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, ever since the murder of Mehemet Ali, which was allowed to remain unpunished, the inhabitants of North-East Albania, who had already shown their discontent with Turkish rule, have assumed a very independent attitude towards the Ottoman officials. The Albanian movement, which was fostered by the Porte in order to resist the surrender of Dulcigno to Montenegro, could not be suddenly suppressed when the Porte were ultimately compelled to carry out that arrangement. This agitation increased in November, at the moment of a successful resistance offered to the conscription in the north-eastern districts of the Vilayet of Kossovo. The head-quarters of the Albanian League were first at Prisrend; but it gradually extended its influence southward, till it embraced nearly the whole of the Vilayet of Kossovo. About the month of February, emissaries were sent to Middle Albania and Scutari to agitate for autonomous Albania; but they did not meet with much success. As it was stated the League were ready to furnish a corps of 20,000 men for hostilities against Greece, the Porte found it advisable to temporize with them; but the authority of the Porte was practically in abeyance till troops began to move up to Uscup, at the end of February; and in April the League was defeated by Dervish Pasha.

THE ISLANDS OF THE SOUTH PACIFIC
—OUTRAGES UPON NATIVES COMMITTED UNDER THE BRITISH FLAG.

MR. SUMMERS asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether his attention has been called to the statements of Captain Turpie, the Rev. Thomas Neilson, and others, to the effect that outrages are being constantly perpetrated with impunity upon the natives of the islands of the South Pacific by white men sailing under the British flag; and, whether he is able to give the House any information on the subject; and, if not, whether he will cause strict inquiry to be made?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, our attention having been drawn some time ago to these statements in the newspapers, my noble Friend the Secretary of State directed a letter to be addressed to the London Missionary Society, asking for any particulars as to the time, place, and nature of any such outrages, expressing likewise his regret that missionaries should not at once report such cases to the naval or colonial authorities, or to Her Majesty's High Commissioner in the Western Pacific.

FRANCE AND TUNIS—THE HARBOUR OF BISERTA.

MR. OTWAY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether there is any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Report as to his Survey of the Harbour of Biserta made some years ago by Admiral Spratt?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the manuscript of this Report is not in the records of the Hydrographic Department of the Admiralty; but doubtless it is the same as appears in the published journal of the Royal Geographical Society for 1846. The Report is accompanied by a very clear map, and may be found at page 251 of the volume, which is volume 16 of the series.

FRANCE AND TUNIS—THE KROUHMIR TRIBES (MILITARY OPERATIONS).

MR. OTWAY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that a considerable number of French troops have been landed in the Bay of Biserta, contrary to the protest of the Bey of Tunis; whether this act, under such circumstances, does not constitute an act of war against the Government of Tunis; and, if so, whether it has been preceded or followed by a declaration of war against the governing power of Tunis; and, whether he will lay upon the Table Papers in the Foreign Office relating to the subject during the Government of Lord Palmerston, about the year 1863?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, it is true that French troops have been landed in the Bay of Biserta, and that Her Majesty's Government have received from the Bey of Tunis a protest against the violation of his territory; but his Highness at the same time states that he continues to be at peace with France, and the Consul of France still holds relations with the Bardo. With regard to the presentation of the Papers of 1863, it would not be convenient to pick out for present publication portions of a very long correspondence, which was of immense bulk, in 1838 and 1864.

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST asked, whether the hon. Baronet would be willing to lay on the Table the despatch conveying the assurance given to Lord Lyons by M. de St. Hilaire in regard to Tunis?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said, that despatch contained assurances which were repeated last week, so there were two despatches, and these would ultimately be laid before the House; but it was not desirable to do that at this moment. The substance of these assurances had been stated twice by himself, and were also stated in the other House by Lord Granville on Friday last.

ARMY RE-ORGANIZATION—THE NEW WARRANT.

MR. FITZPATRICK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, under the new warrant, senior Captains who are now forty years of age will be promoted to the rank of Major (substantive) on 1st of July, or whether they will be compelled to retire on that day?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member I have to state that there are several classes of captains of 40 years of age, and that, without entering into much detail, I could not explain how they will be dealt with. But, as a general rule, I think that an officer proposed to be promoted and liable to retire as a captain on the same day would probably be promoted.

LIEUT.-COLONEL MILNE-HOME asked the Secretary of State for War, If the Regulations intended to take effect on the 1st July 1881 will preserve to all officers who have wholly or partially purchase rights the same pecuniary advantages on retirement that are given by the Warrant of 1878; and, also, if his attention has been called to the apparent anomaly under that Warrant of officers who may, in certain instances, lose by promotion in respect of retiring pension, and if he will in the forthcoming Warrant provide against the recurrence of such cases?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, I do not know the particular case which the hon. and gallant Member has in view; but, speaking generally, the effect of the proposed changes will be that all Purchase officers will retain on retirement the pecuniary advantages given them under the present Warrant. If the hon. and gallant Gentleman is aware of any special case which would form an exception to this rule, under the system I have explained in the Memorandum laid before Parliament, it shall be considered by the Committee who are dealing with the new Warrant. If the second part of the hon. and gallant Member's Question refers to the principle of the Warrant of 1877, under which inducements were given to officers to retire in their then existing ranks, and which he calls an apparent anomaly, I can only say that I find that this so-called anomaly was a very deliberate decision by my Predecessor on the Report of the Royal Commission, where the reasons for it are fully given; and I am not prepared to disturb it.

ARMY—BRITISH CEMETERIES IN THE CRIMEA.

MAJOR VAUGHAN LEE asked the Secretary of State of War, If his attention has been called to a letter in the "Times" newspaper of the 14th instant, under the signature of J. P., showing the state of our cemeteries on Cathcart's Hill and elsewhere in the Crimea; and, if he will cause steps to be taken to verify this statement, and, in the event of its being correct, he will, without delay, make arrangements to have the walls of these cemeteries repaired, and the graves and graveyards properly restored, and, for the future, have those cemeteries maintained in proper order like those of the French?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. and gallant Member, I have to state that I have always taken much interest in the subject of his Question, although officially the cemeteries are not in charge of the War Department and we have no funds from which aid could be given towards their maintenance. I find, as a matter of fact, that since the Crimean War about £7,000 has been spent upon them, and at the present time £80 a-year is allowed from Civil Votes for the salary of a custodian and for repairs. The real difficulty, which marks the difference between these cemeteries and the French graves, is that there are 10 British cemeteries at or near the places where the men fell, and that much objection would be made to any plan for bringing the remains at the present time to one place as was done by the French. I believe, however, that the state of the Cathcart's Hill Cemetery is not accurately described in the letter to The Times signed "J. P.," and it is contradicted by a subsequent letter signed by two gentlemen known to me of undoubted authority, whose initials are given, and also by a report from the Consul General at Odessa, who recently visited the Crimea. I have asked the Foreign Office to instruct the Consul General at Odessa to make further and full inquiries on the subject.

POST OFFICE—POSTAGE OF NEWSPAPERS ABROAD.

MR. WARTON asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will consider the advisability either of extending the time within which newspapers may be posted to foreign parts, or of dispensing with any restriction in that behalf?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, the restriction to which the hon. and learned Member refers has been practically abolished with regard to the whole of the Continent, the United States, and Canada, because newspapers can, by a regulation of the Postal Union, be posted at the same rate as book packets. I will consider whether any steps can be taken to limit the effect of the restriction with regard to other countries.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL (NEGOTIATIONS)—SIR EVELYN WOOD.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to a telegram in the "Standard" of May 6th, dated Newcastle, Wednesday, in which it is stated that—

"Considerable surprise has been manifested here at the question raised in England as to blame or praise due to General Wood for his making the Treaty with the Boers.

"Sir E. Wood as a soldier obeyed the orders he received from the Home authorities, and carried out a painful and delicate task to the best of his abilities. It is, however, no secret here that he strongly advocated driving the Boers out of Natal before entering into any negotiations with them; but his advice was altogether ignored at home;"

and, whether such statement is correct?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH asked permission, before the right hon. Gentleman answered the Question, to put to him a Question on the same subject of which he had given him private Notice. It was—Whether any communications by telegraph or otherwise bearing on this subject have passed between Sir Evelyn Wood and the Home Government, or between the late Sir George Colley, while he was in command, and the Home Government, which have not yet been published; and, if so, whether any such communications will be published?

MR. GRANT DUFF: I will, Sir, with the permission of the House, answer these two Questions together. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) asks me with regard to a passage in The Standard newspaper. To that I have to reply that the statement therein contained appears to me to be neither correct nor just to Sir Evelyn Wood. In reply to the right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), I have to say that the whole history of the transaction to which he alludes is in the hands of hon. Members; that we have received no telegrams or other communications either from Sir George Colley or Sir Evelyn Wood besides and beyond those that have been laid on the Table of the House. I would refer hon. Members more especially to No. 89 of 2,837, received at the Colonial Office on the 6th of March, to No. 113 of the same Paper, received on the 17th of March, and to No. 5 of 2,658, dated the 23rd of March, the material part of which I will read as containing the most recent expression of Sir Evelyn Wood's views—

“March 23, 11.30 p.m.—Sincerely grateful to Government for appreciation of efforts in carrying out their wishes. Referring to words ‘happiest results,’ &c., in my telegram of March 5, I meant that a series of actions fought by six companies could not affect our prestige, but Boer leaders had lit a fire which had got beyond their control and would be quenched more easily after a British victory; the fire is now out for a time, but Kruger to-day stated the Republic would be ruined if the Commission admitted claims from all forced to aid Boers. In drafting instructions, therefore, the hitherto inert power of the loyalists must be treated as an important factor in the question of a lasting peace. It would be also false modesty to conceal belief that personal acquaintance with me has materially aided solution. Uneducated men mistrust Governments, but trust persons.”

TITHE (EXTRAORDINARY CHARGE) BILL.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked the honourable and learned Member for Rye, Whether, looking to the fact that a Select Committee of this House has been appointed to consider the question of Extraordinary Tithe, he proposes to proceed with the Second Reading of the Bill on the same subject on the 25th of May?

MR. INDERWICK, in reply, said, he had received no Notice of the intention of the hon. Member to put the Question to him. The Select Committee to which the hon. Gentleman referred had not yet been appointed. When it had been, he would be happy to tell the hon. Member what course he intended to take.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he had given public Notice of his Question on Friday, which he had thought would have been sufficient, and he had intended no discourtesy to the hon. and learned Member. He now gave Notice that if the hon. and learned Member proceeded with his Motion on the 25th of May he would move the “Previous Question.”

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL (NEGOTIATIONS)—THE BRITISH GARRISONS.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the great danger of a native rising in the Transvaal, and of the critical state of our negotiations, as suggested by his answer on Monday last, he can explain the exact position of the garrisons in the Transvaal under the terms of the armistice by which they were to be allowed to receive provisions, but no material of war?

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not wish to be committed by the terms of the Question in the answer which I give; and I take it for granted that the noble Lord's object is not to ask me to go into military details, but simply to state the condition of the garrisons. Taking the Question in that view, I have no hesitation in answering that, in the first place, as regards the provisioning of the garrisons there is no difficulty whatever. In regard to ammunition, they are also well supplied.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—

MR. DILLON.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that Mr. Dillon, now in Kilmainham Gaol, is suffering from illness; and, if he will take steps to ascertain whether continued incarceration will have any serious effect upon that gentleman's health, with a view to at once release him, if such be the case?

MR. SEXTON also asked the right hon. Gentleman, Whether it is true, as stated in the newspapers, that in consequence of the report on the state of his health, the hon. Member for Tipperary has been placed in the infirmary of Kilmainham Prison; also, whether prisoners confined in cells through illness are condemned to entire solitude, because the rules of the prison prevent their receiving any visitors?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am afraid I must ask the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) to repeat his Question, in order that I may make inquiry. In answer to the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), Mr. Dillon is, I understand, attended by his own medical adviser. I have not received official information, although I have made inquiry as to the state of his health; but I hope, from what I see in the papers, that he is not seriously ill. That is what I gather. I should be sorry if his imprisonment should affect his health; but the hon. Member can hardly expect us to release him to enable him to renew the conduct for which it has been felt necessary to arrest him.

MR. HEALY rose to a point of Order. He wished to know whether, when a Member of that House who had been arrested on a charge for which he had not been tried, and of which he had not been guilty, was referred to in the House, he should be mentioned by name, and not by the constituency which he represented, as was the usual courtesy in the House?

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) has not taken any course, in my opinion, opposed to Order. Hon. Members are aware that there are two Members for Tipperary in the House, and it is necessary to distinguish between them.

MR. HEALY asked whether, in the case of a constituency having two Members, it was not usual to refer to them as the senior and the junior Member respectively?

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN: Sir, as there are two Members for Bradford in the House, may I ask Mr. Forster whether he will be in a position to give to the House the information he expects regarding the health of the hon. Member for Tipperary when it reaches him?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I may say that I meant no reflection and no act of discourtesy by the way I referred to Mr. Dillon. My impression was that, when referring to any action outside of a Member of this House, it was within Order not to refer to him in the usual way, but to speak of him by name.

ARMY RE-ORGANIZATION — MILITIA OFFICERS' UNIFORMS.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the Secretary of State for War, If any allowance will be made to Militia officers whose regiments are to be changed into the Highland or trows dress, in the same way as indicated by him, for officers of those corps changed from or to Rifles?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. Baronet, I have to say that in cases where alterations are made in the uniforms of Militia regiments to and from Highland dress, I propose to grant some allowance, as in the case of Rifle dress. I may add that I propose to assist the officers of the Army in the same way.

NAVY—THE TROOP-SHIP "NEMESIS."

MR. W. B. BEACH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is correct that the "Nemesis," a troop-ship engaged by the Government to take the 7th Hussars to South Africa, and which started with half the Regiment on the 28th of February, was in such bad repair, and her engines were so defective, that a large number of horses died during the voyage?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, it is the case that 39 horses out of 224 died on board the Nemesis on the way out. The vessel was 40 days on the voyage to the Cape, which was about 10 days longer than she ought to have taken. The delay between England and St. Vincent was caused by unusually heavy weather; but after leaving the latter port, she put into St. Helena under circumstances which have not been satisfactorily explained. On reaching the Cape the troops and horses were transferred to another transport for conveyance to Durban, and an inquiry into the circumstances was ordered on the spot, the report of which has not yet been received. The Nemesis was classed 100 A1 at Lloyd's, practically the highest classification she could have, and held a Board of Trade certificate dated the 21st of February last. Her hull, engines, and boilers were also thoroughly surveyed by the officers of the Transport Department before she was engaged, and were found in every respect in good order. I am sure that the House will remember that this is the only thing resembling a misadventure in the operations of the Transport Department connected with South Africa. That Department has conveyed 12,000 men, 2,400 horses, and 7,500 tons of stores 8,000 miles across the ocean, for the most part in the depth of a winter of no ordinary severity.

PUBLIC HEALTH—SMALL-POX (METROPOLIS).

COLONEL MAKINS asked the President of the Local Government Board, If it be a fact that application was made by the Asylums Board to the Government and the Metropolitan Board of Works for permission to place temporary Small Pox Hospitals on the vacant ground at Wormwood Scrubs; and, if so, whether such application was refused, and the grounds for such refusal?

MR. DODSON: Sir, no application of the above nature has been made to the Government or to the Metropolitan Board by the Asylums Board; but an application from the Fulham District Board of Works was made to the Metropolitan Board and refused, that Board stating that they had no power to grant the use of any portion of Wormwood Scrubs for the purpose. No specific grounds of refusal were stated; but Wormwood Scrubs appear to be vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works by the Wormwood Scrubs Act, 1879, upon trust for the perpetual use thereof by the inhabitants of the Metropolis for exercise and recreation grounds, subject to their use for military purposes; and it is presumed that it was considered that under that Act there was no power to use any part of the land for a small-pox hospital.

RAILWAYS (INDIA)—PORTUGUESE TERRITORY—TREATY OF LISBON.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether, in accordance with the conditions of the Treaty of Lisbon, a mixed Commission has ascertained that a Railway from Marmaganna to New Hubli would be preferable, in the interests of commerce generally, to one from Karwar to New Hubli, and likely to prove remunerative; and, whether the Government of India are satisfied that the proposed Line by way of Marmaganna is preferable to any other, can be constructed at a reasonable cost, and is likely to prove remunerative?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, under the Treaty of Lisbon it was optional to appoint a mixed Commission to ascertain whether a railway from Marmagoa to New Hubli would be preferable, in the interests of commerce generally, to one from Karwar to New Hubli. The words are, "Whenever either of the high contracting parties may be desirous of ascertaining" the advantages of one as compared with the other, they shall in concert appoint such a Commission. It was not, however, considered necessary to follow this course, Her Majesty's Government being of opinion that there were good and sufficient reasons for co-operating with the Government of Portugal in carrying out the Marmagoa undertaking, each Government dealing with the construction of those sections only of railway which lie within its own territory. The Government of India expressed themselves in favour of the Karwar line; but in dealing with the question at the India Office it was thought that both the letter and spirit of the Treaty bound us not only not to attach too much weight to the circumstance that Karwar was in British territory, but also to judge the case for Marmagoa as favourably as in reason and candour we could; and we came to the conclusion that it was more advantageous, under all the circumstances, to make the arrangement, which has been explained, with the Portuguese Government. There is no reason to suppose that the line will not be constructed at a reasonable cost by that Government and that when completed throughout it will not be remunerative.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—EMI-GRANT SHIPS.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to a letter in the "Pall Mall Gazette" of Friday, 6th instant, on the "Horrors of an Emigrant Ship," signed Charlotte O'Brien, and detailing the life on board an emigrant ship from Ireland to America; whether he has noticed especially the following passage:—

"But my business was with the women's quarters, and we went on there. Between two decks, better lighted than the men's quarters, was a large space, open from one side of the ship to the other. From either side of a long central walk to the outer walls of the ship were slung two enormous hammocks, one suspended about three feet from the floor, the other above the lower one. What was going on in the two upper hammocks I could not see, but I presume they were the same as those below. I suppose each of these hammocks carry about one hundred persons. They were made of sailcloth, and, being suspended all around from hooks, were perfectly flat. Narrow strips of sailcloth divided this great bed into berths. These strips of cloth, when the mattresses were out, formed divisions about eight inches high; when the mattresses are in it must be almost one level. Now in these beds lie hundreds of men and women. Any man who comes with a woman, who is or calls herself his wife, sleeps by right in the midst of hundreds of young women, who are compelled to live in his presence day and night; if they remove their clothes it is under his eyes, if they lie down to rest it is beside him. It is a shame even to speak of these things; but to destroy such an evil it is necessary to face it;"

and, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any steps to put an end to such a disgraceful treatment of the emigrant poor?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, the Prime Minister had desired him to answer that Question and another of a similar nature which stood on the Paper in the name of the noble Viscount the Member for Barnstaple (Viscount Lynton). The circumstances to which reference was made in the first Question were brought to his attention some days before the letter was published in The Pall Mall Gazette by his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and he at once made some preliminary inquiry into the matter. On the publication of the letter signed "Charlotte G. O'Brien" he communicated with the managers of the five lines of British steamships which took Irish emigrants from Liverpool to Queenstown; and he had now received from all those managers a most emphatic and categorical denial that any such circumstances as were related in the article could possibly have taken place with regard to their lines of steamships. He had, however, thought the matter of so much importance that he had directed Captain Wilson, one of the principal officers of the Board of Trade, to visit Queenstown and Liverpool to make special inquiries into the matter; and Mr. Gray, the Assistant Secretary of the Marine Department of the Board of Trade, who was now at Liverpool, had been instructed to make further inquiry. He had asked Miss O'Brien to give him the name of the ship to which her letter referred, and also any other particulars which would enable him more carefully and thoroughly to investigate the matter. He hoped, under these circumstances, the House would think it right to suspend its judgment upon the statement made. As soon as possible, after its completion, the Correspondence would be placed on the Table.

MR. MACDONALD said, he had several times crossed the Atlantic; but he had never seen anything of the kind mentioned, although he had inspected the steerage. He would like to know, if the right hon. Gentleman had any information as to what line of steamships was referred to?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, the line referred to was not mentioned in the article in The Pall Mall Gazette; but he had written to Miss O'Brien for particulars.

MR. O'DONNELL asked, if any inquiry would be made as to American lines touching at Queenstown?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he was not aware that any American line carried Irish emigrants from Queenstown or Liverpool.

POST OFFICE (SAVINGS BANK DEPARTMENT) — EMPLOYMENT OF DEAF AND DUMB PERSONS.

MR. C. S. PARKER asked the Postmaster General, Whether, as has been stated, it is intended to employ a certain number of deaf and dumb persons at the Post Office in the sorting of papers?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, I am glad to be able to state that arrangements have been made for the employment, experimentally, of a certain number of deaf and dumb persons in the sorting of papers in the Post Office Savings Bank Department, and I can only express a hope that the experiment will turn out successfully.

POST OFFICE (SAVINGS BANK DEPARTMENT)—PROMOTIONS.

EARL PERCY asked the Postmaster General, with reference to the promotions about to be made in the Savings Bank Department of the Post Office, Whether it is the fact that it is proposed to pass over duly qualified officers in favour of others below them in their class; and, if so, whether he can state the grounds upon which this course is to be adopted?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, in reply to the Question of the noble Earl, I have to state that no names have yet been submitted to me for promotion in the Savings Bank Department. In order to prevent misapprehension, I think it may be well to mention that, by a long-established rule of the Service, promotion from the third to the second class depends upon seniority combined with full competency, and from the second class to the first, and to appointments above the first, upon superior merit. I can only add that in the promotions about to be made I shall endeavour to act on these rules with the strictest impartiality.

THE LATE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD, K.G. — INSCRIPTION ON PROPOSED MONUMENT.

MR. MACDONALD asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If the Inscription which is to be placed on the Monument which he will propose to ask to be erected to the memory of the late Earl of Beaconsfield will contain any reference whatever to his actions as a leader of a political party?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, as I understand this matter, according to the precedents and custom of Parliament, when the House arrives at a Vote of this kind, it expresses it in terms which are sufficiently full to afford a guide for the inscription to be placed on the public monument. That has been the course pursued on the present occasion, and I apprehend it would not be in accordance with precedent or policy, or within the authority conferred by the Vote of Parliament, to make any addition to what I may call the material words of the inscription. I do not think that any of the monuments, as far as I know, contain references to the acts of persons whom they commemorate in their character of Leaders of a political Party, and certainly I should not propose that there should now be anything that would be at variance with the established practice in the matter.

ARMY RE-ORGANIZATION — MILITIA OFFICERS' UNIFORMS.

EARL PERCY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will lay on the Table of the House a Statement of the probable average outlay which will be imposed upon each officer of Militia by the changes in dress and appointments consequent upon the proposals of Her Majesty's Government, distinguishing between those officers belonging to Regiments which will change their facings and those which will not; and, whether this House will be afforded an opportunity of considering the proposed changes of uniform before they were put in orders?

MR. CHILDERS: No, Sir; I do not propose to lay such a Return upon the Table. In many cases the alteration referred to will involve a very small expenditure, and I have already stated what I intend to do when material changes are involved. If, however, the noble Earl wishes to raise any discussion on these points, he can do so when the Vote for Clothing is being considered.

ALKALI, &c. WORKS REGULATION BILL—CEMENT WORKS.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he is prepared to lay before the House the private reports of the Government chemists with reference to the tests to be applied to the gases or vapours emitted from cement works; and, whether he is aware that no means exist for consuming carbonic acid gas; and if, in these circumstances, he is prepared to state what are the best practical means which cement manufacturers are to be required to use, in order to comply with the Act?

MR. DODSON: Sir, there are no Reports, either private or public, from the Government chemists as to the specific quantitative tests to be applied to these works. I am aware that no means of a practicable character exist for consuming carbonic acid gas; but that is not the gas complained of. What is complained of is the acidity other than that from carbonic acid, the density of the vapour, and the smell. Although I am not prepared at this moment to state what are the best practicable and available means cement manufacturers might be required to use, I am advised that these works may be conducted, in many instances, so as to give out less offensive vapour than is now the case, and that the vapour given out may be allowed to escape in such a manner as to be dispersed much better than at present.

SOUTH AFRICA — THE TRANSVAAL (POLITICAL RELATIONS).

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Transvaal State will be in "full Colonial relations with this Country;" or, whether the relations between this Country and the Transvaal will be conducted through the Foreign Office, and not through the Colonial Office?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, in answer to this Question as to the words "full Colonial relations with this country," which are put in inverted commas, I wish to say I never stated or implied that the Transvaal under the new condition of things, when settled, would be in full Colonial relations with this country. I do not think that that would be an accurate description, so far as I am able to form an opinion. With regard to the Question whether the relations between this country and the Transvaal will be conducted through the Foreign Office, and not through the Colonial Office, I have to say that the practice in South Africa, even with regard to a purely Foreign State—for example, the Orange Free State—has been to conduct the relations through the Colonial Office. Instructions have been given to the Royal Commissioners on this subject to the following effect:—As regards communication with Foreign Governments, it will probably be found that the Transvaal Government should correspond on such matters with Her Majesty's Government through the President of the High Commission.

EARL PERCY asked, whether the words "full Colonial relation with this country" have not been applied to the state of certain countries whose condition is to be that of the Transvaal with regard to Great Britain?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the noble Earl had completely mistaken the bearing of his argument. His argument was, that as there were States in full Colonial relation with this country where the Queen did not appoint the Governor, a fortiori it could not be requisite that we should appoint a Governor in a State like the Transvaal.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE QUEEN v. BRADLAUGH AND ANOTHER—"FRUITS OF PHILOSOPHY."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the honourable and learned Member for Launceston, Whether it was a fact that the Law Officers of the late Government decided not to proceed further with the prosecution against Mr. Bradlaugh and others for publishing obscene and immoral works after the first indictment had failed owing to a technical error?

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD, in reply, said, the Question of his noble Friend appeared to assume that the prosecution was at the instance of the Government. That was an error. It was begun by the City Police, and he had no knowledge of it. He must—

SIR WILFRID LAWSON rose to Order, and asked, whether the noble Lord could ask a Question which had no reference to a Bill or other matter before the House?

MR. SPEAKER: The Rule is, that a Question must refer to a Bill or Motion before the House; but as the present Question refers to a matter which has attracted much public attention in this House, and as it deals with the acts of the Law Officers of the Crown of the late Government, I thought it my duty to allow the Question to be put.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, he would repeat what he was saying when interrupted—namely, that the case was begun by the City Police; he had no knowledge of it until after that time. It never was a Government prosecution, and no question of further proceedings ever came before him as Law Officer. He thought, however, he was bound to add that if he had been asked his opinion, it would have been against giving further publicity to an obscene and mischievous publication.

APPOINTMENT OF COLONIAL GOVERNORS.

MR. WARTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether there is any instance of a colony in which the appointment of its governor, even in those cases where that office has been hereditary or elective, has not been originally made by the Crown?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he should be most happy to answer any Question relating to a matter within his own knowledge; but as regarded that which formed the subject of the present Question, the hon. and learned Member was quite as competent as he was to ascertain the information for which he sought; and, considering the respective allowance of leisure, perhaps the hon. and learned Member was more able to find an opportunity.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked, Whether it was the intention of the Government to take the first three Orders of the Day on the Paper in the order in which they stood?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes. He would add that they did not propose to curtail the debate on the Land Bill for the sake of bringing on the adjourned debate on the Parliamentary Oaths Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked, Whether, in view of the narrow majority of Saturday morning, the Government intended to persist in their determination to ask the House to have a Morning Sitting to-morrow (Tuesday)?

MR. GLADSTONE said, it would be more convenient to answer that Question when the Order was called on.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, the Order might not be reached until 1 o'clock in the morning, perhaps later, and the delay would occasion inconvenience. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman would not propose to increase the inconvenience of a Morning Sitting by keeping Members until a late hour before they received a definite announcement?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he should be prepared to take the judgment of the House upon the Order. He felt it necessary to do that, for reasons connected with the general position of the case, and, having said that, hon. Members would have knowledge that the subject would come on.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that he had arranged the matter with his noble Friend (Lord Richard Grosvenor).

MR. GLADSTONE said, that he had not meant to convey any reflection on his hon. Friend the Member for Hertford.

FRANCE AND TUNIS—THE TURKISH FLEET.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the French Ambassador at Constantinople has protested against the despatch of Turkish ships to Tunis, and has stated that French ships will fire upon such ships if they are despatched?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No information has reached Her Majesty's Government of the reported despatch of the Turkish Fleet to Tunis and the protest of the French Government; but an incident of this nature occurred in 1836. A similar threat was made by France in 1841, M. Guizot stating that the French Admiral had orders to turn back the Turkish Squadron, which it was rumoured was about to visit Tunis, by remonstrance if he could, but by force if necessary; and in 1864 Her Majesty's Government were informed that France would still oppose the presence of the Turkish Fleet in Tunisian waters.

MR. OTWAY asked the hon. Baronet, whether he would complete his answer by stating what the answer of Lord Palmerston's Government was in 1864?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: There was no answer whatever, Sir.

MR. OTWAY would like to know, if the hon. Baronet would be so good as to allow the despatches to be laid on the Table?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, there were 15 volumes of these despatches from 1838 to 1864. On the occasion referred to, there was no direct communication made by the British Government with regard to the action of the French. The British Government was informed of it; but no request was made for an answer, and no answer was given.

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST: I should like to ask the hon. Baronet, whether, in his opinion, the French Government are justified in following the precedent of 1836?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I can only reply, in the words of the Government on a former occasion—it is never the custom of the Government to give answers to hypothetical Questions.

MR. OTWAY gave Notice that he would ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he would allow despatches to be placed on the Table which should show whether in 1864 the British fleet was moved from Malta to the port of Tunis?

ARTIZANS' AND LABOURERS' DWELLINGS ACTS—ALLEGED REMOVAL OF FAMILIES.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, If it is the fact that the Metropolitan Board of Works, proceeding under the Artizans' Dwellings Acts, have given notice of immediate removal to nearly two hundred families, who are chiefly dock labourers residing in courts lying between Rosemary Lane (Royal Mint Street) and St. Katharine's Docks; and, if he can say whether the new dwellings which the Board proposes to erect will be suitable as residences for the same classes as those who are now about being disturbed in the locality specified?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG, in reply, said, that the hon. and learned Member was under a misapprehension. The Metropolitan Board had given no such notices as those to which he had referred; but they had, at the request of the Trustees of the Peabody Fund, to whom the adjoining land had been sold for the erection of artizans' dwellings, obtained and furnished the names of the persons residing in the locality mentioned in the Question, and the Trustees had issued notices to those persons that their new buildings were ready for occupation. The Board erected no dwellings themselves, but only sold or let the land for that purpose.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Prime Minister, Whether, considering the supreme importance of the Land Law

Sir Charles W. Dilke

(Ireland) Bill, and the great advisability of sending it up to the House of Lords in good time, so as not to give that House any excuse on that account to reject it, he will postpone all other Business not of the most urgent nature in its favour and take it day by day?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he was sure the hon. Member would not accuse him of want of sympathy if he declined to enter into the Question in detail. He would confine himself to saying that, as far as the Business of the Government was concerned, they attached the highest importance to the progress of the Land Law (Ireland) Bill being made as expeditiously as it could be done with due deliberation, and they would allow nothing but what was absolutely necessary or of the very simplest character to interfere with it.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—PARLIAMENTARY OATHS BILL.

MR. RITCHIE asked, Whether the adjourned debate on the Parliamentary Oaths Bill could be taken after 12.30, in the event of any opposition being offered to the Bill?

MR. SPEAKER said, that the Notice of Opposition that had been given applied only to the Motion of which the Attorney General had given Notice. The House was now engaged on an Order of the Day, altogether a different matter; and as there was no Notice of opposition to the Order of the Day, it could come on at any hour.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR wished for a definite expression from the Prime Minister, whether it was on the question of the Morning Sitting, or on this Bill, that he intended to take the feeling of the House? Was it that the Government meant to bring on the question of a Morning Sitting the next day, when the Order of the Day was read? He believed it was competent to the Government to adopt either course.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, there is no intention on the part of the Government to bring in anything relating to the proposal of my hon. and learned Friend. The question of the Morning Sitting only will be considered to-night.

In answer to Mr. ONSLOW,

MR. SPEAKER said, that the adjourned debate on the Bill could come on at any hour.

TARIFF.

MR. SLAGG asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the present Treaty of Commerce with France will not expire on Nov. 8, and what attempt is being made to avoid delay in fixing its future form?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have been officially informed that the new French General Tariff was promulgated yesterday, and accordingly, in pursuance of the Declaration signed on the 10th of October, 1879, the Commercial Treaties and Conventions between Great Britain and France now in force will expire on the 8th of November next. To avoid the delay referred to by the hon. Member, I beg to state that Her Majesty's Government urged on the 18th of June, 5th of August, 12th of October, 15th of November, 15th of February, and several times in March and April last, that negotiations should be entered upon; but the French Government replied that they could not proceed until the Bill for establishing the new General Tariff had been passed by the Senate. When the discussion in the Senate was approaching its conclusion, Her Majesty's Government asked that, in order to avoid delay, some person should be sent to London to furnish preliminary explanations on questions of detail. The French Government, however, preferred to give them in Paris, and Mr. Kennedy was accordingly sent there for the purpose. It will thus be seen that there has been in the past no delay on the part of Her Majesty's Government. I would add that in the official notification from the French Government to which I have referred, no proposal with respect to formal negotiations is made by that Government. This point will not be lost sight of in the answer which will be returned to M. Challemel-Lacour.

MR. BOURKE asked, whether in the negotiations any hope had been held out of changes beneficial to the commerce of this country?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that such hopes had been held out, and that he hoped the French Government would be prepared to make such changes.

OF RUSSIA.

REPLY TO THE MESSAGE OF CONDOLENCE.

THE MARQUESS OF TAVISTOCK, having been appointed, together with the Earl PERCY, to attend upon Her Royal and Imperial Highness the Duchess of Edinburgh with a Message of Condolence of this House, reported that Her Royal and Imperial Highness had been pleased to reply:—

*Clarence House,
St. James's, S.W.*

My Lords,

I beg that you will have the goodness to convey to the House of Commons the assurance of my deep gratitude for the Message of Condolence which it has sent to me, and of which you have been the bearers.

The feeling to which the House has given expression, on the subject of the death of my beloved father, has been to me and to the other members of my family a source of the greatest consolation.

MARIE.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

MONUMENT TO THE EARL OF

COMMITTEE.

(In the Committee.)

MR. GLADSTONE, in rising to move the following Resolution:—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will give directions that a Monument be erected in the Collegiate Church of Saint Peter, Westminster, to the Memory of the late Right Hon. the Earl of Beaconsfield, with an Inscription expressive of the high sense entertained by the House of his rare and splendid gifts, and of his devoted labours in Parliament and in great Offices of State; and to assure Her Majesty that this House will make good the expenses attending the same,"

said: Sir, considering the Notice that appears, in conjunction with my own, upon the Paper, I should, perhaps, be too sanguine were I to express even the faintest hope that this Motion might receive the unanimous assent of the Committee. But, Sir, while I do not venture to press that hope, I do entertain the very earnest hope—I would even say I offer the most earnest entreaty—that it may not be made a subject of lengthened or contentious debate. I say that, Sir, in the position of one especially bound to consider what is for the dignity of the House; but I say it also in the character of an old and keen opponent of Lord Beaconsfield; and nothing would be so painful to me, except, indeed, the rejection of the Motion, which I think impossible, as that its grace should be entirely marred by its being made the subject of angry disputation. It has not been unnatural that on a subject of this kind, exciting so much and such varied public interest, criticism should have been busy. But with regard to that criticism, both with respect to what has been done and with respect to what has not been done, I will simply say that my object has been the fulfilment of my duty, and that the fulfilment of my duty has appeared to me to lie in a careful consideration of the rules and precedents applicable to the case. I think that those precedents ought to be liberally interpreted; but, for my own part, in all these complimentary matters I have a great jealousy of additions. There is a temptation, under the influence of feeling, to make such additions, and every addition made on a particular occasion becomes an embarrassment on the next occasion. I will simply say, not that I have interpreted precedent aright—I do not assume that—but I have endeavoured, strictly and carefully, to make it my ground. Everyone will feel that this is not the occasion to attempt an historical portraiture of Lord Beaconsfield. Neither is it the occasion to attempt, especially from this side of the House—but from no side of the House, I will venture to say, is it the occasion to attempt a political eulogy of Lord Beaconsfield. It would be mistaking the purposes for which we have met to-day. I will go a little further and say that the position of the House is in some respects and in part peculiar. I do not know that it has ever happened that a Parliament in sharp antagonism to the policy of a particular Minister has been called upon to accept a proposal of this kind with respect to the Minister whose policy is opposed. At the same time, though there is no case exactly analagous to this, there are cases which make a material approximation to it. When Lord John Russell proposed, in 1850, in a speech of great good taste, a monument to the memory of Sir Robert Peel, he very naturally looked back, not merely to the crisis of the Anti-Corn Law movement which had brought them together, but to the long struggles of 30 years before; and Lord John Russell said, in very becoming language—"I will not enter into the nature of the measures with which his name is associated;" and, again—"This is not the time to consider particular opinions or particular measures." But he also quoted an earlier case, in which it happened that Colonel Barré proposed a public monument to Lord Chatham, to whom he had been not very long before in the sharpest opposition. So that although the features of this case are marked features, yet we are not without guidance from the proceedings of those who have gone before us. This I will venture to say, that it is a case with regard to which we who may be said to form the majority in this House ought to be on our guard against giving way to our own narrower political sympathies. It would be better that propositions of this kind should be altogether abandoned and forgotten than that they should degenerate into occasions for issuing the manifestoes of political alliances or of ordinary partizanship. If I am asked why, endeavouring to look without fear or favour at this case upon its merits and upon nothing else, and desirous to speak the truth without constraint and without exaggeration, I venture to recommend this proposition to the House, and why I think that the same reasons which have led the House to give in the case of other Prime Ministers of this country a testimony such as I now invite to the memory of Lord Beaconsfield should actuate us now, I say that, in my judgment, we have to look to two questions, and to two questions only; and they are, whether the tribute that it is proposed to pay is to be paid to one who, in the first place, has sustained a great historic part and done great deeds written on the page of Parliamentary and National history; and next, whether those deeds have been done with the full authority of the constituted organs of the nation and of the nation itself; and I think that an impartial survey of what has happened will satisfy the House that upon neither of these points is there the smallest room for doubt. It may seem to be a sharp mental transition for us to make, when we pass from the balance of political opinion now prevailing in this

House to the balance of opinion that existed here two or three or four years ago. But it is right, it is just, it is necessary that we should recollect that what was done by the late Parliament and what was done by the late Ministry, and above all by Lord Beaconsfield as the official head and as the guiding spirit of the late Ministry, was done under precisely the same constitutional title, and with exactly the same charter and authority as that under which we now claim to act. I cast behind me for a moment the question what I approve and what I disapprove, what I rejoice in and what I regret. We are here to act on the part of the nation, and to maintain that description of action which is suitable to, and which is required by, the nation's continuous life. The career of Lord Beaconsfield is in many respects the most remarkable in our Parliamentary history. For my own part, I know but one that can fairly be compared to it in regard to the emotional surprise—the emotion of wonder, which, when viewed as a whole, it is calculated to excite—and that is the career, more especially the early career, of Mr. Pitt. Lord Beaconsfield's name is associated with at least one great constitutional change, in regard to which I think it will ever be admitted—at least, I never can scruple to admit it—that its arrival was accelerated by his personal act. I will not dwell upon that, but upon the close association of his name with the important change in the principle of the Parliamentary franchise. It is also associated with great European transactions, great European arrangements. I put myself in the position, not necessarily of a friend and admirer who looks with sympathy upon the action of Lord Beaconsfield, but in the position of one who considers the magnitude of the part which he played on behalf of this country; and I say that one who was his political friend might fairly have said of him when he came back from Berlin—

Ingreditur, victorque viros supereminet omnes."*

My duty is to look at these things in the magnitude of their national and historical character, and it is when so looking at them that I have not a doubt that the man who for seven years sustained the office of Prime Minister, the man who for nearly 30 years led, either in one House or in the other, a great Party in this country, and the man who had so intertwined himself in the interests of the national heart, as was shown on the occasion of his illness, is a man for whom the House may well do what I now call upon it to do. I have said that, in my opinion, the magnitude of the part played by Lord Beaconsfield, and the authority with which it was played, are the only matters to which we ought to look; and I press this point specially as one that many of us might perhaps forget—namely, that he acted with the same authority that we claim ourselves. The same Constitution, the same popular liberties, the same franchises, the same principle of acquiescence in the will of the majority placed him in a position, first at this box in this House and then in the House of Lords, to give effect to the policy that he believed to be for the good of his country, as those which have now placed other men in his position to give effect to what they, with equal sincerity, desire to recommend for the approval of Parliament. This somewhat dry portion of my duty, which has led me to direct the attention of the House to these two points, which I deem to contain the whole estimate of the case, is now, I think, concluded. As I have said, I will not attempt anything like an historical retrospect. It would not be fair, and it would not be just, even if it were appropriate, in point of time, that I should do so—I, who have been separated from Lord Beaconsfield by longer and larger differences than, perhaps, ever separated any two persons brought into constant contact in the transaction of Public Business. It would not be fair to him, it would not be fair to his friends, that I should endeavour to draw a picture which must be more faintly coloured, and, I must add, which must be differently coloured if executed by my hand than that which they could fairly claim. But yet, Sir, I will allow myself some satisfaction in dwelling upon matters in which I feel it is pleasurable to myself, and on which I also think it is useful for us all, to dwell. The deceased Statesman had certain great qualities on which it would be idle for me to enlarge; his extraordinary intellectual powers, for instance, were as well known to others as to me; but they are not the proper subject of our present commendations. But there were other great qualities, not intellectual—not merely intellectual, in the sense of being dissociated from conduct—qualities immediately connected with conduct—with regard to which I should say, were I a younger man, I should like to stamp the recollection of them upon my mind for my own future guidance, and with regard to which I will say, to those younger than myself, that I would strongly recommend them for notice and imitation. These characteristics were not only written in a marked manner on his career, but were possessed by him in a degree undoubtedly extraordinary. I speak, for example, of his strength of will, his long-sighted persistency of purpose, reaching from his first entrance on the avenue of life to its very close, his remarkable power of self-government, and last, not least, his great Parliamentary courage, which I, who have been associated in the course of my life with some scores of Ministers, have never seen surpassed. There were other points in his character on which I cannot refrain from saying a word or two. I wish to express the admiration which I have always felt for his strong sympathies with his race, for the sake of which he was always ready to risk popularity and influence. A like sentiment I feel towards the strength of his sympathies with that brotherhood to which he thought, and justly thought, himself entitled to belong—the brotherhood of men of letters. It is only within the last few days that I have read in a very interesting book, the “Autobiography of Thomas Cooper,” how, in the year 1844, when his influence with his Party was not yet established, Mr. Cooper came to him in the character of a struggling literary man, who was also a Chartist, and he who was then Mr. Disraeli met him with the most active and cordial kindness—so ready was his sympathy for genius. There was also another feeling, Sir, lying nearer to the very centre of his existence, which, though a domestic feeling, may now be referred to without indelicacy—I mean his profound, devoted, tender, and grateful affection for his wife, which, if—as may be the case—it deprived him of the honour of public obsequies—I know not whether it did so—has, nevertheless, left for him a more permanent title as one who knew, amid the calls and temptations of political life, what was due to the sanctity and strength of the domestic affections, and made him, in that respect, an example to the country in which he lived. In expressing a hope that this debate may not be unduly lengthened, I wish that my contribution to it may be confined within the limits of necessity. I believe, if the House has been kind enough to listen to the few words I have used, I have set before them all that it is necessary—perhaps all that it is warrantable—for me to say; but there is one slighter matter to which I wish to have the satisfaction of referring. The feeling I am about to express is not a novel feeling. It is one which I have for many years entertained, and which has been founded partly upon the private communications of my friends. There is much error and misapprehension abroad as to the personal sentiments which prevail between public men who are divided in politics. Their words may, necessarily, from time to time, be sharp; their judgments may occasionally, may warrantably, may necessarily be severe; but the general idea of persons less informed than those within the Parliamentary circle, is that they are actuated by sentiments of intense antipathy or hatred for one another. Sir, I wish to take this occasion—if, with the permission of the House, I may for a moment degenerate into egotism upon a subject much too high for it—of recording, in this place and at this hour, my firm conviction that, in all the judgments ever delivered by Lord Beaconsfield upon myself, he never was actuated by sentiments of personal antipathy. It is a pleasure to me to make that acknowledgment. The feeling on my part is not a new one; but the acknowledgment of it could hardly have been made with propriety on an earlier occasion, and hon. Members must excuse me for having thus obtruded it upon them. Now, Sir, I again call the attention of the House to the fact that what we have to look at to-night is the greatness of the man, the greatness of the offices sustained by him, the greatness of the part he played, the greatness of the actions associated with his name, and, finally, the full and undisputed Constitutional authority which he possessed for those actions, whether they were according to our sense and taste or not—that full plenary Constitutional power which authorized beforehand and sanctioned afterwards what he did. These are the essential considerations that ought to guide us; and I feel convinced—unless it be my own grievous fault, and if so I can but regret it—that I have said enough to show the Committee that they will do well and wisely to accept—and to accept in a kindly spirit—the Motion I have the honour to submit for a public monument to Lord Beaconsfield. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, in rising to second the Motion which has just been proposed, I shall say but a very few words, because I am sure I shall best fulfil the wishes of the House, and best respond to the spirit in which the Motion has been made, if I abstain from anything that can, in the slightest degree, derogate from the tone which has been given to the discussion by the speech just delivered. If I could contemplate, which I cannot for a moment do, that this Motion should not meet with the general—let me say, I hope the unanimous—acceptance of the Committee; if I could contemplate that it would not be accepted in a spirit and in a manner that would be satisfactory to those who long to see this mark of honour paid to one they love, at least I should feel that one monument, and that one of a higher character than any that could be carved in stone or marble, has already been erected to the memory of Lord Beaconsfield in the speech we have just heard. That speech has been nobly expressed, and, still more, it has been nobly conceived. I venture to say that in this tribute paid to the memory of a sharp political opponent, by one who has been for so many years engaged in the very severest of political contests, we have a record which will be an honour not merely to the speaker, not merely to him of whom the words were spoken, but an honour, as I think, to the British House of Commons. A true key has been struck to our political life and political contests—and I may venture, taking up the last words of the Prime Minister, and speaking as one who has had a very large share of the private confidence and the intimacy of our lamented and distinguished Friend for many years, having been one who has sat by his side in the midst of contests, and who has also had the privilege of sharing his confidence in private and retired moments, I can entirely and from the bottom of my heart confirm the saying of the Prime Minister, that in all those contests, ready as he always was to enter into the battle, sharp as sometimes his words were in the course of action, there was nothing in his mind, nothing in his spirit, that was unworthy of a generous antagonist. No personal feeling, I believe, was ever allowed by him to warp his sentiments of admiration for his chief political rival. Sir, I feel that this is not a moment at which I could properly address the Committee as I should wish to do. This is not a moment for the indulgence of private feelings. We have, indeed, been connected together on occasions of contest and of public debate; but yet there is so much beside that and behind that to those who were intimate with Lord Beaconsfield, that it would be painful to ourselves to attempt to parade the feelings that exist among us. There was much in him to love. There was much in his sympathy and his readiness at all times to give advice, to enter into every difficulty, however trifling it might seem, to encourage where encouragement was needed, and to utter words of warning when he thought them necessary, that greatly endeared him to us. Sir, it would, of course, be still less appropriate, indeed, it would be an outrage upon the House, were I at such a moment to attempt to draw anything like a political character of Lord Beaconsfield which should be in the nature of a political eulogium. I distinguish such occasions as the present, characteristic as they are of the British House of Commons and of the British nation, from those eulogiums which are sometimes passed in foreign countries at the funerals of men who have borne a distinguished part in party warfare, when the opportunity is seized for promoting and glorifying political differences and political parties. We have nothing of the sort here. We are here engaged for a moment, pausing in the midst of our political strife, in placing a wreath on the bier of a champion who has fallen among us, and whom all on both sides are prepared to honour. If there were anything in this proposal that seemed to pledge the country or the House to any approval or any particular policy of Lord Beaconsfield, I can quite understand that there would be difficulties raised in many.

quarters to paying a tribute which might be misunderstood. That, however, is not the case. We are now doing honour to a man whose rare gifts we all admire, and which have been acknowledged by all who have had any opportunity of witnessing their display. We are doing honour to a man who never quailed before danger, who never allowed himself to be disheartened by defeat or discouraged by difficulty, but who always kept a high standard before him—whether it approved itself to all men or not I will not say—and who never under any difficulties or under any circumstances lost sight of or shrank from the standard he so displayed. He was one who, when he came to the post of dignity to which he had so fairly fought his way over the greatest obstacles and under the greatest discouragements, commanded the respect not only of the people of his own country, but the respect of those among whom he took his place as the Representative of Great Britain in the affairs of foreign countries. Sir, we have been reminded that the public honours which it was desired should be done to him at his funeral were exchanged for a funeral of a more private character that was in accordance not only with his written instructions, but with the whole spirit of his life. He was one who, above all things, rejoiced in that retirement of which he was allowed to enjoy so small a portion, and his heart was in the home and the sepulchre in which his body is now placed. But we know that although his funeral was private, and there was nothing in the nature of an invitation to the nation to attend it, yet all England was there, and that the hearts of the people, whatever may be their ranks or distinctions, were turned to Hughenden on that day. I venture to say that whether or not a monument is erected to him, either in this or any other place of public notoriety, the name and fame of him whom we have lost is secure in the memories of Englishmen and will never perish.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will give directions that a Monument be erected in the Collegiate Church of Saint Peter, Westminster, to the Memory of the late Right Hon. the Earl of Beaconsfield, with an Inscription expressive of the high sense entertained by the House of his rare and splendid gifts, and of his devoted labours in Parliament and in great Offices of State; and to assure Her Majesty that this House will make good the expenses attending the same."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. LABOUCHERE: Sir, the Prime Minister in bringing forward this Motion has sought to elicit the opinions of the Members of this House. Acting as the Leader of the House, and as the Chief Adviser of Her Majesty, the right hon. Gentleman has submitted this Resolution; and, at the same time, has stated the reasons and arguments in its favour with his usual ability. The right hon. Gentleman has recognized with regret the fact that the Resolution will not meet with general concurrence on this side of the House. I can fully understand that feeling of regret, because, unless a Resolution of this kind meets with what may be fairly called general concurrence on both sides of the House, perhaps it would be better that it should not be put. But the right hon. Gentleman is not only the Leader of this House—he is the Successor of the late Lord Beaconsfield in the high position which he held. He was, also, for a long time, the noble Earl's political antagonist. Whatever the right hon. Gentleman may think of the policy of his Predecessor, it is not surprising that on such an occasion as this he should allow generosity to outweigh all other considerations. Nor do I think that any of those who are opposed to the Resolution will think of complaining that the right hon. Gentleman has brought it forward. It is true that certain organs of the Press, which habitually misrepresent the opinions of the Prime Minister, complain that he has not done enough on the present occasion. On the other hand, there are many in this part of the House who consider that the right hon. Gentleman has done too much. This shows how difficult it is in a question like this to satisfy all. No one would demur for a moment to the terms which the right hon. Gentleman has used in speaking of his Predecessor, and still less to the words of affectionate memory in which the right hon. Gentleman opposite has alluded to one with whom he had so long been in personal and political alliance. We should all be ready to aid in perpetuating the memory of a statesman so distinguished as the late Lord Beaconsfield, if we could do so with a conscientious regard to our own duties. We admire the perseverance and energy which enabled Lord Beaconsfield to attain to the highest position in the State. We admire his tact and his urbanity as the Leader of a great Party; and we fully understand and even share in the regret which must be felt by his friends at the loss of one so distinguished amongst the distinguished. The Prime Minister has expressed a hope that this occasion will not be converted into one of political hostility. I hope the same. I can assure hon. Gentlemen opposite that I should be sorry to use one word which may offend the feelings of anyone in the House. But, when we are asked to vote a national memorial to the late Earl of Beaconsfield, we are obliged to pause, and not to allow ourselves to be carried away by impulsive sentiment, but to consider whether the monument is merited, not only by the personal qualities of the man, but by the qualities of the Minister. The Prime Minister has called our attention to precedents. I was much surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman say he had acted according to precedent in bringing forward this Motion, for I myself have been unable to find any precedents at all analogous to the course we are asked to take to-day. During the last 125 years there have been a vast number of Prime Ministers. Of these, only five have received this sort of recognition from the country. The first was the Earl of Chatham, and the monument was specifically stated to be erected on account of great and signal services. The words inscribed on the memorial in Westminster Abbey are—

“During his administration Divine Providence exalted Great Britain to a height of prosperity and glory unknown to any former age.”

Though there were many Members of the House at that time who acted in opposition to the Earl of Chatham, there was not one who did not agree that he had performed great and signal services. It was in consequence of this, and not that they absolutely concurred in everything that the noble Earl had done, that the Vote was unanimously agreed to by the House. The next Prime Minister to whom the honour was granted was Mr. Pitt. He died as Prime Minister of England. A proposal was brought forward of much the same character as the present one, and it was most strenuously opposed by Mr. Fox and Mr. Windham, statesmen who,

hon. Gentlemen opposite will, I think, agree, were not wanting in feelings of generosity to a political opponent. There were two grounds on which their opposition was based. They said that Mr. Pitt's policy had not been successful, and held that success was an essential element for every national reward; and, also, that the policy advocated by Mr. Pitt was not in accordance with the true interests of the nation. On that occasion, Mr. Fox declared that he could not, from a sense of public duty, be a party to the conferring of public honours upon a man who was the soul—certainly the chief supporter—of a system which he had always been taught to consider a bad one. The next instance is that of Mr. Percival; but the circumstances connected with the death of that Gentleman were of so peculiar a character that it is not necessary for me to do more than mention the case. Then comes Sir Robert Peel, whose case the Prime Minister specially selected as a precedent for the Motion. Sir Robert Peel had been the Leader of a great and important Party; but his financial views were not identical with those of many of his followers. When, therefore, a Motion like the present was proposed, those who had been his followers were naturally ready to vote for it; while those who had been opposed to him on his general policy were still prepared to acknowledge that in proposing the abolition of the Corn Laws he had done the country immense service. His monument recorded merely the date of his birth and his death, stating nothing which could be a subject of controversy. The next statesman was Lord Palmerston, who also died as Prime Minister. Shortly before his death a General Election took place, at which the country entirely concurred in his policy; and considering that circumstance, and considering also that he had a majority in the House, it was not surprising that the House should have unanimously concurred in the erection of a memorial to him. There have been other Prime Ministers to whom such honours have not been paid. I might name a great many; but I will only mention three—Mr. Canning, Lord Derby, and Earl Russell. Mr. Canning had a monument to his memory in Westminster Abbey; but it was not a public one—it was raised by the pious and respectful subscriptions of his friends and adherents. Lord Derby, the Chief of the very Party now sitting on the Opposition Benches, received on his death no national honours. Still later, the death of a statesman who had been the Leader of the Liberal Party for many years occurred—I refer to Earl Russell. That noble Earl, it is true, has a monument within these walls; but this, like Canning's, was subscribed for by his friends. I think, therefore, that if we go to precedents we should find no precedent which shows that a public monument has been voted to one who had been once Prime Minister, unless he had at the time of his death a majority in the House of his own supporters, or a majority of those who considered that he had performed great and signal public services. In the present case, the grounds for the monument are set forth in the Resolution itself. I think everyone will be prepared to concur in the Resolution so far as the correctness of the grounds are concerned; but where I and my hon. Friends part company with those who support the Resolution is in our belief that these grounds are not sufficient to justify a national monument. It is true that Lord Beaconsfield had "devotedly laboured in Parliament and in great Offices of State;" but so have many others, past and present, who have had no national memorial. I admit that Lord Beaconsfield possessed "rare and splendid gifts;" but rare and splendid gifts in themselves are a danger rather than an advantage to the State when the possessor of them does not use them for what is considered by the majority of his fellow-countrymen to be to the public advantage. The mere possession of great intellectual gifts is an advantage to the person possessing them; but we are obliged to look, not only to this, but to how they are employed, and also to the results of their employment. A statue is granted by a national Vote to a politician because his country is grateful to him; but, with all respect to hon. Gentlemen opposite, whose feelings I certainly do not wish to hurt, I do not consider that the country has reason to be grateful for anything that Lord Beaconsfield did. It is impossible, to my mind, to separate the man from the Minister—the statesman from the statesmanship. Especially is it impossible in the case of one who played so great a part in contemporary history as Lord Beaconsfield to suspend our judgment at will, and look on him simply as an amiable man of great genius, and not as a Minister. The monument we are asked to raise is a political one, and it is as a politician that Lord Beaconsfield's claims to it have to be judged. The deceased Minister's policy was a bold and clear policy, and I can well understand two different estimates being formed of it. I can perfectly well conceive that hon. Gentlemen opposite view it with admiration, and most conscientiously believe that Lord Beaconsfield was entitled to the gratitude of the nation for advocating such a policy. But I think also that my own and my hon. Friends' convictions should not be questioned. I wish to avoid all controversy on this occasion with respect to Lord Beaconsfield's policy, and on that subject we and hon. Gentlemen opposite may agree to disagree. The only tribunal that can ultimately and finally decide between us will be the tribunal of posterity. But it cannot be forgotten that little more than a year ago an appeal was made to the only existing tribunal, and that tribunal has emphatically decided against the policy of Lord Beaconsfield. During Lord Beaconsfield's tenure of Office, hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House had protested against his policy, not merely on the ground that it was unwise and impolitic, but on the ground that it was politically dishonest. Without carrying political hostility beyond the grave, it is surely not unreasonable of Liberals to maintain the same opinions to-day as they did yesterday. If we now were to express our approval of a policy which at the General Election we denounced, we should, in my opinion, be stultifying ourselves. We should be laying ourselves open to the charge either that we had indulged at the General Election in rhetorical exaggeration for the purpose of misleading public opinion, or that we are absolutely indifferent to the morality or immorality of a policy. I appeal to hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House whether we ought to make ourselves obnoxious to either of these alternatives. I do not deny Lord Beaconsfield's claims to a voluntary monument, and I acquit hon. Gentlemen opposite, of course, of being influenced in the matter by considerations of money.

Mr. Labouchere

The question is, whether the policy of Lord Beaconsfield should obtain, now that he is dead, that public recognition of soundness and morality which the country denied to it while he was alive? If, at the General Election, he had been returned with a triumphant majority, nothing would have been more reasonable than the present proposal; but the reverse being the case, it is impossible for those who denounced his policy when alive, to concur unanimously in a national apotheosis of it so soon as he is dead. I had put a Notice on the Paper to the effect that it was my intention to move the Previous Question; but as that would not have been, I believe, convenient to the course of the discussion—for it would have involved its consideration before the Prime Minister had spoken to the Resolution—I substitute for it a Motion which is tantamount to it, and that is that the Chairman leave the Chair. The division on that Motion will, I think, show that the proposal made by the Prime Minister has not the general assent of the House, and that being so, I would, after what has fallen from the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devonshire, submit to hon. Gentlemen opposite that they will do well to go into the Lobby in support of my Motion. At any rate, I hope that hon. Members will do so who sit upon the Liberal Benches, and who have over and over again protested against the policy of Lord Beaconsfield both in this House and in the country. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that the Chairman leave the Chair.

MR. CAINE seconded the Amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he thought that it was a thousand pities that the question had ever been brought before the House. The mischief which Lord Beaconsfield had done survived him, and he could not understand how the Prime Minister, who knew so much of the effects of that Nobleman's policy, could ask a House composed of Irishmen as well as Scotchmen and Englishmen to vote for the erection of a monument to that noble Lord's memory at the public expense. He was quite at a loss to imagine in what capacity they were to honour him. It certainly was not as a politician, for his policy was denounced as insane. It could not be as a literary man, for he was better known as a plagiarist of other men's speeches than for his own productions. After the death of another Prime Minister, Lord Beaconsfield had stooped to plagiarism in the eulogium which he pronounced upon him, having previously said of him that he had failed as a Prime Minister because he did not understand England. For his own part, he knew of nothing which Lord Beaconsfield had done to justify such a Motion as the present. With regard to Irish grievances, the noble Lord described the requirements of Ireland in graphic language many years ago; but when he was placed in the position of Prime Minister he never did anything to redress its grievances, and yet Irishmen were asked to vote public money for a monument to a man of that description, whose life was spent in antagonism to the interests of their country, and who had vilified all her public men. In his will he had left behind him a monument of his selfishness, for it showed that in death, as in life, his leading thought was a glorification of Benjamin Disraeli, and nothing else. Entertaining those views, he should cordially support the Amendment.

Question put.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON explained that he had accidentally gone into the wrong Lobby. Seeing the hon. Member for Mid Kent (Sir William Hart-Dyke) standing at the door of one of the Division Lobbies, he thought he was right in going into it.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the explanation would be noted in the Minutes.

MR. BIGGAR wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister one question. It was, whether or not, after the very decided expression of opinion of a large numerical minority, he thought it desirable that a Motion of that sort, which, if passed at all, should be passed with unanimity, should be persevered with?

MR. GLADSTONE: Under the circumstances, I have no hesitation in saying it is the intention of the Government to persevere with the proposal.

Main Question put.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will give directions that a Monument be erected in the Collegiate Church of Saint Peter, Westminster, to the Memory of the late Right Hon. the Earl of Beaconsfield, with an Inscription expressive of the high sense entertained by the House of his rare and splendid gifts, and of his devoted labours in Parliament and in great Offices of State; and to assure Her Majesty that this House will make good the expenses attending the same.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

[FIFTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [25th April], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, while willing to consider any just measure, founded upon sound principles, that will benefit tenants of land in Ireland, is of opinion that the leading provisions of the Land Law (Ireland) Bill are in the main economically unsound, unjust, and impolitic,"—(Lord Elcho.)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. ERRINGTON said, it was obvious that the stage of second reading was not the most convenient for discussing the full details of such a complicated measure as this. There were, however, principles underlying the measure which were novel in their application, and it was of the utmost consequence that they should be threshed out on the present occasion, that they should be defined, and their scope and limit carefully discussed and made clear to the mind of the public. It was no exaggeration to say that no measure had ever been laid before that House which had been fraught with more anxious and more momentous consequences both for the present and the future than that which was now under discussion. They had to consider, in the first place, the very grave and serious state of things which now existed in Ireland; and, secondly, how that state of things was to be dealt with. He did not think it too much to say that by this measure they were about to combat a revolution by means of a revolutionary measure; and he was perfectly convinced that if they were justified on the present occasion in accepting the homeopathic maxim of endeavouring to cure like by like, they must not lose sight of that other maxim as to the employment of those dangerous remedies, and take care that if not given in infinitesimal doses, yet it was given in a manner carefully weighed and perfectly understood. In the remarkable speech made by the Prime Minister when he introduced the Bill, he told them the greatest difficulty the Government had to contend against had arisen from wild discussions from Communistic schemes and appeals to public passion. They all knew to what he alluded, and they would agree with him that those dangers and difficulties were by no means over now that the Bill was introduced, and would not be over when it was actually passed. It was impossible for anyone who realized the position not to look with grave apprehension to what would happen when the Bill was passed. How was the Bill received as far as Ireland was concerned? In some cases with what he could only call hypocritical approval, and in others with the open and avowed declaration that it was not to be used as a measure of peace and tranquillity, but for the purposes of inciting in the future to more dangerous agitation than in the past. Everything was done to turn the good into evil, and the most dangerous way that could be done was by exciting in the minds of the credulous but honest population hopes and expectations which were quite impossible to be realized. It appeared to him that nothing was more cruel than exciting such hopes. It was necessary for them all to combine in order to defeat such tactics, and to make people understand that the measure was what he believed it would be—namely, a fair and honest measure, and that it would do all law could do to redress honest and fair grievances, but that it never could gratify the wild expectations so unfairly raised. Nothing could be further from his mind than the wish to minimize the effect of the Bill; but he thought it better that people should be disappointed before rather than after the Bill had become law. In this respect the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) deserved commendation, inasmuch as it placed clearly before the country the real scope and character of the measure. He preferred to accept the right hon. and learned Gentleman as the exponent of what was a wise and statesmanlike measure than certain more recent speakers. One of the most important points he had raised was the definition of fair rent; and he was glad that he had elicited from the Government in no doubtful terms that they admitted the same definition, and he was glad to hear that because it showed him that, after all, there was common ground on which they could all approach the subject—that common ground being the necessity, which was frankly admitted to exist in Ireland as well as in England and among landlords as well as among tenants, that some law must be passed in regard to land. He thought they ought all to combine to make that Bill what he trusted it would be, not a triumph for any Party nor for any class, but a Bill of fairness and justice to all classes of persons. There was one point in the speech of the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin to which he took exception, and that was in regard to the drafting of the Bill. He had said that the Bill was obscure; but it appeared to him (Mr. Errington) that the obscurity was not due so much to the Bill as it was to the subject; and if hon. Gentlemen found a difficulty in understanding the subject, how could they expect to very readily understand the Bill? The question of free sale had been discussed again and again; but it was of such importance, that he should like to repeat to the House two strong reasons in its favour which could not be repeated too often. Hitherto, one of the greatest misfortunes was the ignorance of English people with regard to Irish ideas. Complicated and illogical as "free sale" appeared to English minds, and as applied to English ideas, it was in thorough accordance with the whole spirit and genius of Irish institutions and conditions. Hitherto, English legislation for Ireland had neglected all consideration of Irish ideas; the result had been uniform failure and disappointment. He hailed with pleasure this new departure and this attempt to legislate for Ireland according to the spirit of Irish institutions. The second great argument in favour of free sale was that it was the only way of effectually stimulating the energy and industry of the tenant. It did this by securing him an interest the value of which varied to a great extent according to his own industry. Self-interest was the only motive they could rely on; but hitherto the self-interest of the Irish tenant had been enlisted on the wrong side; it was his interest not to improve, for improvements only suggested to him a rise of rent. Now, the benefit of every hour's extra energy and labour would be secured to him; but in order that this should be so it was necessary that "free sale" should be really and completely free, and this brought him to a very grave defect in the Bill. The Bill provided that in almost every case the landlord should have the right of pre-emption, necessarily accompanied by the provision that the price of the tenant-right should be fixed by the Court. This, he ventured to say, would seriously cripple the advantage of "free sale," for no Court could measure, nor could be believed to measure, accurately the results of tenants' general improvements. It must be remembered that the larger and more important improvements, such as building and draining, would be quite the exception. What he was desirous to stimulate were those general, impalpable, but very real improvements in the general condition of the farm arising from good management and manual industry. No Court could test these in the way a public sale would. He was aware that there were strong reasons for securing the right of pre-emption to the landlord. The Prime Minister told them that Ireland was not in a fit state for absolute freedom of contract, and, therefore, he proposed to interpose a period of change. He probably wished to leave open certain doors, of which this right of pre-emption was one, by which the country must some day return; but he earnestly begged the Prime Minister to weigh very carefully whether he was not paying too dear a price for it in so seriously interfering with the most beneficial effects of free sale. He hoped the landlords would not blindly defend that point. Let them consider—what he believed very few had—what real advantage it conferred on them. He ventured to say few landlords would avail themselves of it, and yet the effect would be just as injurious as if all did so. In its evil effects it would be very like the present right of capricious eviction; few landlords used it, but, as all might use it, its evil effects were nearly as great as if all did. Now, there was one very serious argument brought against free sale which he did not wish to pass over without a word. It was said that, owing to the competition for land, excessive prices would be paid for the tenant right, thus placing the incoming tenant under an extreme rack rent, so that we were in reality undoing with one hand what we were doing with the other. He admitted that in theory this argument was unanswerable; but he contended that when applied in practice the consequences would be totally different, as was often the case with theoretical arguments. In the first place, the Irish tenant did not, and never would, regard the interest of the money spent in purchasing tenant right in the same light as rent; he might be, and was, wrong economically, but this was the fact. He knew that the capital in the one case belonged to him, and would return to him when he pleased, and though this, as we knew, made no real difference, it did so in his mind. Then, again, it was contended that because tenants in Ireland would often promise impossible rents in order to enter on possession of a farm, therefore they would pay an exorbitant sum of ready money for the same purpose. But the difference was immense between the two cases. There was great difference between promising and paying down ready money; and in the long run a man who had money might be trusted to take care of it. But he fully admitted that it was most important not needlessly to stimulate an appetite for land, which the general tendency of this Bill would certainly not diminish; and this brought him to what he considered another grave flaw in the Bill, for there was nothing in the Bill to prevent a tenant raising money by mortgage on the tenant right. That, he feared, would be a great temptation to the incoming tenant to pay an exorbitant price and throw himself entirely into the hands of the usurer. The consequences would be disastrous, for the tenant from the first moment of entering his farm would have no interest in the tenant right, consequently, no inducement to improve. The other great advantage of tenant right would also be lost, for if the tenant failed, or left the farm from any cause, instead of going away with a good sum of money in his pocket to help him to set up elsewhere, the money would go to the usurer, and the tenant would leave, as at present, with misery and vengeance in his heart. He, therefore, hoped some provision would be introduced, making it illegal to recover any mortgage on the tenant right. He would make one exception, and allow a mortgage by testamentary disposition for the benefit of a widow or younger children. No doubt, the economical arguments against usury laws in general would be cited against him; but here, again, he appealed from theory to practice. He had a precedent in India, where, in conditions as nearly as possible identical with those of Ireland, these provisions were found necessary to protect the "ryot" from the money-lender. This might appear at first sight an unwelcome restriction to the Irish tenant, and people would, no doubt, be found to misrepresent and abuse him for speaking thus. But he felt he was acting for the true interest of the tenant farmer in endeavouring to save him from the clutches of the usurer, and if his advice was not taken the day would come when many a poor farmer would bitterly regret it. It was, however, objected that all that fine scheme of "free sale" and "fair rents" was built on robbery, or, as the fashionable expression was, "that they were carving an interest for the tenant out of the landlord's property." That was another instance of rash statement based on theory and without knowledge or consideration of practical matters. He contended that no tangible or material interest was transferred from the landlord. What the Bill did was to liberate a capital at present locked up and unavailable, and which was in abeyance between landlord and tenant. The landlord had the legal right; but in most cases he neither could nor would exercise it, and most landlords thought they ought not to do so. On the other hand, almost all authorities in Ireland, as well as in England, admitted that the equitable right vested in the tenant; but he, of course could not use it except on sufferance. It was, therefore, in its present condition useless to everyone, and it was certain that so long as things remained as they were the landlord would never use it. What they proposed in the Bill was to call that right out of abeyance in favour of the tenant, in whom vested the equitable right. If that was to be called confiscation, the whole thing was a childish argument about words. As the Bill was founded on "free sale," and as "free sale" depended on "fair rents," so "fair rents" depended on the "Court," and thus, in reality, on the Court, its character and efficiency, really turned in the last resort the operation of the measure. He quite agreed with the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), that there ought to be equal access to the Court for the landlord and the tenant. They had heard a great deal lately about prestige. Whatever hon. Members might think of prestige in the East, they would not deny that on the prestige of the Court in Ireland its success would greatly depend. As at present proposed, he feared its prospects of obtaining or deserving prestige were small. Almost all authorities agreed in condemning the employment of the County Courts as courts of first instance under the Bill. In the first place, uniformity of judgment was essential, and it would be impossible to obtain this from over 20 Judges, all of whom were already pledged to various views and opinions on most of the questions which would now come before them; and besides, it was notorious that, rightly or wrongly, these Courts would not command the confidence of the people. It, therefore, did appear to him that those who were to administer that new measure should come to its consideration with minds absolutely fresh and unbiassed by previous judgments. He ventured to submit the following scheme as worthy of consideration:—The Court to consist, as at present proposed, of three or four Commissioners, but with salaries higher than £2,000 a-year; he did not think £5,000 a-year too much to command men of the necessary standing and ability for these most arduous duties; they should besides be independent like other Judges, and be appointed during good behaviour, and not during pleasure. Instead of employing the County Courts, he would suggest to name in the Bill eight Assistant Commissioners—four to be experts in land matters and four to be barristers. They should be appointed for five years, because, whatever the amount of work thrown on the Court might be, it would be heaviest during the first years after the passing of the Act. Care should be taken, especially in the case of the four experts, to secure the very best men. As a practical illustration of what he meant by an expert in land matters, he mentioned the name of Professor Baldwin, a gentleman well known to many Members of the House, as the fittest person he could think of for these important duties. These Assistant Commissioners should go circuit two and two; but he proposed that, instead of deciding cases themselves, they should hear and report each case to the Commissioners at Dublin, and that the actual decision should emanate from there, and it would be without appeal except in cases where points of law were reserved; and in such cases, borrowing a provision from the Irish Church Act, he proposed that the Master of the Rolls or some other Judge should be called in to strengthen the legal element in the Court. The overwhelming importance of that portion of the Bill induced him to make that detailed proposal. They had now a tabula rasa on which they could inscribe what provisions they pleased; but it would be very difficult to make a change hereafter. There was another portion of the Bill which he could not pass over without a word—he meant the proposals for helping emigration, which had been used in some cases most dishonestly to excite unpopularity against the Bill. He yielded to none in his admiration for that love of country which was so noble a trait in the Irish character; but he felt indignant when he saw even these noble and sacred feelings trafficked and traded on for the sake of popularity. He did not wish to see one single Irishman who could live in reasonable comfort at home leave his own country, nor did he think that, taken on an average, the population of Ireland was at all too high; on the contrary, he looked forward to the time when, under conditions of increasing prosperity, a still larger population might be maintained in comfort; but at present it was notorious that in some districts if the people had their land for nothing they could not live. But what cared the agitators for that?—or for the fact that the thousands who now emigrated with the most precarious prospects would, under the provisions of the Bill, do so with every prospect of happiness and success? He would be ashamed, therefore, if fear of unpopularity prevented him from warmly supporting a proposal which promised happiness to thousands of his countrymen. But, after all, it was to the successful creation of a peasant proprietary that they must look for the pacification, and he hoped the ultimate regeneration of Ireland, and in connection with that he had one last suggestion to make. He had pointed out what difficulties that measure would have to contend against, and how important it was to secure the consent and approval of all honest men—the consensus bonorum omnium—against the combinations of agitators to defeat it. That could only be done by making the Bill a measure of justice to all classes. But it was notorious that a large section deeply interested regarded the measure with distrust. That feeling was not gratuitous nor thoughtless; and though, of course, he thoroughly disagreed with it, it could not be ignored nor summarily dismissed. It was entertained, after all, by many men second to none in their knowledge of the question and in their personal integrity. He appealed to the Prime Minister whether it was not worth while to purchase unanimity by conceding terms of compensation to the landlords, which, without cost to the public Treasury, might remove even the suggestion of bad faith? The Bill provided that sums of money—he hoped very large—were to be devoted to creating peasant proprietors; now, why should not this money kill two birds with one stone, and fulfil the simultaneous purpose of buying out such landlords as considered their interests injuriously affected? The way to effect this would be—first, to remove the restrictions imposed on the Commissioners as to the purchase of estates, especially that relating to the competent number of tenants ready to purchase their farms; and, secondly, to impose a strict limit on the price to be paid for estates by the Commissioners. If hon. Gentlemen would think this out, they would find that the result would be that for the most part the estates purchased would be those of discontented landlords, who would thus, as far as the money went, be got rid of. The limit he proposed as the price would be 20 years' purchase on a fair rent, which money should be paid in Three per Cent Stock at par. The Commissioners could then afford to sell the land to the tenants at the same fair rent to be paid for 31 years, after which time the land would be the property of the tenants. These figures were not new; but they were so remarkable as to deserve consideration. No such liberal terms to the tenant had ever been suggested. Taking a special case to see how the plan would work, they found that for every £100 of fair rent the landlord would receive £60 in Three per Cent Stock. The State borrowing the purchase money at 3 per cent, and charging the tenant fair rent—that was, 5 per cent—would be repaid capital and interest in 31 years; the tenant would then be owner. Or, supposing that, in consequence of bad years, or other exceptional cause, it was necessary to give a reduction of rent, this would only delay for a few years the final enfranchisement of the tenant. This system offered the tenants far better terms than they could get under any other system, and, on the other hand, offered an option to discontented landlords. No doubt, the price offered to the landlord was not a fancy price, but it was a fair price; and the landlord, by investing the price in other securities, might raise the income from £60 to £80 or £90; but even at £60 the offer was not unreasonable. He earnestly trusted his right hon. Friend would consider these suggestions, with a view of securing the co-operation of all classes in the success of this measure. The Prime Minister, no doubt, had brought it forward under circumstances of great advantage—those circumstances were his own great talents, and the overwhelming influence he wielded in the country—but its difficulties were also formidable, and arose not only from the inherent difficulty of the question, but from a most determined combination outside to defeat it. Of the character of that combination they had ample evidence. They had been told in public the Bill must be opposed, because, if carried, it would break up the Land League. All were bound to join in defeating that conspiracy against law and order, which virtually said—Perish honesty, perish honour, perish all the truest and best interests of the Irish tenant, perish religion, in order to keep up the mercenary agitation on which its own base existence depended. He, therefore, came forward to say what he believed was the opinion of the tenants of Ireland, that they welcomed this Bill with gratitude. This he was convinced many would say for themselves were it not for that wretched system of intimidation which made honest men afraid to avow their own honesty. On behalf of the honest men, he wished to say they regarded this Bill as a fair and good measure, worthy of the support of the Irish farmer. He was glad to see there were still persons in Ireland who had the courage to express their approval of the Bill, as had been done by the Catholic Bishops and the Presbyterian clergy. He hoped there would be a combination, not only to pass, but to make this Bill work successfully when carried; and if the Prime Minister succeeded by this great measure of justice in restoring confidence and tranquillity to his distracted country, it would rank not only among the greatest deeds of his political career, but among the greatest legislative achievements recorded in history.

Mr. DAWSON hoped to have been able to place before the House the opinions of his constituents without being obliged to enter into matters beneath the dignity or importance of this momentous question, but really could not overlook the remarks of the hon. Member who had just sat down. The hon. Member might believe that by the course he had taken he had won popularity in the House, and had obtained from the Prime Minister some assent to the extraordinary accusation he had made against that Party to whom must be ascribed the introduction of this Bill. He (Mr. Dawson) did not wish to shut out the merits due to the Prime Minister or to his Government for introducing a measure such as this, and he cordially allowed that it constituted a revolution with regard to the tenure of land in Ireland. He should therefore support, and should not oppose, the principles of the Bill. But while he went so far, he must entirely deny the allegation of the hon. Member who had just spoken that the agitation to which he referred encouraged wild schemes, and proceeded by trafficking on the credulity of the people. What were the objects of the Bill which was brought in, not by agitators nor by conspirators, but by the responsible Government of Her Majesty? Its first object was to render more fair and more just the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland; and, having done so much to promote the creation of an occupying proprietary, what were the objects of the National Land League? He had become a member of that organization lately; but, before doing so, and before taking the position of president of one of its most important branches in the City of Dublin, he asked what were the provisions to which he was asked to subscribe. In answer to his request, he received the card of the Land League, which he held in his hand, and in which were enumerated two distinct objects. The first was to put an end to rack-renting, eviction, and landlord oppression, which was the object of the Bill before the House. It was to put an end to rack-renting by means of a State tribunal; to put an end to eviction, which the Prime Minister called a sentence of death; and to put an end to the oppression which was the whole raison d'être of the measure. Would the hon. Member for Longford tell his constituents that two propositions so perfectly analogous, the one introduced by the Government and the other distinctly put forward by the Land League, were trafficking on the credulity of the people, and encouraging them to wild and impossible schemes? The second object of the Land League was to effect such a radical change in the land system of Ireland as would put it in the power of every Irish farmer to become the owner, on fair terms, of the land he tilled. What was the fifth part of the Bill? Why, it proposed to afford facilities to effect the very object of the Land League. If, therefore, the hon. Member for Longford reflected upon that fact, must he not confess that the whole of his oration, though it might win a certain popularity in that House, bristled with unfounded accusations against the very people who sent him there. Coming to the Bill itself, he must say, as he said already at Carlow, that he thanked the Government for the principles enunciated in it, which appeared to him to be a revolution in the right direction on this momentous question. However, on account of the details in which it abounded, he was not in a position to give it, in the present shape, that unlimited support which he hoped to be able to give it in its final passage through the House. One of the gravest charges against the Land League, and against an hon. Member of that House, who was now unable to occupy that place which he would adorn if he were present, was that they were accused of propounding extreme doctrines when they said that tenants in Ireland ought not to pay more than Griffith's valuation. In The Times newspaper of the previous day, he read an editorial article in which it was stated that the Bill would probably leave the rental of estates, which were about Griffith's valuation, unaltered; but it would reduce all other rents to that point. That was the pronouncement of The Times; but if anyone in Ireland attempted to propound such a doctrine he would at once be called a Communistic agitator. With regard to leases, he certainly understood, from the speech of the Prime Minister, that the Bill would have a retrospective effect. The right hon. Gentleman, in speaking of the harshness inflicted on those who were obliged to contract under pressure, said the Bill would establish a Court that could take cognizance of any lease whose provisions were not in accordance with the judicial lease. If the right hon. Gentleman did not mean to include existing leases, he certainly should have done so; because the whole reason of this great revolution and the burning interest which the question assumed was due to the loud and prolonged complaints of those who were suffering from injuries inflicted by leases with conditions such as he had described. With respect to arrears of rent which had accumulated because of the impossible conditions which the unfortunate tenants were forced to assume, he did not propose that they should be wiped out;

but if they were to be met, he certainly thought it should be on the same basis as the new rents fixed by the Courts. There was a clause in the Bill which appeared to him to bear a strong resemblance to the clause in the Act of 1870 which encouraged consolidation. The Bill declared that tenants with a valuation of £150 and upwards should have the power of contracting themselves out of the benefit of the Act. He entirely disapproved of any such provision, because it would be putting the landlord in a position in which he could say that a number of small tenants could cause him any amount of trouble and annoyance. But if he had large tenants whose valuations were over £150, he would be enabled to make arrangements with them which would render the provisions of the Act nugatory. He was afraid that the retention of the words "free sale" was calculated to create a wrong impression in certain cases where the right of pre-emption enabled certain farms to be sold without being put up to public competition. With respect to the local Courts, he did not think the provision of the Bill satisfactory. The judgments of the County Court Judges were marked by such diversity of opinion, and their demeanour in many cases was of such a character, as to deprive them of the confidence of the people. He did not approve of local assessors, because he was entirely against the importation of anything like local prejudice into the decision of cases of such importance. Witnesses would be examined, and a Judge previously unacquainted with the circumstances would be more likely to come to a just conclusion than any local person. He did not think the present County Court Judges possessed the confidence of the country. He had known cases where the Judge had said to applicants in the Courts—"You had better go to Mr. Gladstone or to the Land League." There certainly had been many instances in which the Courts had shown a strong animus in favour of the landlords. Such flippancy, when treating of a serious subject, betrayed a contempt, and the judgments themselves revealed an animus, which unfitted such men for holding the fate of the Irish tenant in their hands. Turning to the scheme for the reclamation of wastelands, he expressed sympathy with the object of the Government; but entirely dissented from the proposal to hand over the work of reclamation to Joint Stock Companies, whether English or Irish. The people of Ireland did not want English money or English patronage, but they did require justice. If they obtained that they would and could cultivate the land, firmly believing that there were ample resources for the sustenance of a much larger population than they had at present. He had been greatly startled by the devolution clauses of the Bill, because they tied down the people to one heir, and really perpetuated the Law of Primogeniture, to which it was understood such men as the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and other prominent Members of the Government were strongly opposed. It was an entirely retrograde policy. The Government having made two such mistakes as these, they proposed emigration, which, in reality, was the necessary outcome of their legislation. The waste land clauses would not allow the people of Ireland to become proprietors, to become happy and independent in their own country; and the devolution clauses would not allow them to have a chance of getting the land into their own hands. He had no sentimental objection to emigration; but held that the resources of the country ought to be developed to the utmost before recourse was had to it, and that it should not be thought necessary to promote it until there should exist an absolutely surplus population for whom sustenance at home would be a matter of impossibility. He had always endeavoured to promote the proper accommodation of the labouring classes; and he thought a clause might easily be inserted in the Bill stipulating that the agricultural tenant holdings should comply with all the sanitary conditions which made life comfortable and tolerable. He would also wish to introduce a provision that the rents of those tenements should be of such a nature that they should include in their weekly charge the purchase money of the cottages and plots of ground. The condition that tenants should pay one-fourth of the purchase money he could not approve. The Prime Minister allowed the Government securities which the tenant right gave the tenant to raise the other fourth; but, if so, why not the Government supply it, instead of forcing the tenant in many cases to raise it at high interest? He acknowledged willingly and frankly that the Bill contained good and sound principles. While, however, he said that, he could not help adding that if it passed in its present condition, it would not be a measure which would effect the object Her Majesty's Government had in view in promoting it. For his part, he would be happy to assist in any changes which would add to the usefulness of the Bill; and he believed that if the Government would consider favourably and support the Amendments which would be submitted by those with whom he acted, the Bill would become an effective measure, such as the Prime Minister promised to make it—one which would tend to promote the peace and prosperity of Ireland.

MR. BRODRICK said, there were few who would not regret that speeches similar to those made in the House that night had been addressed to their constituents by some Irish Members, for much of the difficulty which had arisen might have been avoided if responsible persons had not excited anticipations which could not be fulfilled, and led tenants to expect something which the Government could not give. One thing which struck him in listening to Irish Members was that they discussed the question without recognizing the truth that their facts and arguments were less applicable to the whole of Ireland than to the particular portions with which they happened to be connected. The fault of the present Bill was that it attempted similarly to apply an universal rule to the whole of Ireland. The difficulty thus involved in criticizing the measure was increased by the fact that there were certain parts of the Bill that were still shrouded in obscurity, because criticisms and questions had not been answered by the Government. That was particularly the case with regard to Clause 7, and the House had a right to expect that direct answers should be given to the questions that had been put. The Members of the Government seemed to differ in some respects as to the interpretation which they put upon the clause. The Attorney General for Ireland said the rent was to be found by taking away the price of the tenant right from the competition rent. If that were so, it was much to be regretted that it was not stated in the Bill. The Chief Secretary diverged very quickly from the question how the fair rent was to be found. Not the least important consideration was whether it was desirable that the fair rent should be based on a competition rent, which the Commission had decided was not generally exacted by landlords. The right hon. Gentleman quoted the opinion of the O'Connor Don, that rents must be less than the fair commercial letting value of the land; but he did not state that the O'Connor Don added that it would be contrary to justice and sound policy for the State to take away private rights without giving compensation. It was, therefore, unfair to represent the O'Connor Don as favouring a diminished rent without adding his proviso with regard to that compensation which the Bill did not give. He believed the Government preferred that a term so controversial as competition rent should not find a place in the Bill; but he should be much mistaken if, when the Bill came to be interpreted in a Court of Law, the present indefinite expressions were not superseded by that of competition rent, which alone would satisfy hon. Members on that side of the House. He hoped the next Member of the Government who spoke would clear up these difficulties, so that the remaining speeches might be addressed, not merely to the intentions of the Government, but to the actual facts of the case as they would appear when interpreted by legal authorities. The Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) dwelt more with the theoretical mistakes that would be made by the Bill than with the practical effect it would have on the people of Ireland. No invasion of the rights of property could, it must be admitted, be greater in theory than that which was involved in making freedom of contract almost a matter of the past. But still it would have been possible for a much shorter Bill to have taken a great deal more from the landlords, and to have given a great deal more to the tenants of that practical independence at which they were striving. And such a Bill would not, in practice, he hoped, be so terrible in its operation as the noble Lord anticipated. He had been much struck by the references made during the debate to the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Barnstaple (Viscount Lymington) in consequence of his connection with an estate in Wexford where the benefits of free sale were supposed to be such as to justify its extension to the whole of the country. Now, he had some acquaintance with that property, and he confessed he did not think the reference would commend the experiment which had been attempted on that property to the House. The great object they should have in view was to establish some permanent system by which the soil of Ireland would be improved both by the landlord and the tenant. Now, what were the facts of that case? The Nobleman in question had a property in Wexford from which he was reputed to draw £18,000 a-year; but he had never laid out on that property 1s.; he never resided on it, or in Ireland; to all intents and purposes he was an instance of an unmitigated absentee landlord, who drew a large profit from his estate, and did nothing for its improvement. Was that a system to be applauded or followed? He thought that the adoption of such a principle of estate management would be in direct opposition to the Land Act of 1870, and most injurious to the real interests of the soil. And yet this was the system which they were invited by the Government to establish in the parts of Ireland which were now free from it. Nor must it be forgotten that there were many tenants in Ireland, especially in the South, who would care wondrously little for legislative securities if in them were involved the loss of those traditional securities which existed in the confidence and good feeling of their landlord. It was all very well to say that the Bill conferred security of tenure for 15 years; but this, in the minds of many yearly tenants, meant, not the lengthening of a yearly tenancy, but the shortening of that perpetual tenure which had been enjoyed under good landlords. But it would be said that they could not ignore the proprietary right of the tenant, which had grown up under the Act of 1870. But this did not necessarily involve a system of dual ownership. The First Commissioner of Works had stated that in all parts of the Continent the tendency had been to establish the proprietary right of the tenant. There was one exception. In a part of Germany

100 years ago exactly the same difficulty now felt in Ireland had occurred. Heavy charges were laid on the tenant; there was great disaffection, poverty, and misery among the people; and the landlords had great difficulty in obtaining their rights. The Government of Germany addressed themselves to the difficulty in a manner not dissimilar to that adopted by right hon. Gentlemen opposite. They found there was undoubtedly some proprietary right in the tenant, which made his being placed absolutely at the mercy of the landlord a great cruelty and a hardship. The State therefore gave to the tenant a portion of the land, which was commensurate with his proprietary rights to enjoy it in fee-simple. The other portion of the estate was given to the landlord, compensation being granted from the National Exchequer for the amount to which his property had been depreciated by what had been transferred to the tenant. He hoped the English Government would act on a like principle of justice when they proposed to curtail the rights of the landlords. It was the misfortune of this Bill that it placed all classes of estates in Ireland on the same footing. It opened to every landlord in Ireland the possibility, if not probability, that every dissatisfied tenant would come upon him at the same moment on the passing of the Bill to demand the adjustment of his rent. For what inducements did they offer to the tenant not to take his landlord into Court? They enabled him to sell his tenant right, and when the new tenant came in the landlord was not one step nearer getting his rent than before. A new source of litigation was thus to be opened up. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) said if the Bill passed into law they would use the resources of the Land League for the purpose of enabling the tenant to make the most of it to bring the landlord to reason, and settle the whole land of Ireland on the basis of this Bill. But, apart from litigation, did the Bill effect its object? Under this Bill the position of the tenant was to be improved; but what effect would be produced where the present tenant had not paid for tenant right? A sum would be received for which nothing had been paid, and the present tenant would, undoubtedly, receive a substantial benefit; but, seeing that any reduction of rent would be more than counterbalanced by the payment for tenant right under the Bill, the incoming tenant would be out of pocket by the transaction. Side by side with the apparent prosperity of Ulster had grown up a system of indebtedness the extent and importance of which it was difficult to exaggerate. A gentleman managing 70,000 acres had said that the indebtedness of tenants in Ulster was so great that they paid more to the usurers than to the landlords. He had himself seen an advertisement of a wholesale stationer in Ulster, who said that at present he made up five times as many bill books for the entry of accounts as he had done before the Act of 1870 had passed. It might be concluded from that fact that since the number of the Ulster tenants had not increased, their indebtedness was now five times as great as before the Act of 1870. It had been argued by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), and echoed by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson), that the arrears of rent should be dealt with by the Bill. But the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk ought in logical sequence to have argued that it was not merely arrears due to the landlords, but also debts due to shopkeepers and others that should be dealt with. That would have been a measure of equality and justice which they should have expected from the Benches opposite. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk adduced the instance of the small farmers in France, whose arrears, he said, were forgiven by the landlords in bad years. Now, it seemed to him somewhat unjust that in Ireland, where tenant right was to be recognized and compensation given for improvements, landlords should be required to make allowances to tenants for arrears. When the hon. and learned Member spoke of the custom in France he spoke of it as a matter of statute law, whereas, in fact, it was a matter of free contract between the tenant and the landlord, and a French writer had recently stated that four-fifths of the tenancies in France had been contracted out of these conditions. It was obvious that in those contracts, which made the tenant a sort of partner with the landlord, both shared in the gains and the losses. But in the case of the landlord and tenant in Ireland, they were asked to recognize this in addition to the tenant right, which would be a gross injustice. The class of estates on which improvements had been made by the landlords was not sufficiently protected by the Bill, and ought to be separated from the class on which the tenants were the improvers. He felt very strongly that where a tenant had taken a piece of bog, for example, and reclaimed it by his own labour a great deal was due to him. But, on the other hand, he would ask the House to deal equally fairly with the landlords who had made improvements on their estates. The right hon. Gentleman opposite said that the Government had put in a most important provision to protect the landlord, for they allowed him to take something from the value of the tenant right to compensate him for his improvements; but could that compensate him for being saddled with a tenant who from land hunger paid far more for the tenant right than it was worth, who had no capital left to work the farm, and who impoverished the land, while the landlord was not able to do anything to prevent it? They were told the landlord could object to an incoming tenant on the ground of the insufficiency of his means. Now, he would ask the Attorney General for Ireland, who knew the country well, how was it possible for a landlord to know anything about the sufficiency of means of the tenant coming on his property? How could he know that a tenant in the South of Ireland had not borrowed the money from a bank in the North? Let it be required that the incoming tenant should prove the sufficiency of his means, not that the landlord should prove the insufficiency of the tenant's means, and that would be much fairer. Then, as to going into Court to prove that the character of the tenant was bad, that would only expose the landlord to an action at law. It must not be forgotten that a great number of landlords in the South of Ireland had spent large sums in order to keep out of their estates this custom of free sale, which the noble Lord the Member for Barnstaple (Viscount Lymington) said was so good a thing. But this was not all. They were going to subject a good landlord who had not asked for a rise of rent to a penalty to which a bad landlord was not exposed. If a landlord attempted to evade the rules and raised his rent, he might have an opportunity of buying back his land by exercising the right of pre-emption and paying the tenant a certain sum. But the good landlord, whose tenant had chosen to fortify himself by getting a judicial rent fixed, could not regain a single acre of his land for 15 years; he would have no power of touching it during that time, whether he wanted to turn a portion of his property into villas, town parks, or anything else. Let him point out to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who made on Friday night such a speech as he could wish the right hon. Gentleman would make on this Bill, that the landlord of property near a town could not improve it by the erection of factories or the creation of manufacturing agencies of any kind. The estate with which he was connected was some part of it town park; but it was quite possible that some portions of it not coming under this denomination might be improved in the way to which he had just alluded, and yet they were tying it up for 15 years. All the lawyers were agreed that it was impossible under the Bill for the landlord to resume possession of any part of his land that might be necessary for the development of the estate or for the encouragement of agriculture. In fact, he objected to the Bill on the broad ground that it deprived the landlord of the power of managing his own property. No doubt, the State had a right to destroy any class whose existence was generally detrimental; but if everything was to be taken away from the Irish landowners that made them a beneficial factor in Irish life, it was only fair to accompany that deprivation with a provision in the Bill which would emancipate them from a condition which would become intolerable, and give them an opportunity of utilizing their capital elsewhere. Then came the question of the estates on which the tenants had made their own improvements, and to whom the Bill was specially acceptable. Such improvements had, perhaps, been sufficiently dealt with by the Act of 1870; but, at any rate, the tenantry in many parts of Ireland had not yet expressed an opinion on the subject. The most cautious tenants were not represented in the House; they formed part of no caucus, and were not members of any branch of the Land League; they were men who desired not to sell, but to increase their holdings, and who would be compelled, at each small addition to their farms, to pay a considerable sum of money to the outgoing tenant. These men would certainly not receive any of the justice that would be meted out to the inferior class of tenants, and furnished one instance of the various interests for which a Procrustean rule was to be adopted by the Bill. One word as to the County Courts. An attack had been made on them by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson), and he could not regard them as wholly satisfactory tribunals in land questions; but the Judges were honest and reliable men, who might be trusted unless they were called upon to deal with matters of which they had no knowledge. Under the Bill they would be intrusted with many complicated and difficult questions, with which they were neither by previous training, nor by the aid they could call on, competent to deal. Another great objection to them was founded on the fact that their judgments naturally varied very much in different parts of the country, so that the suitors ceased to have much confidence in them. That had been pointed out by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) in reference to the Act of 1870. The hon. Member had said—

“One of the chief reasons for the failure of the Act of 1870 is the want of confidence in the County Courts. Many decisions are given adverse to the people, and when a favourable decision is given the amount due is eaten up by costs. To make these Courts the tribunal for fixing fair rents is one of the vital defects of the Bill.”

In his opinion, the Courts ought to be strengthened by the addition of professional valuers from Dublin, so that the work might be done efficiently, and the public might have confidence in the Courts. The landlords of Ireland, as a rule, were anxious to have the Land Question fairly dealt with; but he would put it to the Government whether the state of things which existed now was so different from that which existed in 1870, as to render necessary a complete remodelling of the law. It would be difficult to find anything in the history of the last ten years to justify a completely new departure in the system of land tenure. Rents had not generally been raised, evictions had been less numerous, prosperity had been, until the last two famine years, more general than before. And in the face of these facts they were asked to override the existing order of things by a Bill which was denounced by the landlords, unacceptable to the tenants, and which would prove to be subversive of all the social relations of the country.

MR. SUMMERS said, that in the few observations with which he should venture to trouble the House, he should endeavour to confine himself as strictly as possible to a consideration of one or two of the more important principles that were embodied in the earlier portion of the Bill. It was that part of the Bill that had been most vigorously, not to say vehemently, assailed, and against which, he presumed, at a later stage a determined opposition would be raised. Nor did it in any way surprise him that the principles of freesale and fair rents, to say nothing of fixity or security of tenure, should be an offence and a stumbling-block to many hon. Gentlemen opposite. So far as he was aware, those principles, though not entirely, were yet, to a very considerable extent, new to English law. Not that that, however, was in his view any objection to them. Indeed, so far from its being an objection to those principles that they were, to a large extent, new to English law, it appeared to him to be a positive recommendation in their favour, when it was recollected that it was not with England, but with Ireland, that they were at the present moment concerned. If they were to approach the question of the reform of the Land Laws of Ireland with any hope or prospect of arriving at a satisfactory solution of it, they must endeavour to approach it from an Irish point of view, and look at it in the light of Irish history in regard to those usages and customs which had gradually grown up and established themselves in the Sister Island. So far from seeking to maim and to cripple, to deface, and to deform those usages and those customs, it ought to be the first object of their legislation to give them new life, and force, and strength. Let them look, for example, at fair rents. Hon. Gentlemen opposite said why should it be necessary to have a Court to fix fair rents in Ireland when we were able to dispense with altogether the existence of such a Court in this country? The answer was not far to seek, and it was to be found in the different agricultural systems which prevailed in the two countries. The most characteristic and fundamental distinction between those systems was to be found in the simple but all important fact that, whereas in Ireland it was the tenant and not the landlord who for the most part made the improvements, the condition of things which generally prevailed in this country was precisely the reverse. That was a fact to which all the Commissions, from the Devon Commission down to the Bessborough Commission, bore undisputed testimony. It would not be necessary, therefore, for him to make more than a single quotation upon that head. It was taken from the Report of the Bessborough Commissioners, who wrote as follows:—

“As a fact, the removal of masses of rock and stone, which in some parts of Ireland incumber the soil, the drainage of the land, and the erection of buildings, including their own dwellings, have generally been effected by tenants' labour, unassisted, or only in some instances assisted, by advances from the landlord.”

No doubt, there were exceptions to that general rule; but the framers of the Bill now before the House had made ample provision for those exceptional cases, so that no fear need be entertained lest improving landlords should suffer any injustice when this Bill passed into law, as he trusted would shortly be the case. Springing from this all-important fact, that it was the tenant who for the most part made the improvements, they found there a widespread and well-recognized system of tenant right. They had the Ulster Custom, and customs analogous to it; and, where these did not exist, they had compensation for disturbance, recoverable in cases of capricious eviction under the disturbance clauses of the Land Act of 1870. In a word, they had a system of partnership, or quasi-partnership, in the land, and the tenant had an interest or property in his holding just as much as the landlord had. The tenant and the landlord were, in fact, joint proprietors of the soil. [“No, no!” and laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite might laugh; but that was the actual fact, whether they recognized it in law or not. Landlord and tenant were, he repeated, joint proprietors of the soil, and cases were by no means unknown or infrequent where the value of the tenant right exceeded the value of the fee-simple itself. The question, therefore, which came up for consideration was this—was it to be tolerated that the interest of the tenant should be at the mercy, at the mere will or caprice of the landlord? Was the landlord to be permitted, by the constant raising of rent or in any other way, to nibble at and gradually to eat away the value of the tenant right, or should not the object of their legislation rather be, as they endeavoured to secure the landlord in the enjoyment of his property, to secure the tenant also, who was the weaker partner of the two, in the enjoyment of his? Such, then, being the relations that subsisted in Ireland between landlords and tenants, and such being the uncertainty and insecurity attaching to the tenant's interest in his holding, it became, as he held, an absolute and imperative necessity that they should have some Court of Arbitration to make an award in case of dispute between the two contending parties, or, in other words, to determine and to decide what under all the circumstances of the case a fair rent would be, which a tenant might justly be called upon to pay to his landlord; or, to put the matter in a slightly altered form, where there were two persons, each of whom had an interest or property in the same thing, and those two persons were unable to agree between themselves as to the exact amount of interest which belonged to each, it followed as a natural and inevitable consequence, if the social machinery was to work without friction, if law and order was to prevail, that there should be some external and impartial authority to step in between the two disputants, and decide the issue in dispute. In a word, they must have a Court clothed with authority to decide upon and to fix what, under all the circumstances of the case, a fair rent would be. There was only one other question upon which, with the kind indulgence of the House, he should like to say a word or two. How, it might be asked, was the Court to decide so difficult and complicated a question as what a fair rent really was? The answer of the Government was to be found in the much-debated 3rd sub-section of Clause 7 of the Bill. The words of this sub-section were as follows:—

Mr. Summers

“A fair rent means such a rent as in the opinion of the Court, after hearing the parties and considering all the circumstances of the case, holding, and district, a solvent tenant would undertake to pay, one year with another: Provided that the Court, in fixing such rent, shall have regard to the tenant's interest;”

and the tenant's interest, they were farther told, was to be estimated with reference, first of all, to the Ulster tenant right custom, and, where no such custom existed, to the scale of compensation for disturbance provided by the Act. Now, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), in the course of the eloquent and ingenious speech with which he opened this debate, found very great fault with this portion of the Bill; and he appeared to him (Mr. Summers) to argue that the Court, in fixing what was a fair rent, ought to pay no regard whatever to the tenant's interest in his holding. If he had rightly apprehended the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, he must say that the proposition which he sought to lay down was, in his humble judgment, monstrously unjust to the tenant. An in-coming tenant bought from an outgoing tenant his tenant right. He paid for it, and it was his. Why was he to be called upon to pay for it a second time, in the shape of an addition to his rent to the landlord. He paid rent not for the tenant right, which was his property, but for the use of the fee-simple, which was the landlord's property; and it followed, therefore, as a natural consequence, and, he would say, as a matter of course and common sense, that in fixing a fair rent the Court ought to take into special consideration the extent to which the tenant had an interest in the land. He had now said what little he desired to say with regard to the principle of fair rents. The principles of fixity of tenure and free sale followed as a logical consequence from the principle of fair rents, as was very ably shown by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law). He (Mr. Summers) did not intend to repeat the masterly argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, nor should he touch upon the remaining parts of the Bill, such as that which had for its object the establishment of a peasant proprietary in Ireland, except to say that, broadly and generally speaking, they had his hearty approval and support. In conclusion, he should simply content himself with saying that he trusted the Bill would speedily pass into law, and that it would accomplish the purposes—the beneficent purposes—which it was intended by its authors to serve. Might it give security to Irish industry, might it remove the well-founded grievances of the Irish tenantry, might it atone in some degree for our past misgovernment of Ireland, and help to make her a source of strength instead of weakness to the Empire.

SIR JOHN HOLKER said, that as he considered the questions involved in this measure were of overwhelming importance, he was reluctant to content himself with giving a silent vote. He did not rise in the expectation of being able to convince any hon. Gentleman opposite, because he feared that the conclusions at which they had arrived were foregone conclusions. He rose for the purpose of explaining to his constituents, and to others who might be interested in the course he adopted in Parliament, the views he entertained on this question and his reasons for the vote he was about to give. In dealing with the question presented for the consideration of the House, it was all important at the very outset to have an accurate appreciation of the designs which the Government intended to accomplish by the passing of this Bill. He presumed that, in the first place, it was the object of the Government to ameliorate the condition of the very poor among the population in Ireland, and to drive from their doors the distress and misery which very often threatened and frequently overwhelmed them. He presumed, in the second place, it was the object of the Government to diminish if they could, and, indeed, altogether to allay and remove the irritation and discontent which had for some time, unhappily, existed throughout a very great part of Ireland. No doubt, great evils arose from the excessive poverty of the tenants in some districts in Ireland. We might, he thought, without much trouble ascertain the causes of the great poverty which undoubtedly prevailed. The Irish peasant was a man of intelligence, and, according to many, he was thrifty and industrious. Whether, as a rule, he deserved that description he (Sir John Holker) would not pause to consider; but certainly the Irish peasant was capable of enduring an appalling amount of privation. The poor Irish peasant would endure cheerfully a state of things which the inhabitants of more favoured countries would consider intolerable. But there was a limit to the powers of flesh and blood, and, unfortunately, he was in such a position that he was liable almost at any time to be deprived of the necessaries of life; for in many parts of Ireland, especially in the West and the South, the population was greater than the industries of those districts could maintain. The result was that the people were often unable to obtain any employment at all. In bad seasons the occupiers of a few acres of land found it impossible to make both ends meet, a problem which at the best of times he found very difficult. In two or three such seasons these people were driven almost to desperation. Then, in consequence of the competition which had been created by the system of Free Trade, the Irish farmer, like his English brother, had been forced out of the grain market by foreign competition, a great quantity of arable land had been converted into pasture, and the result had been that the demand for labour had greatly decreased. On the other hand, as was always the case in a poor country, the population increased by gigantic strides. Thus, year by year, the demand for labour decreased and the population increased. Thus a state of things was in process of being realized—he thought, in fact, it had been realized—with which any Government would be bound to deal. We found ourselves face to face with an enormous difficulty, which must be dealt with in some way or other, no matter what sacrifices had to be made. So far as the provisions of the Bill tended to diminish these evils, he, for one, heartily approved it. It might be—it had been argued—that some of the provisions of the Bill which tried to cope with the evils to which he had referred did not altogether square with economic laws. He cared very little for that. He thought these difficulties had been forced upon the country by a stern and cruel necessity—by an overwhelming necessity. If such a necessity existed economic laws must give way. He did not altogether agree with the argument; but he would look into the provisions of the Bill. He had no doubt that much might be done by encouraging emigration, but it must be free and voluntary; and facilities should be given for emigration. Much, too, might be done by immigration and migration to other parts of the country and of the United Kingdom. There were no provisions of that kind in the Bill; but it would be easy to introduce them. The expenses ought to be borne by the National Exchequer. Then, too, there was the reclamation of tracts of land and the execution of public works, which would create a demand for remunerative labour, which would be a great advantage to the people and lead to ultimate prosperity. He thought a better time would come, especially if the Government by wise and politic laws secured life and property, and thus re-established confidence in the country. No Bill would do that which ignored or disregarded the rights of life or property. In addition to those portions of the Bill to which he had alluded, it was possible that something might be done for the benefit of the poor by creating a peasant proprietary. He confessed he had no great confidence in the possibility of permanently establishing a peasant proprietary, for the simple reason that, owing to the character of the Irish peasant—to his virtues, which were many, and to his vices, which were few—in the course of a few years 90 per cent of the owners of such holdings would have disposed of them altogether. ["No!"] He did not expect hon. Members opposite to agree with him; but that was his view. He thought such a scheme would be a failure. He freely owned that in many countries of Europe such a system had been apparently successful. At all events, he thought the plan ought to be tried slowly and tentatively. But if the Government attempted such a scheme in order to get rid of poverty, it ought to be carried out at the expense of the National Exchequer, and not at that of any particular class of the community. On what principle, he would ask, was it sought to carry out such an experiment at the expense of the landlord? He should have thought that if the Government really wanted to benefit the very poor classes in Ireland, they would, instead of endeavouring to create a peasant proprietary at the expense of the landlord, have tried to establish what he might call a State tenantry. The great difficulty in the way of establishing a peasant proprietary was that it was impossible to get the peasants who were vested with portions of land to continue to hold it. But what grave objections, he would like to know, would there be to the State acquiring from the landlord by fair purchase tracts of land, dividing them into small holdings, and letting those holdings on lease to tenants who might desire to take them? Then the tenant could not get rid of his holding. The State might let the holding for 20 or 30 years, or any other term that might be thought advisable, giving the tenant that fixity of tenure which was thought right and proper; and when he had obtained that fixity which would make it worth his while to improve his holding, he might be made subject to any stipulations which the State might think it proper to impose. It might provide for the assignment of his interest; he might get the value of any improvements which he might make; and the State, or an authority constituted by the State, might enable landlords and tenants to enter into reasonable agreements, and to do that which a reasonable and prudent landlord would do when dealing with a reasonable and prudent tenant. If some such provision as that were inserted in the Bill, it might be made so far, in his opinion, a very useful measure, and have the effect of mitigating, if not entirely removing, the great evil existing in Ireland—the excessive poverty of the peasant population. But while, after the most careful and candid consideration, and with no partizan feeling in his mind, he regarded the provisions contained in Part 5 of the Bill as good, useful, and politic, he could not, he regretted to say, make the same observation with regard to the other provisions of the measure. He now came to that part of the Bill which proposed to introduce into the law of landlord and tenant in Ireland a most complete, sweeping, and extraordinary change. That portion of the Bill was complicated and perplexing in the extreme. It was complicated and perplexing owing to the very nature of the subject with which the framers of the measure had to deal; but it had been made still more complicated and perplexing by the system of drafting which had been adopted, and which seemed as if the designed introduction of obscurity had been contemplated. He did not wish to enter into any minute criticism of the clauses of the Bill, because it was obvious that if they were not framed as lucidly as they might be, the defects might be remedied in Committee. He would therefore deal with the principles of the Bill, and allow for the moment all criticism on the phraseology of the clauses to pass. It would not, he thought, be very difficult, notwithstanding the obscurity of some of the provisions of the Bill, to state in a few sentences what were the alterations in the law of landlord and tenant which the Government proposed to accomplish. There were a good many points on which he might dwell; but he would content himself with dealing with two or three of those which appeared to him to be the most prominent. The first object of the framers of the Bill to which he would refer was that which was sought to be carried by the 1st clause, and that object was to alter the law at present in existence in all parts of Ireland not subject to the Ulster Custom, and to give every holder of land to whose tenancy the Bill applied the absolute right of free sale. He hoped hon. Members who had read the clause to which he was referring had endeavoured to understand it, though he must confess he had some doubts as to the success of any such attempt. ["Hear, hear!"] He was aware that the Prime Minister, who had done him the honour to cheer that observation—he was not sure whether ironically or not—had a great affection for that part of the Bill, which, however, appeared to him to introduce into the law a most alarming provision; for in what did the interest which the tenant was to sell consist? Did the clause give the slightest information on that point? Not at all; all was left in darkness. The tenant might be a tenant at will, and the clause would apply to him unless there was something to show that it was intended it should not apply. He might be a holder of land for a year certain, and he might be a tenant from year to year, and the clause would apply; and the Bill said, or rather the Court to be constituted under it might come to the conclusion, that not only had he a tenancy from year to year, but something more which he got from tradition or sentiment. Was it wise, he would ask, to deal with the subject in that way? If tradition and sentiment gave him more than a tenancy from year to year, how much was to be due to tradition and how much to sentiment? Was the question of sentiment to be decided by the County Court Judge? If so, one County Court Judge might respect sentiment, while another would decline to do so. The fact was that, so far as the clause was concerned, all was vague, uncertain, and so much involved in doubt, that it was impossible for the lucidity, even of the Prime Minister, to give any adequate explanation. But the clause applied to every tenant to whom the Bill related, no matter under what circumstances he might have acquired his holding, be it 50, or 60, or 100 years ago, although his rent might never have been raised, and even although he might have only so recently as two years ago been let into the holding on the distinct understanding that he was not to sell it or his interest in it, in consideration of his having to pay only a very moderate rent. Notwithstanding any such agreement, a man so situated might, after the Bill passed, break through his bargain and get what money he could for his farm. It was obvious that such a provision gave a great bonus to a man to live under a reasonable and moderate landlord, and put at a disadvantage the man who had not that good fortune—that was to say, a man who held his land under a grasping landlord would get nothing for his tenancy, whereas if he lived under a good landlord he would be able to sell his tenancy advantageously. Was that state of things, he would ask, either reasonable or just? Perhaps, however, they were not to look for any elements of justice in the Bill. As he read the Bill, every tenant for a year certain, or every tenant from year to year, not to say every tenant at will, would have it in his power, in spite of the landlord, to turn his tenancy into a 15 years' lease, and, at the same time, retain the privilege of selling his interest and determining his tenancy whenever he chose. He could give notice to quit at any time—there was no provision against it—his rent was to be fixed not by agreement with the landlord, but by a tribunal, and if turned out he was to be compensated heavily. If he had given a true description of anything like the alterations which were intended to be effected by this Bill, he would ask every man of fair and reasonable mind whether it was not a measure of the grossest confiscation and spoliation, seeing that there was not the slightest equivalent or compensation offered to the landlord for the enormous sacrifices he was called upon to make. The Bill, it seemed to him, would work an alarming, nay, an appalling, infringement of the rights of property. He would be reminded, perhaps, that it referred to Ireland. Whenever they dealt legislatively with Ireland they became involved in a haze, or a fog, or a bog, or something which obscured their vision entirely. Ireland had this peculiarity about it, that no reason or common sense applied to it at all. What would be said if such a Bill next year were applied to Scotland or England? They would be astonished, indignant, and alarmed. Unfortunately, they would be also powerless, because they might depend upon it, if these provisions were granted to Ireland in response to popular clamour, they would have to be granted to Scotland and England too, if the people clamoured for them, as clamour they soon would. And if these provisions were to be sanctioned in respect to land, why not in respect to other species of property? Why not in respect to houses, manufactures, merchandize, or wages in Ireland? Once they got rid of the silly idea of freedom of contract, where were they to stop? The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Errington) said they were using a revolution to stop a revolution; but he (Sir John Holker) entirely objected to a revolution of this sort. It was freely admitted by responsible journals and speakers that the carrying out of the intentions of the Government would involve a flagrant violation of economic laws. Now, economic laws might require to yield in the face of an overwhelming and overmastering necessity; but no such necessity, it seemed to him, existed in Ireland. Turning to the clause relating to the fixing of fair rent, he felt bound to say that it seemed to justify his remark that the Bill was not only obscurely drawn, but that it was drawn with designed and contemplated obscurity. The clause, if put forth in its naked deformity, would appal the people of this country; but the ingenious drafter of it had so framed it that no one reading it could understand what it meant. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson) did not know what it meant, and apparently the Attorney General for Ireland, who answered him, did not know what it meant; and when the Chief Secretary for Ireland attempted to explain it nobody in the world could tell what he meant. It was by no means certain that the construction intended by the Government was the right one. A County Court Judge reading the clause would naturally assume that a tenant who received so many advantages would give so much the more for them; but that was not the view of the Government. He supposed the clause meant this—that in fixing a rent they were not to take into consideration anything the tenant had already—they were not to make the tenant pay for what was his own property already. They were to consider what rent a solvent tenant would pay, &c., at the same time having regard—there was no phrase so vague as “having regard”—to the tenant’s interest in the holding. The tenant’s interest was to be estimated with reference to various considerations. First, with reference to Ulster tenant right, where that existed. That was not unreasonable. It would certainly be unjust to make the tenant pay for his own property. But what followed? In sub-section B regard was to be had, in cases where Ulster tenant right did not exist, to the scale of compensation for disturbance provided—except so far as any circumstances shown in evidence might justify a departure therefrom—and to the right, if any, to compensation for improvements effected by the tenant or his predecessor in title. Now, he had no objection to taking into account, in the fixing of the rent, the improvements the tenant had made—a tenant, indeed, ought not to be charged rent for the improvements he had made; but why in the world should they make a deduction from the rent for the compensation for disturbance which the tenant might receive? What was the compensation for disturbance? It was defined in Clause 5 to be where the rent was under £30, a sum not exceeding seven years’ rent; where the rent was under £50, a sum not exceeding five years’ rent; where the rent was under £100, a sum not exceeding four years’ rent; and where the rent was £100 or upwards, a sum not exceeding three years’ rent. What was the unhappy County Court Judge to do in this? Could he avoid bringing into his calculation the maximum compensation for disturbance? If he fixed the maximum compensation for disturbance, what justice was there in allowing a tenant the maximum compensation for disturbance in cases where he was never disturbed at all, where he himself had resorted to the tribunal? He repeated, not only was the section obscure, but it was designedly obscure; and if they got rid of its obscurity they would find that it was monstrously and flagrantly unjust. He asked, how could they justify this interference with the rights of property, this total destruction of the freedom of contract between landlord and tenant? Nothing could justify it but an overwhelming over-mastering necessity. And where was this necessity—where were the benefits this Bill would confer? Was this Bill likely to increase the livelihood of the poorest of the people in Ireland? Of course, to a certain extent, by diminishing the rent where it was unfair there would be remissions; but would these remissions be likely to any great extent to increase the livelihood of the very poor in Ireland? He should say not. It was perfectly obvious they might decrease the rent; but when a bad time came it was not a question of rent, but of living with the tenant. In a bad time he could not live if he had the land for nothing. The provisions of the Bill, if carried into law, would, it was said, prevent the imposition of exorbitant rents. Instead of that, he contended the effect would be perfectly contrary, for this reason—the hunger and greed for land, which was one of the curses or misfortunes of Ireland, would not be diminished. There would be as many competitors for a bit of land as before, and the landlord would say, if he let that bit of land, what would be the result? He could never raise the rent unless he ran the risk of creating a statutory tenancy of 15 years to recoup himself. Would this relieve the labourer? Very little was said about the labourer in this Bill. Had he been omitted because he had no vote? He hoped not. The labourer depended greatly upon the prosperity of the landowner. But if they crippled the resources of the landowner and prevented him improving his land, how could the labourer prosper? This Bill would obviously and seriously discourage the expenditure of capital in Ireland. What remained? Could any man show any advantage from these alterations in the law of landlord and tenant in Ireland? Was it not obvious that the alterations of the law proposed were solely and simply for the purpose of satisfying the clamour of the Land Leaguers and that portion of the population of Ireland which the Land Leaguers had contrived to render discontented and disloyal? Would the House approve of these violent alterations in the law of landlord and tenant for the purpose of satisfying a small portion of the population of Ireland which was at present discontented? It was an endeavour which, if they made it, would never be successful, for they would never satisfy the discontented portion of the population by this measure or any other. And for the purpose of trying to do that which they could not do, were they to inflict a grievous wrong, an irreparable injury, upon the landlords of Ireland, who had always shown themselves, he thought, the most intelligent, certainly the most loyal and useful subjects of Her Majesty in that country? And were they, for the sake of doing this, to put a stop practically to the prosperity of Ireland? He hoped not, and he, for one, would certainly vote against the Bill unless those portions of it which related to alterations of the law of landlord and tenant were omitted. He would vote for it if those alterations were omitted. [A laugh.] The hon. Gentleman laughed. He thought his proposal was a reasonable one. He would vote against the Bill if the alterations which he suggested were not made, because he thought it was a bad, unwise, and impolitic measure, a measure which was totally unnecessary. He should vote against it because he was a Conservative. The principles of the Party to which he belonged demanded that he should vote against any measure that introduced an unnecessary infringement of the law of the rights of property, and especially which introduced an unnecessary infringement of the law of property for the purpose of truckling to a discontented portion of the people of Ireland.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: Sir, notwithstanding the somewhat strong assault which the hon. and learned Gentleman has made upon this Bill—strong in incently built a new house. He said, "Bought the land? He could not have bought it. It belongs to Lord somebody, who has property in the neighbourhood." He continued—"I have been in Ireland all my life, and I know as much, perhaps, about land there as anybody, and I have known of a great estate being sold in Ireland; but I have not known of the sale of a farm or of a fee. Such a thing is scarcely known in the whole country." He mentioned two baronies in the county of Wexford, and he said that the owner of an estate had died; that he left daughters only. In the case of daughters the Law of Primogeniture does not apply, and the consequence was that it was thought advantageous to the daughters that the estate should be sold, and some sensible person suggested that the farms should be offered to the tenants. The result in that case, the only case he knew of in his experience, was that the estate was divided and offered to the tenants, and many of the tenants purchased their farms. I afterwards went down to the county of Wexford with a friend with whom I was staying in Dublin, and who was also well acquainted with Irish affairs, and we visited those two particular baronies. We enlisted the services of an intelligent priest, who went with us to call on several of the tenants, and we called on one of them—a fine old man named Stafford, who was sitting in a very comfortable arm-chair, in a very comfortable room, in a very solid and well-built house. In conversation we asked Mr. Stafford how he, living on that farm, had so much better a house over his head than we had seen in connection with any farm since we had left Dublin. He said that the estate was sold, the farm was offered to him, and he bought it; he then, not being liable to be disturbed, and not in any danger of having his rent raised, did not like to continue to live in a poor house, and, therefore, he built this good solid stone house. I said—"Mr. Stafford, if the great bulk of the commoners of Ireland were in your condition, would not be disturbed, and could not have their rent raised, and were owners of the farms, what would be the result?" He almost sprang out of his chair. Although an old man, he was struck with a momentary enthusiasm; and, lifting his arm, he said—"Sir, we would take hunger out of Ireland." I think that anecdote contains very much the whole story of Irish poverty and Irish suffering. What we want to do and attempt to do partly by this Bill is to drive famine, and poverty, and suffering, and discontent from Ireland, and I believe that can only be done by measures such as this, which will give to the tenantry of Ireland that which Mr. Stafford possessed—the security of their holdings and security from needless and unjust increases of rent. Now, we have in the past history of Ireland these things—on the one side, repeated confiscations, penal laws, Acts in restraint of the Constitution, Coercion Acts in many and hateful forms; and we have recently had an unhappy acquaintance with them. On the other side, we have suffering, discontent, and crime, and I am sorry to say in some cases crime such as the records of savages, if savages have records, can hardly excel for wickedness and cruelty. All these are things which ought to shock Members of the Legislature and draw them with irresistible impulse to find some mode of changing the condition of the people and changing the history of Ireland, which, during our own time, has not been creditable to the Government of the country. At this moment I think one thing will be admitted—that Great Britain desires and is anxious to be just to Ireland and generous. I believe if the people of Britain were appealed to in any form you like, on any given Bill which they thought or could be persuaded would be likely to change the condition of Ireland—I believe the overwhelming majority of all classes would be in favour of it. If that be so, I venture to say that the Members of the Government sitting on this Bench, and on another Bench in "another place," are as anxious as men can be to deal with Ireland in that spirit, which I have just now said is the spirit and desire of the people of Great Britain. But, notwithstanding all this, it must be admitted, though the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Preston (Sir John Holker) does not appear to be conscious of it, for he says there is only a very small number of people in Ireland anxious for change and discontented, and that they are acted upon by a handful of agitators who do a great deal of mischief. I am not going to defend the agitators against whom he is disposed to complain; but I am ready to deny that it is a small class of the people of Ireland who are anxious that some change should take place with regard to the law affecting the tenure of land. At this moment Ireland is still disturbed, I am afraid, almost from its centre to its circumference, and it appeals to the Imperial Parliament with a voice as loud and united as it ever has done before, and asks, if possible, that some remedy should be applied to their case. What I have said up to this part of my observations I have said to convince the House of what I am myself deeply convinced, that this is a great and solemn question which is brought before us. It is for the House to rise to it. We cannot rest as we are. We must either go forward, as we proposed to go forward, or we must go backward, as probably the hon. and learned Gentleman would recommend, if, as I understand, he has no sympathy with the legislation to which Parliament agreed in 1870. But I say you cannot go back. If you do not go forward you must govern Ireland with constabulary and a great army quartered in that country; and you will be driven by-and-by to suspend trial by jury, to put an end to the freedom of the Press, and to suppress public feeling. All these are in the career which the hon. and learned Member for Preston asks the House to follow him in. I am against all that. I believe we must go on in the direction we are now endeavouring to pursue. Therefore, I would ask, is there any Member of this House, except the hon. and learned Member, who thinks there is no necessity for any present legislation? He made an exception which I accept. He thought a certain number of tenants should become owners of their farms. But, except that—I am not sure that he did not wish some emigration—he seemed to be against everything that this Bill proposes. Now, what is it that is asked for and what is needed? The Irish farmers do not ask for a great system of confiscation to balance the confiscation of ancient times. Let us for a moment forget certain violent and unreasoning, and I think very mistaken and evil things, that have been said by some of these agitators, and by some whom we are accustomed to see opposite us in this House. Let us forget that, and I say the Irish tenant farmers up to a recent date have been as punctual in the payment of rent—in the discharge of the duty they had contracted to perform—as the tenants in any country in the world. They have not become at once demoralized and an unfaithful class of men. Therefore, I am at liberty to say, and say it positively, that the Irish tenants do not ask for compensation to balance confiscation of past times. But they ask for a law that will give them adequate security with a fair and adequate rent to the owner. If you had for an audience the tenant farmers from Ireland, as we all see in travelling, at the stations and fairs and so forth, and put it to them—“Are you willing to give an adequate rent to the owner on condition that you shall gain adequate security?” I believe you would get only one answer. They asked for that and no more, and I do not believe they will be content with less. With regard to fair rents—on which the hon. and learned Gentleman has been almost as confusing as the clause he condemns—there is something more to be said. With regard to the question of fair rent, I did not rise at all for the purpose of going into what I may call the legal part of the clauses of the Bill. Any Member of this House who heard the remarkable speech of my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland must have felt that whatever there was of difficulty in the proposals of the Bill, with scarcely any exception, he fairly met and explained. I looked at the countenance of the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) as the speech went on; he will admit that it was a remarkable speech, and a fair and great defence of the clauses of the Bill. I should therefore feel that I was wasting the time of the House if I were to go into the minute details of the clauses. I remember that we are discussing the second reading of the Bill, and we are not in Committee. It is well we have these discussions on second readings, and that these explanatory speeches have been made; for when we go into Committee, and have to deal with the clauses one after another, we shall find ourselves far more competent to discuss the Bill than we otherwise should have been. With regard to the question of fair rent, a good speech was made by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Brodrick) from his view of the case. It was delivered in a manner and with a temper which will recommend him very much to the House again if he should think it necessary to discuss the question further. He pointed out what would happen; he said that the day after the Bill passed 400,000 or 500,000 tenants would have the power of immediately bringing their landlords before the Court. Well, everybody you meet in the street has the power of bringing you before the magistrate. My view of the operation of that particular clause is that, in reality, the rents in Ireland will, for the most part, in nine cases out of ten, be fixed very much as they are now. It does not follow that there will be no difference in rents; increases which are harsh and unjust will no longer take place. The effect of this law will be to change the position of the contracting parties; it will improve the position of both. The tenant will now have a tribunal to which he can have recourse if necessary. The landlord will know the tenant will not rest satisfied with any unreasonable rent the agent proposes; at any rate, the tenant will have the opportunity, if he chooses, of calling in the judicial arbitrator to decide between them; and the effect of that tribunal being established by law will be that the minds of both landlords and tenants will be affected by it. It will be the interest of neither of them to go to the Court, and I believe they will almost universally, without going to the Court, make agreements with which reasonable landlords and tenants alike will be perfectly contented. That, at all events, is my view of it. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir John Holker) was serious about fixity of tenure. I am only surprised he should be so alarmed about these changes, because, for the most part, they are recommended by both the Commissions of Inquiry. I was astonished that the hon. and learned Gentleman spoke so strongly upon questions about which he could not be so well informed as the two Commissions. With regard to security, the purpose of the Bill is to give, not perpetual fixity of tenure, but security of tenure during a considerable term, with an easy, accessible method of renewing it. I believe the operation of those clauses will be generally to give the tenant farmers of Ireland, to a large extent, the security my old and venerable friend Mr. Stafford had; and the tenants would be no longer afraid that they might soon be turned out of their farms, or that they would have their rents raised until they would not have a blade of grass on which to feed cattle. I come to the last point—the valuation of the holding and of the improvements. The Bill is intended to guarantee to the tenant the value of his improvements; and, more than that, that he should have a certain, at present undefined, value in the holding of which he is in possession. This is what takes place throughout the whole Province of Ulster. It has not destroyed the landlords; it is a curious thing that the Province of Ulster is the only Province in which, at this moment, landlords have any political authority whatever; so that the argument of the hon. Member opposite failed. It does not follow, if adequate security is given to the tenant, that the landlord will be much less a landlord than he is now. Unfortunately, such are the relations of landlords and tenants under the present system that the landlord has lost almost all political influence; I must say he uses it badly when he has it. I cannot say that I very much regret that he has lost it; but I regret very much the circumstances which have caused him to lose it. The landlords, I hope, will obtain as much rent as they are likely to obtain if this Bill does not pass. I should advise the landlord, if he has any regard for his own interest, not to reject propositions which, if not accepted, may not be followed hereafter by anything he may like better. The power of assignment or sale is that which is intended by the clause to which the hon. and learned Gentleman referred with a good deal of complaint. Now, it is said, the Bill makes a concession to tenants. Nobody denies that, least of all those who have taken so much pains to frame it. It does make concessions to tenants; but at the same time—and that is one of the causes of the supposed intricacy of some parts of the Bill—there are safeguards introduced, so that, as far as it is desirable or possible, with justice to tenants, the interests of the landlords should be preserved. The idea of the English system is a complete delusion—I speak, of course, of Ireland. I am not speaking of the English system in England. It will remain in England until Parliament, guided by public opinion, thinks it necessary to make a change. But I have no idea or suspicion that such changes as this Bill proposes for Ireland will ever be needed in England. In Ireland you have the questions of race, religion, and of absenteeism; you have the circumstance of the greatest estates being continually under the management of agents, and, in fact, everything in Ireland is at war with the English system. Therefore—there is no escape from it—you are tempted to have recourse to laws which are very different from the laws which we have in England, and which, I trust, will be never necessary in this country. Hon. Members assume that we are giving a great deal to the tenant, and that we are taking all this without any compensation from the landlord. It is astonishing what a universal opinion there is that compensation from a public fund is a blessed thing. It is common in this House to ask if there is any compensation when any measure is proposed which touches any individual interest, but which, at the same time, promises to be of the greatest public benefit. If you complain that the Bill gives too much to the tenants and takes all that it does give from the landlords, I should make this answer—If, at this moment, all that the tenants have done were gone, and all that the landlords have done were left, that is the sort of map I should very much like to see, for its publication would finish this discussion in five minutes. Well, if that were to take place, if all that the tenants have done were swept off the soil, and all that the landlords have done were left upon it, the land would be as bare of house and barn, fences and cultivation, as it was in pre-historic times. It would be as bare as an American prairie where the Indian now roams and where the White man has never trod. [A laugh.] An hon. Member laughs, thinking that an absurd statement. [Mr. TOTTENHAM: Will the right hon. Gentleman give his figures?] The hon. Gentleman asks for figures. We do not often put figures on maps, and I was drawing a map. Surely the hon. Member knows that I am stating little more, if indeed anything more, than was stated in the Reports of the Commission. I may give what was stated 35 years ago by that greatest of all the Commissions—the Commission presided over by Lord

Devon. It is not necessary that you should read the thick Blue Book. If you take the digest—it is in two small octavo volumes, which I studied more than 30 years ago, and which I have studied again within the last few years—you will find that the statement I have just made is merely an amplification of the statement made by the Devon Commission. / I say I believe, and I think I am within the mark, that nine-tenths, excluding the towns, of course, of all that is to be seen on the farm land in Ireland, the houses, barns, fences, and whatever you call cultivation, or freeing land from the wilderness, have been placed there by the labour of the tenantry of Ireland, and not at the expense of the landlords; and I believe, too, that in the matter of rent, landlords in hundreds, probably in thousands of cases, have over and over again received the value of that which the tenants have placed upon their farms. Now, the parts of the Bill to which the hon. and learned Gentleman objects so strongly are those which, in my opinion, are necessary as a remedy for the present existing burning ills in Ireland. The other point for which I have a special affection, for reasons which the House will understand, is that which intends to convert, to a very large extent I hope, tenant farmers into farmers who are owners of their own land. In 1870 that principle was adopted by both Houses of Parliament, I believe without any division; it was adopted also in arrangement for the sale of the property that came into the possession of the State when the Irish Church was disestablished. My right hon. Friend the Member for Reading, now First Commissioner of Works, had a Committee of this House to inquire into this question. That Committee reported unanimously in favour of this project, and reported by a majority in favour of the mode of doing it which this Bill has adopted. I think it is the case that the Irish tenant farmers—the future proprietors, I hope, thousands of them will be—that they are greatly indebted to my right hon. Friend for the extraordinary pains which he took and devoted to the examination before the Committee, and the promotion of that great object of the Bill. Thirty years ago I asked Parliament, not in a speech in this House, but in speeches in the country, that this course should be adopted; and I believe now that if it were possible to make so great a change, if it were practicable, it would be of more advantage to Ireland and its population than all other measures that it is possible to conceive of or to attempt if we were to transfer three-fourths of all the tenants of Ireland from tenants into actual owners of their land. Now, if the House will allow me, I should like to give them two or three figures which I extracted the other day from a despatch received at the Foreign Office from Lord Dufferin, our Ambassador at St. Petersburg. Lord Dufferin there describes what has been done in the Russian Empire; and the hon. and learned Gentleman, who used the word "appalled" with regard to this Bill, would be astounded and appalled, no doubt, at the figures which Lord Dufferin gives. I beg the attention of the House particularly to them, for they astonished me so much that I wish everyone else to partake of the same feeling with regard to them. He says that out of 10,137,000 farmer serfs—that is, serf families, which would make I do not know what population—8,584,000, or 85 per cent, are now absolutely owners of the land they occupy—that will be 15 times as many as the whole tenant farmers in Ireland. He says, further, that of these only 644,000 redeemed or purchased their land without some help from the Government. They have redeemed what they have had from the Government, and they are now absolute owners of their land. Then, he says, 1,550,000—which is three times the whole number of tenant occupiers in Ireland—1,550,000 have not yet redeemed their land. Now, that is the process which is going on in Russia. There it is an autocratic Government, and it was not necessary to consult contending Parties in two Houses of Parliament. It might have been as well for Russia if that had taken place in other things; but in regard to this matter, there came the hand of Providence, described as a hand stretched out from the clouds—the providence of the late Czar. By a decree of his own, and by the action of his Ministers, that enormous, that stupendous, and that absolutely unequalled change has been made throughout a great portion of that Empire. I think that that is a just appeal to us to do something, although we cannot aim to do so great a thing as that. Now, I should like to make one observation about these proprietors. I have always held that the landed proprietors of Ireland were in a most unsafe position, because they were so few, and the occupying tenants so numerous. There are 500,000 or 600,000 tenants who make public opinion, be it for good or evil, against 10,000 or 14,000 proprietors, who can by no means stand up against it. We find now the crisis is come which so long ago was foretold, and we find what is the truth, that landed proprietors in England and Scotland would do well to take to heart this fact—that the opinion of property is always in favour of property, and that it is property's only great and certain safeguard. Depend upon it, the opinion of people who have no property is not a very great safeguard to people who have property. If land is to be made secure in Ireland, it must be by a system which, by dividing and dispersing land, will furnish it and its rights with a multitude of defenders. That is exactly what one of the principal portions of this Bill is intended to secure to the landed proprietors of Ireland; and the time will come, and is probably not many years removed, when they will admit that this particular part of the measure is quite reconciled to the other parts of it, and when they will certainly attribute to it a great portion of the tranquillity and comfort which they enjoy in the possession of their property in that country. Now, where is land most secure? It is most secure in France, and in those countries in Europe where it is most divided; and I venture to say to the House of Commons, with the most perfect belief in its truth, that there is nothing that Parliament can do, and scarcely anything that it can spend, that will not be amply compensated by a great and widespread liberality with regard to this particular part of the Land Question. The hon. Member for Cork has found some fault with this Bill in his speeches outside; but I will only refer, for the moment, to one or two points to which he adverted, I think, in a manner hardly reasonable or fair towards the Government. He objected very much to what is said about emigration; and he objected, further, that nothing is said about the labourers. Now, in regard to emigration, no Member of the Government has any idea that any clause of the Bill indicates anything of the kind as that any single Irishman or Irishwoman will be compelled to leave their country and cross the Atlantic. There is no such intention as that. In point of fact, one would say there is hardly any occasion for any inducement of that kind, seeing what is going on at this moment. Last year, 95,000 persons went from Ireland; and, if the reports in the newspapers are correct, emigration is going on now even at a greater rate than it was going on last year. I will put it to the hon. Member for Cork—but it is no credit to England that he should have to answer it, as I think he will have to answer it—I put it to the hon. Member, if all the great mercantile steamers of England—such fleets as the world cannot produce—were to anchor at Cork or at Galway, and to offer a free passage to all the families of the population of Connaught, how many does he think would remain behind? Probably the whole population of Connaught—I have not the least doubt that one-half of them—would find their way to the United States. It is a country which opens its doors to everybody. The Minister of the United States in this country (Mr. Russell Lowell), a man who has put as much wisdom as wit in his description of that country, says—

“Whose free latch-string never was drawn in

And there is room there for the whole population of Connaught. I should be very sorry to see them all go. I should not like it to be said that it was possible in this age, or in our time—that it was necessary to expatriate from Ireland so many scores and thousands of its population. But in every family emigrating, although there is hardship, from the parents to the children, it is a deliverance from a future of poverty and suffering, if they remain where they now are. Therefore, while the Bill does not propose to offer any inducement, except such inducements as the people now have, to any single Irish family to emigrate, yet I am bound to say I believe it would be far better for a great number of those families to be settled in the better parts of Canada and the United States than to remain where they are, or to be removed from where they are to any of those tracts of land which, at a certain expense—I dare not say the exact amount, for it is not easily to be ascertained—might, in Ireland, be made fit for the habitation and cultivation of some of them. So I trust that those families who will go and are going, notwithstanding the violent passion which has been created in America by many statements that are not true, and many that are exaggerated—notwithstanding that, I trust that there are now persons going to the United States who will hear from their own country that much of its misery has departed, that a feeling of justice is entertained, and that the disloyalty and discontent we now so deeply regret have been, for the most part, removed. With regard to the labourer, to whom the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork refers, there is nothing that can do so much good to him as that which will induce the farmer of Ireland to cultivate his land better than he does. The Bill does nothing for the houses of the labourer. The wages of labour in Ireland are much higher than they were; they have been, in the last 10 years, much higher than they have ever been at any former period; and I believe that the demand for labour has increased. But the houses are, as the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson) has stated, miserable; and it is not a very easy thing to put clauses in an Act of Parliament with a view of enforcing the building of many thousands of houses all over Ireland. They must be built by somebody, either with the consent of the landlord or by raising the rent. There are, therefore, other interests to be consulted; and if it be possible to do anything by any more means that would be likely to be practicable, I hope there will be no difficulty in doing it by some other measure, or by adding a clause to this Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman and others have said that this Bill is an intricate and complicated one. The question is admitted, he has admitted it himself, to be a very difficult one, so difficult that he not only did not understand the clauses of the Bill, but I maintain that he did not in the least understand the question. The Bill, I may say, without any—what may I call it?—without any special praise to the Government, is a child of very much anxiety, of very much consideration, and of very many discussions, and very many amendments. I believe that it would have been difficult to give to any measure a more perfect and fuller consideration than this measure has had on the part of the Government, as far as it was possible to give it. We have endeavoured to make it worthy of the Government, and of the Parliament to which it was offered, and we hope that it will do good to the people whose interests it is intended to advance and to secure. As to those people, if I had 10 minutes more, there is one thing I should like to say. [Cries of "Go on!"] We have heard to-night a reference to their virtues and their vices. I shall say nothing of their vices—all people, I think, almost have a sufficient number of critics, and it would not be of any advantage that I should add myself to the number; but with regard to their virtues, there are two things that have struck me very much. The poor people who live in Connaught, and about whom the hon. Gentleman spoke so feelingly at the beginning of his speech, what are they? They may live in hovels scarcely better than wigwams; they may have three or four acres of land, and land so poor that it seems almost impossible for them to live on it, and concerning which Mr. Tuke says in his pamphlet, quoting a Yorkshire farmer who visited Connaught, that he saw in one particular district what seemed to be farms that had on them three or four times the original value of the land, put on them entirely by those small tenants. But what are those tenants? They come over to this country during the harvest, travelling there and back at least a thousand miles; they come to Dublin, they cross the Channel, they make their way to some remote farms in England and Scotland, they work with a zeal and energy not surpassed by any English or Scotch labourer. There is one great farmer in Northumberland who last autumn told me—and he was one of your Commissioners—that he believed that these labourers, working as hard as they did for many days, contrived to live on very little. I said that they would live on sixpence a-day, and he told me that he thought that they lived upon less than that. Every shilling, every penny that they earned, they saved. Having in a very good harvest made, perhaps, £10 or £12, they make their way back to Glasgow or Liverpool, cross the Channel again, cross Ireland, and arrive at their own cabins with this little bit of treasure that they have worked so hard for. The men who did that were not men without virtue—I take the ancient meaning of the term virtue. These men who can go so far, can live on so little and save so much, who come back with such devotion and such eagerness to their homes and families, depend upon it, under better and more favourable circumstances, they might become a very admirable portion of the population of any country. And if you will follow the evidence of what takes place in America, you will find what they do there. They have sent back to this country large funds to assist their friends here in Ireland—multitudes of them—in crossing the Atlantic. They have sent back many—I do not know how many, but many millions during the last 30 years, since the Famine—it is impossible to say what, but an enormous and an incredible sum. Shall we think nothing of that people who regard their families with such affection, and their country, too, with so much affection—listening to every wail of sorrow which sometimes comes from Ireland; and listening, perhaps, also, to some of the unfair and exaggerated statements made by certain speakers. But, still, they find their affections are aroused and their sympathies are excited. The Irish domestic servants, the farmers, and the Irishmen who build their railways, have subscribed millions and millions to help their countrymen at home, or to bring them across the Atlantic to the United States. I say, then, of that people, that they are a people we ought to have some regard for; that we ought to feel that of this people something ought to be made better than a discontented, a suffering, and a disloyal people, as, to a great extent, they have been, and now are. And now, what shall we say about this Bill? If that portion of it which deals with that class of cases which the hon. and learned Gentleman thinks is so little, that portion of the Bill which deals with landlords and tenants is worked with fairness—if the purchase clauses and powers are worked with energy—I dare hope and believe that it will be found to be a measure of healing and of blessing to the Irish people. I ask hon. Gentlemen on every side of the House not to imagine that the Bill has not been framed with a great intention and honesty for a great purpose. Let them, as far as they can, support the Bill and the Government who have introduced it to the House. This very night, and every night, the House prays to the Highest—and for what? The language always strikes me as touching and beautiful. We here, representing the whole nation, pray to the Highest for the peace and tranquillity of the Realm. It is for the peace and tranquillity of the Realm that this Bill has been drawn up and introduced to the House; and it is in the hope that if it passes it will tend to the great end that we, not with fear but with confidence, ask for it the acceptance and the sanction of Parliament.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, at this period of the evening I shall detain the House but a very short time. I join in the last words that fell from the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, in which he expressed the hope that the peace and tranquillity of the Realm may endure, and I sincerely trust that no words of mine will tend to disturb it. I cordially agree with him in rendering a just tribute to the generosity, high feeling, and temperament of the people of Ireland, and, for my own part, would not hesitate to adopt any measure for their benefit, provided it was consistent with the laws of justice and right. I also believe that his remarks upon the subject of emigration, with which I concur, will receive the approval of my Colleagues. Further, I go heartily with him in almost every word that has fallen from him with regard to the provisions of the Bill which are directed to making the occupying classes owners, and not tenants, of their farms. I feel, however, that we can hardly call that man an owner who has borrowed three-fourths of the purchase money of his land from the State, and the remaining fourth from the money lender. And, while I believe it would be right to pass that portion of the Bill in an improved form, I think care should be taken that we do not put the occupier in a worse position than he is in already—that is to say, that, having borrowed three-fourths of his money from the State and the remainder at enormous interest from the money lender, the State should not cause him to suffer more than he would have done at the hands of the landlord. I should like to hear, before the debate closes, what would be the position of an owner who had bought under this Bill, and who in bad seasons—recurring bad seasons—was unable to pay the interest on the money borrowed in the manner described—would the State evict him as recklessly and ruthlessly as the landlords are, by some, supposed to have done? Before the end of the discussion, I hope the Prime Minister will inform the House in what way it is intended that the owner who is unable to pay his rent, owing to the interest which he has incurred, is to be protected. I think we ought to approach this part of the question in a manner somewhat different from that of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. The right hon. Gentleman has said a great deal about the landlords; but what we have been told by the Prime Minister, the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and in the Reports of Committees, is that, so far as inquiries have extended, the landlords as a body stand acquitted. I have no doubt that those who have studied carefully the evidence produced before the Commissioners will see that almost all the cases of hardship that have occurred where the landlords were not the first to apply a remedy were on those estates which were bought under the Encumbered Estates Act, in the way of commercial speculation, by persons who had been forgetful of the good understanding which has existed so long between the Irish landlords and tenants. It seems to me that the Government, in the course of the long and anxious discussions that have taken place upon this Bill, must have tried to frame in their minds a distinction between the estates held in tenure of the old Irish landlords, and those bought recently in the Encumbered Estates Court. It is, I think, too severe upon those landlords who have not been hard upon their tenants to charge them with the shortcomings of a totally different class. The right hon. Gentleman has said that this Bill has received great attention from the Government, and no one can doubt it. It has been a Bill of great discussion. No one will attempt to deny that it has also been a Bill of great disunion amongst the Members of the Government.

MR. GLADSTONE: A Bill of great disunion amongst the Government, has it?

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: If the right hon. Gentleman is not aware of that fact, he had better ask the Duke of Argyll. It has, moreover, not been framed without some disunion amongst other Members of the Government, although this has not reached the same pitch as in the case of the Duke of Argyll. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has accused the late Attorney General for England of being too mindful of English usages. But I venture to assert, if the right hon. Gentleman will favour me with his attention, that what my hon. and learned Friend said was that he was perfectly ready to adopt all usages, whether in Ireland or in England, provided they were legal usages; but that he was not willing to consent that those things which were matters of sentiment or feeling should be included in the Bill without rhyme or reason, and the landlord deprived of his property for the purpose of handing it over to the tenant. The right hon. Gentleman says that the whole land system in Ireland has broken down, and that some remedy must be applied. But we did not hear any such words from the Prime Minister in all those speeches which he made in Mid Lothian and elsewhere; nor in any of his writings in the reviews is this question referred to as one which rendered an immediate change necessary, except so far as those clauses, commonly known as the "Bright Clauses," of the Act of 1870 are concerned, and to which I should like more attention to be directed than they have yet received. The right hon. Gentleman has delivered a lecture to my hon. and learned Friend, saying that he had forgotten that land was in Ireland the only source of industry and wealth. Why, that was the ground of the argument which the late Attorney General for England pressed at length upon Her Majesty's Government in the course of his speech. I do not think I could have listened to a more unjust accusation, seeing that what the right hon. Gentleman opposite said was forgotten was the very foundation of the argument of my hon. and learned Friend. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that the whole state of Ireland was due to the confiscation which took place years ago. He went into the history of Ireland, stating that about six-sevenths of the owners of the land were of a different religion to that of the occupiers, and touched upon the Law of Primogeniture, with the object of leading us to the conclusion that in consequence of this confiscation the tenants had suffered a grievous wrong. But the right hon. Gentleman had forgotten the main principle, that two wrongs do not make a right. I should like to refer to one or two clauses of the Bill which seem to me to have practically escaped his attention; but, before I do so, I should like to know what is the main object of the Bill? Is it to transfer the ownership of the land from the owner to the tenant? It is, so far as the fifth part of the Bill is concerned; and if that is what the Government have at heart, I am prepared to go with them a long way provided they mean that the new owner shall be the actual owner of his holding, and not simply a borrower of money. I ask again, is the main object of the Bill really to transfer the ownership of land from the present owners to the occupiers; and are the early portions of the Bill simply modus vivendi to gain time, or are they the substance, the cardinal points of it, the fifth part being only an appendage about which the Government do not very much care whether it be enacted or not? I will undertake to say that the 1st clause, which says—

"The tenant for the time being of every tenancy to which this Act applies may sell his tenancy for the best price that can be got for the same,"

is the most dangerous part of the Bill I want to know what this tenancy is? We all understand what it is in those parts of Ireland in which the custom of Ulster prevails; but we have, in the Interpretation Clause at the end of the Bill, an explanation of the word "tenancy" as follows:—

"'Tenancy' means the interest in a holding of a tenant and his successors in title during the continuance of a tenancy."

The Government believe it to mean that the tenant has something—they do not say what—that is saleable. Upon this point we have had different interpretations, one coming from the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and another from an hon. and learned Member below the Gangway. But what is it that the tenant may sell? Leaving that question for a moment, I ask with regard to this right of the tenant to sell this something—this undefined thing said to be created by the Act of 1870, but which, at the time of its passing, that Act was never supposed to create—what will be its effect?

Sir R. Assheton Cross

In a vast number of instances it will be an increase of the rent which the tenant will have to pay. No one can doubt, I suppose, that if this Bill passes into law as it stands, a great many Irish landlords will not be sorry to leave Ireland? Thus, one of the great evils complained of will be increased. But take, for a moment, the case of land in the landlord's own holding at the time of the passing of this Bill. There is a considerable number of landlords who hold land in this way at the present time; what will be the effect of the Bill in a case of that kind? A landlord, we will say, wants to let his land for the first time, and advertises for tenants. One man comes forward and offers £100 a-year for the land, and another £120. At present the landlord, regarding the man who offered £100 as a better farmer, and one who had probably accumulated capital of his own, would naturally prefer him to the man who was ready to pay £120 a-year. But if the Bill passes in its present form that would no longer be the case. The tenant who had been chosen by the landlord at the smaller rent, £100, because he was the better man, would immediately be able to sell his tenant right to the very man who had been rejected, although he had originally offered the higher rent (£120). And the landlord would think he might just as well put the additional £20 into his pocket. The tendency would undoubtedly be that he would choose a higher bidder than under the present system, and the rent would be raised in consequence. Therefore, in that case, the rent of the tenants will undoubtedly be raised. Next, let us consider how the consequences of this Bill will be to raise the rents in the case of existing tenants, and not that of new tenants. Almost on every page of the Bessborough Commission landlords who have let their estates at very low rents are mentioned. There are other landlords, to whom I have already alluded, who let their estates at very high rents; but their tenants have nothing to sell, for they are rack-rented up to the hilt. The case with the low-rented tenants is different, and their landlord, who will suffer the loss, will have to say to himself—"I have this large estate in Ireland; I have spent a large sum upon it; I have let it at low rents to a large number of tenants; I see under this Bill that my tenants, who are very low rented, have as much right to their interest as the tenants who are high rented; I am not going to allow this state of things to pass—I shall raise my rents." That proves my point, which is that the tendency of this clause will be to raise the rents. I have proved it by the admission of the Prime Minister that where the land is already let at a low rent landlords will be induced to raise that rent. Now, I go a step further—to the incoming tenant, who takes possession when the existing tenant has sold out. That individual will have to pay a higher rent, for he will not only have to pay the original rent, but he will have to pay a premium, for rent does not mean the amount for the land paid by the year, the half-year, or the quarter, but it means money paid into the pocket both of the landlord and of the outgoing tenant for the privilege of holding the tenancy for the time being. He will have to pay for the privilege of coming in over and above the value of manures, and so forth. Undoubtedly, the effect of this clause outside Ulster will be to raise the rents. In the case of an old lease farm, in the case of a new lease farm, or in the case of an incoming tenant where the tenancy has once been sold, in every one of these three cases the inevitable tendency of the clause will be to make future tenants in Ireland pay more for their land than is paid now. And now I want to come to the 7th clause for a moment. I thought, after all the explanations that we had had from divers Members of the Government and others, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) would have thrown some additional light on this subject. I am sorry to say that we are just as much in the dark as ever; he has attempted to give us a new definition. Putting aside the first part of the sub-section—namely, that which deals with the Ulster Custom, we come to the second part, and we want to know, practically, what it is under that part that the landlord will have to suffer. Well, the right hon. Gentleman has favoured us with a new definition, and it is rather an extraordinary one. He says that what the tenant will have to sell is this—"a certain, at present undefined, value of his holding." That is certainly a charming explanation of a very complicated subject. [Mr. JOHN BRIGHT: Not defined in Ulster.] We are not talking about Ulster. In the former part of the clause, not only is Ulster mentioned, but also any other part where there is a custom or usage; but we are now coming to the places where there is no custom or usage. Wherever there is a custom or usage, of course the case is clear, and we can understand the matter without asking the right hon. Gentleman for an explanation; but, coming to the place where there is no custom or usage, we ask what is it the tenant will have to sell? And we are told, "a certain, at present undefined, value of his holding." Is that to be the only explanation to the County Court Judge? How is the County Court Judge to interpret it? The right hon. Gentleman thinks this is a difficult part of the Bill, and I agree with him, seeing what a gross injustice will be perpetrated by the clause. I am not speaking of this as a matter of drafting or of Committee, for it is a question of deep principle. What the Government have said in the Bill is that the tenant's interest is to be estimated with reference to "the scale of compensation for disturbance by this Act provided." What do you mean by that? When you put in a scale of compensation for disturbance, what did you do it for? You did it in order to inflict a penalty upon the landlord for unjustly evicting a tenant. First you said a man may be fined, say £100, for unjustly evicting a tenant; and now you say he is liable to pay the same sum, not as a penalty, not for evicting a tenant, not because he takes any action whatever, but because the tenant chooses to say—"I want the money and will appeal to the Court." Can anything more unjust be conceived? In 1870 it was said—"We want to prevent tenants being unjustly evicted;" and, further, to the landlords it was said—"If you are going to evict these men, you shall pay this penalty for doing so." Well, the landlord does not want to evict a tenant; but the latter may come forward in the Court and say—"I know my landlord does not want to evict me, and would like very well to see me stay; I do not, therefore, claim anything as compensation for disturbance, but I want to leave—but I wish to have the sum I should have been entitled to if he had evicted me." All this, I must say, has very much astonished me. If I had considered the matter now for the first time I should not have been so much surprised; but that is not the case. This question of fair rents has been argued and re-argued over and over again. There is a celebrated anecdote told of a learned advocate who, in the hurry of opening his case, got hold of the wrong story and made a powerful oration in favour of the other side; but, being reminded by a touch on the shoulder by one of his friends of the mistake he had fallen into, with the utmost self-possession said—"Such, gentlemen of the jury, is the case which my learned friend opposite will put before you," and then proceeded to demolish it and put the right case before the jury. That is exactly the case of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister in this matter. The only difference is that during the 11 years which have passed since the introduction of the Land Act of 1870, many things that the right hon. Gentleman said have been forgotten. Many of the arguments used by the Prime Minister in 1870 against the provisions contained in this Bill remain at the present time unanswered. That is something that I am bound to say does astonish me. They were arguments, not of principle, but of positive fact. Why, when we came to this question of the valuation of rents, the right hon. Gentleman declared that it was not only extremely unfair, but that it was impossible and could not be done. When the question came before the House as to whether exorbitant rents could be valued with a view to their being reduced, the right hon. Gentleman said he should like to see the man who would get up and state, in reasonable language, that he could support that proposition. Before the debate closes, no doubt we shall hear this "reasonable language." Now, I want to go one step further. I quite agree that you met the evil of eviction, to some extent, by the Land Bill of 1870, by which a penalty was put on the landlord for unjust eviction. That Bill has, however, in some degree failed, because, as you yourselves say, landlords do not evict but raise the rent. You therefore say—"Let us have this clause for valuing the rent." It seems to me that is rather jumping at a conclusion far beyond the evil it is desired to remedy. What you want I will point out. The right hon. Gentleman says we make no suggestions; but I would venture to offer one. I assume my premisses are right, and that the evil you want to correct is that the Act of 1870, though it practically prevented eviction to a great extent, yet did not prevent the raising of rents. The Chief Secretary put before us some heart-rending cases where tenants had reclaimed land and removed stones and built houses, the result being that the rent had been largely increased; and there is no one on this side of the House who would not say that that is a monstrous iniquity. I do not mean to say, and the Commission very properly states, that you cannot say all the improvements are to be taken from the landlord and handed over to the tenants, otherwise landlords would have nothing but waste land. There must be a statutory limitation. What you mean is that all the recent improvements made by a tenant shall not be put in the landlord's pocket, and you want to prevent the landlord from raising his rent. Well, why do you not say that if the tenant has his rent raised he has a right to say—“Very well, we will have a settlement. If things are allowed to go on as they are I shall be content; but if you choose to raise the rent it is time we had a settlement of accounts. I have done so much, my predecessors did so much—built houses, planted manures that are not exhausted, and so forth. Let us fix the value of the improvements that belong to the tenants—let us know what they are and pay me the money down. If you cannot afford to pay me money down capitalize it and deduct the interest from the rent.” Here you would have a remedy for a great evil you want to provide for. You would not infringe any principle of political economy; you would do what is just, and you would not give to the tenant one farthing that he has not a right to receive. If you did this you would do justice between the parties. You are not content with that, however; you want to do something more, and it is just because you want to do something more that we are so entirely opposed to this part of the Bill. I have observed in a great many of the speeches of hon. Members who have spoken on this matter that they have mixed up two things. The hon. Member for Staleybridge (Mr. Summers), for instance, based his speech upon the improvements the tenants had put in the land. He never touched this point that we object to. What we object to is, not payment for improvements, but payment for something else—something that does not belong to the tenant and never did. The hon. Member for Staleybridge, therefore, failed to appreciate that part of the case. Do not let the hon. Gentleman run away with the idea suggested by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster that all the improvements are done by the tenant. [Mr. JOHN BRIGHT: I did not say all, but nine-tenths.] That is nearly all. Do not let the House run away with the idea that all the improvements are, as a rule, done by the tenant. When we read the Report and the Evidence published by the Bessborough Commission, we find that on most of the large estates most of the improvements have been made by the landlords, and that some of them have practically received no rent for the land. [“Oh, oh!”] Well, you find that to be the case in some parts of Ireland, and you know that it is so. Many of the large Irish landlords have spent nearly the whole of their receipts on their estates. All these improvements should be deducted when the tenant makes his claim. We are not willing that you should give the tenant that which he never had and has no right to have. I am far from saying that the Ulster Custom is not a wise one or has not worked beneficially in Ulster, and I do not say that if you introduced that custom to the rest of Ireland it would not work well. It would not suit English habits, and I do not profess to be a judge of what Irish habits are; but I say if you are going to take a serious step, state at once openly and precisely what it is you are going to do. You are going to take away something which has hitherto been considered as always belonging to the landlord, and to hand it over to the tenant, and you are not going to pay the landlord anything for it. It comes to that; and I cannot for one moment imagine that in all these discussions the question of compensation has not entered into the minds of the Government. I quite see all the difficulties they must have had to consider in dealing with the question. They may have asked themselves—"Where is the compensation to come from? Can we get it from the British taxpayer?" They might have thought of the Church Surplus Fund; but I am afraid there is no Church Surplus. I have no doubt that that was thought of; but there is no surplus—or, at least, there is none available. But that does not alter the question whether compensation ought to be given or not. All I can say is, give the tenant by all means the full value, if he wants it, of his improvements; let us have a reckoning up. The landlord raises his rent, and the tenant says—"Very well, then, you shall pay the value of my improvements." But if, beyond that, you are going to take from the landlord what has always been considered to belong to him you must pay him for it. If in the wisdom of the Government they think it right that this should be done, and that the property shall be in the hands of the tenant for the future, let them say so outright, and not by a clause which we cannot understand. Let them say—"In our opinion it is right that the tenant right custom of Ulster should prevail all over Ireland. We shall therefore say to the landlords of Ireland—'For the public good this must be taken out of your estates, and they must be considered as if they were in Ulster. There is no usage or custom to warrant us in doing so; but as we think it is for the public benefit—that it is for the benefit of Ireland that the custom and usage which prevail in Ulster should prevail throughout the length and breadth of the country—we are bound to say we shall impose that obligation upon you which is imposed on the landlords of Ulster. But, as in all other cases when we take away property from one man for the benefit of others, we offer you compensation—full, fair, and ample compensation for the injury we undoubtedly do to your estates.'"

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Shaw,)—put, and agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY OATHS (MOTION FOR BILL).

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on the Question [6th May],

Sir R. Ausheton Cross

"That the Adjourned Debate on the Question [2nd May], 'That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for Committee on the Parliamentary Oaths (Motion for Bill)' be further Adjourned till Tuesday next, at Two of the clock."—(Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

Question again proposed, "That the Debate be further adjourned till Tuesday next, at Two of the clock."

Debate resumed.

MR. SPEAKER: It may be convenient to remind the House that the Question before it is—That this debate be further adjourned till to-morrow, at 2 o'clock.

MR. R. N. FOWLER: I beg to move that the debate be further adjourned till Thursday.

MR. SPEAKER: No Amendment to that effect can now be put, as the House has already affirmed the proposition that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, he wished to remind the House that the Prime Minister had promised to state the course he intended to pursue when the Motion was brought on that evening, and had also stated that he should like a division to be taken. He (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) thought the best course the House could pursue would be to proceed, as soon as possible, to that division. He should, to enable them to do so, conclude by moving the adjournment of the debate, and on these particular and distinct grounds. The House had been sitting since the 6th of January, and the right hon. Gentleman had absorbed, under the necessities of the case, and in the interest of the country as he had stated, the whole of the Private Members' nights. The Motion was one which might well be made on some future day without interfering with anything, and on which there might be a far better opportunity of considering and discussing when there was time on a Government night, and then it might be right, and fair, and just for the Government to press forward the question. But it was not right, or fair, or just—it was unjust and unfair that the right hon. Gentleman should take away private Members' days in the way now proposed. It must be remembered also that if the House granted a Day Sitting to-morrow, they might have another on Friday, and there would be nothing to prevent Dayittings until this or any other

Bill was brought in and passed. He would move that the debate should be adjourned.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he would second the Motion, in order to place before the House some facts to show that to grant this Morning Sitting would be to establish a dangerous precedent in regard to the rights of private Members. It would, he said, be in the recollection of the right hon. Gentleman that during the last Liberal Administration it was his (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck's) duty to protest against the encroachments which the right hon. Gentleman made on the privileges of private Members, and especially with regard to the practice, then first established, of appointing Morning Sittings in the early part of the Session. His remonstrances, then, and those of his Friends, were of little avail; but the Government of Lord Beaconsfield adopted a fairer and more equitable course. To prove that he need go no further back than 1876, when, on the 8th of June, and on a similar occasion, Lord Beaconsfield laid down the principle upon which, in his judgment, Morning Sittings ought to be appointed. He said Morning Sittings were not a procedure to which he would ever have recourse except towards that part of the year when the pressure of Public Business was very great. Accordingly, in that year, the regular Morning Sittings commenced upon the above date, and in 1877 were first appointed for Tuesdays only, commencing on June 5. In the following year there were no regular Morning Sittings until June 18, and in 1879 the first regular Morning Sitting was on the 27th of May. The principle clearly was that no Morning Sittings should be held before the commencement of June, or thereabouts, except with the consent of, and for the convenience of, the House. The precedent mentioned on a former occasion by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India of a Morning Sitting held in 1879, on the 6th of May, by the late Government, was wholly inapplicable to the present case, for it would be seen by a reference to Hansard that that Morning Sitting on the 6th of May was held at the request of Members of the House, in order that the House might proceed with the Valuation Bill. The hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) took objection to the proposal to have that Morning Sitting, and twice gave Notice of opposition; but when the time came he did not oppose the Motion, and the debate was proceeded with at a Morning Sitting with the unanimous consent of the House. A Morning Sitting was held on the 27th of May merely for the convenience of the House before the Easter Holidays, and regular Morning Sittings were not resumed till the 10th of June. The practice of not holding Morning Sittings before June was in accordance with the old practice of the House when Morning Sittings commenced at 12 o'clock; and it was clear from the precedents he had cited that Morning Sittings, early in the Session, ought not to be appointed except with the consent of the House—which, in this case, was clearly not given. For the convenience and information of hon. Gentlemen who called themselves independent, and who sat below the Gangway on the other side of the House, he had thought it desirable to make them acquainted with these facts; and he thought the right hon. Gentleman would gain a great point if he could so govern them as to obtain their support to some Motions he had proposed, but to which they were extremely adverse. It would also be well if they would come down to the House when encroachments were to be made on the rights of private Members, and would oppose a Motion which, if the votes of the House could be taken, as he thought they ought to be taken, by ballot, he believed would be rejected.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Sir Walter B. Barttelot.)

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, at this time of the night the most rational course would be, if we are to have a division, to go straight to that division; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) thought he had matter to communicate to the House which was so important and so accurate that he could not possibly withhold it. The right hon. and learned Gentleman says there was once a Government in this country—at a period so deplorable that he cannot refer to it without pain—when there was in operation a conspiracy against the rights of private Members, but that that guilty Cabinet was dismissed from Office, and another Government came in; and then the right hon. and learned Gentleman, although he had in vain struggled in former times to defend the rights of the House, found he had a different set of people to deal with. [Mr. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: I never said anything of the sort.] I am not endeavouring to cite the words of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. It would be perfectly in vain for me to try to do so; they are far beyond my powers. It will be seen that it is the spirit of his speech to which I am confining myself. With this new Government the principles of the right hon. and learned Gentleman prevailed; and then, with some insignificant exceptions which are hardly worth notice, all Morning Sittings were adjourned, or not allowed until late in May, or until the month of June. That is the upshot of the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman; and I must admit that, so far as I can judge, during the time of the late Government the right hon. and learned Gentleman had ample leisure for informing himself on this matter, although he appeared to be generally oppressed by the duties of Office. But I wish simply on this occasion, without further discussion, to test the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentlemen, and show, with reference to the present circumstances, what were the actual dates, extracted from the Records of this House, when Morning Sittings commenced, as he has told us, when he completely succeeded in defending the rights of private Members. I will take, first, the year 1875, when the first Morning Sitting was on the 16th of March. There was another Morning Sitting on the 13th of April, and then they became usual. In 1877 the first Morning Sitting was on the 27th of March; in 1878, the first Morning Sitting was on the 19th of March, and the second and third Morning Sittings in that year were of particular interest in connection with the part which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has taken on this peculiar question. On the 26th and the 29th of March there were Morning Sittings on the Mutiny Bill, in which the right hon. and learned Gentleman was specially interested. After that the right hon. and learned Gentleman thinks he has made an accurate statement to this House. I make no complaint of those Morning Sittings. My own opinion is that, as far as Morning Sittings go as a plan, they ought not to be introduced at an early date. This seems to be a special ground, at all events, on which to try the judgment of the House. When that judgment has been taken there will be time for further discussion; but it will be remembered that a measure to try the judgment of the House is no part of the policy of the Government. It is simply a proposal made by the Government with a view to providing for a dilemma that has arisen out of a vote which the Government resisted. The Government felt it to be their duty, notwithstanding, to render any assistance they could, and they therefore made this proposal. We are certainly desirous to have the judgment of the House upon that proposal; but before they can have that judgment they must have the power of taking the vote of the House, and the power of making a proposal. The object of the Morning Sitting which is now asked for is to enable them to make that proposal, and the preliminary step to making that proposal is that which is now before the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the Prime Minister had charged the Opposition with having placed the House in a dilemma; but the fact was that the dilemma had arisen on account of the very peculiar appearance of Mr. Bradlaugh at the Table, for which the Ministerial Party were accountable. No one could doubt that the dilemma of which the right hon. Gentleman spoke had been created by those by whom Mr. Bradlaugh had been supported, of whom the leaders were Her Majesty's Ministers. He hoped that hon. Gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side of the House would excuse so humble a Member of the House as himself (Mr. Newdegate) for distinctly repudiating, on the part of the Opposition, any responsibility for the present dilemma. The right hon. Gentleman claimed for his attempt to establish Morning Sittings early in the Session the precedents established by the late Government. But, if his memory did not betray him, he (Mr. Newdegate) thought that the right hon. Gentleman had deemed it to be his duty to repudiate the entire conduct of the late Administration. He (Mr. Newdegate) himself, indeed, regarded the conduct of the late Government as reprehensible in not having shown more promptitude and firmness in dealing with obstruction, and it was that systematic obstruction of the Business of the House which had in the last Parliament rendered early Morning Sittings necessary. He held, then, that the right hon. Gentleman was basing his conduct upon precedents which he had repudiated and condemned at meetings throughout the country, as well as in that House, while he pleaded nothing in justification for this change of opinion on his part. The right hon. Gentleman had charged the late Government with adopting a course which endangered the independence of Parliament, and yet now proposed to pursue the same course himself; and he (Mr. Newdegate) contended that the precedents which the right hon. Gentleman had cited in favour of the course he proposed for the virtual and practical coercion of the House were vitiated by his own often-repeated previous statements.

Question put.

Main Question again proposed.

MR. RITCHIE said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister whether, after such an expression of opinion of the House, he intended to persist with the Motion that the House should meet that day at 2 o'clock? He desired to point out to the House that the division had been taken especially at the instance of the Prime Minister, who rather went out of his way in order to attach significance to the division, and led the House to believe that the whole of his forces would be marshalled in the support of the Government.

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that as he has already addressed the House on this Amendment, he has exhausted his right of speaking.

MR. GORST said, he had not yet exhausted his right, and therefore he thought he was entitled, seeing that so large a minority had voted, to ask a question of the Prime Minister on the subject of the Motion before the House. The principle which had always guided the House in taking Morning Sittings was that there should be a general assent to them. There was, so far as he knew, no instance in which Morning Sittings had been forced upon the House by a small majority against the general wish of the House. What he wished to ask the Prime Minister—and it was a question which he should like to have answered before any further proceeding was taken—was whether, as so large a proportion of the House was opposed to a Morning Sitting that day, he still intended to persevere with the Motion for a Morning Sitting?

MR. GLADSTONE: Personally, I should feel inclined to state the matter rather differently from the hon. and learned Gentleman. He says that there has been, so far as he knows, no taking of a Morning Sitting except with the general assent of the House. What I should say would be that, as far as I know, so far as Morning Sittings are concerned, a general disposition to accede to the desire expressed by the Government. ["No, no!"] That has certainly been my experience; but I do not wish to make it a matter of contention. So far as the division which has just taken place is concerned, the number of those who voted for a Morning Sitting is larger than the number who voted against it. On the other hand, I presume that hon. Members who voted with the minority are quite prepared to move other Motions for adjournment. Therefore, if I were to persevere with the Main Question that this debate be adjourned until a Morning Sitting this day, I certainly should do so in the conviction that some hon. Gentleman would move the adjournment of the debate, and that we should have a good chance of a Morning Sitting, although it would be a Morning Sitting continuous from now until 2 o'clock to-morrow. Under these circumstances, I may say that I do not propose to take a Morning Sitting, but we will take time to ruminate on the full significance of the division which has taken place. I may, however, say to the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie), that he is quite wrong in his supposition that there has been any marshalling of the forces of the Government. There has been nothing of the kind. We have simply taken this division on the Notice which was previously given. The hon. Member may take the fact for what it is worth; but I may say that, having given up the Morning Sitting to-morrow, I shall take an early opportunity of reverting to the subject.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Debate on Question [2nd May], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," further adjourned till To-morrow.

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL.

(Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Ashley.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: In moving the second reading of this Bill, I wish to explain that it contains only one operative clause, to which I imagine there will be no opposition. It is a Bill to explain, and to some extent amend, the Merchant Shipping Acts with reference to the measurement of ships for tonnage, and it is rendered necessary in consequence of an inadvertence, and is carrying out the recommendation of the Royal Commissioners now sitting on the tonnage question. It is desirable to pass it as speedily as possible, as otherwise ships may be built under a wrong impression as to the intentions of the law in regard to the measurement of the tonnage of ships. The usual course is to take the cubical space in order to obtain the gross tonnage, and then from the gross tonnage is deducted the space devoted to engine-room and other purposes. With those matters the Bill does not propose to interfere; but a claim has been made in certain cases to deduct from the gross tonnage the spaces which have not been included in the first instance in the gross tonnage—for instance, the space occupied by funnel casings and by skylights on deck. It is quite clear that this was not the intention of the Act, but that it was a simple inadvertence, and that ships which took advantage of the omissions in the existing law would be placed at an advantage over other vessels, and be relieved, to a certain extent, from tonnage dues. It is in order to correct that inadvertence that this Bill has been prepared, and the effect of the Bill is to provide that nothing shall be allowed to be deducted from the gross tonnage for the purpose of exemption from tonnage dues which has not been in the first instance included in the gross tonnage.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Chamberlain.)

MR. T. E. SMITH expressed a hope that the right hon. Gentleman would not proceed with the Bill at that hour of the morning, because, although it seemed to be a small Bill, it involved an important question, which would seriously affect the mercantile community. A number of persons had built ships which they believed to be in accordance with the law; the law took a different view upon the question, and an action was tried which ultimately came before the House of Lords, and was decided against the Board of Trade. Since then there had been various attempts on the part of the Board of Trade to alter the law, and this was only another step in the same direction; he, therefore, trusted that the House would not proceed with legislation, until they had an opportunity of hearing the views of those who were interested in the question. The right hon. Gentleman said that a Commission was sitting on the subject. Then let them have the Report of the Commission, so that those interested in the matter, who had a large amount of property at stake, might have an opportunity of expressing their opinion on the new legislation proposed by Her Majesty's Government. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman, considering the lateness of the hour, and that a Royal Commission was sitting on the subject, not to ask the House to proceed with the Bill that night. If the right hon. Gentleman did, he must certainly move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. W. LOWTHER, in seconding the Amendment, said, he did so for the simple reason that the Bill only came into the hands of hon. Members that afternoon. The subject was a very important one. A Commission was already sitting upon it, and he hoped the House would not allow the Bill to be read a second time in that hurried manner.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. T. E. Smith.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he hoped that both the Motion and the Amendment would be withdrawn for the present. He could not imagine that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade would wish to press forward a Bill which had not been in the hands of Members and had not been printed. [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: It is on the Table.] It was not among the Bills lying on the Table of the House. It could be obtained at the Bill Office that afternoon; but it had not yet been delivered in the usual way.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he had made inquiries at the Office, and had been informed that it had been delivered that morning.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS replied, that the right hon. Gentleman had been wrongly informed. The Clerk at the Table had shown him a memorandum which showed that the Bill had not been delivered. It was quite impossible, therefore, that the House could go on with the second reading. In the list of Bills hon. Members were supposed to look at, the Merchant Shipping Bill was mentioned as not delivered. But even if it had been delivered that morning, hon. Members could not have had an opportunity of examining its provisions. It was a Bill which undoubtedly affected very important interests, and, under the circumstances, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consent to adjourn the debate.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I can assure the right hon. Gentleman and the House that I have no desire to press the Bill forward with undue haste, and the moment the House asked for more time I was prepared at once to fall in with that expression of opinion. If my hon. Friend (Mr. T. E. Smith) will withdraw the Amendment, I will withdraw the Motion and postpone the Bill. With regard to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, I may say that I had made inquiry at the Vote Office, and I was assured in the most positive terms that the Bill was delivered this morning. [Mr. MONK: Hear, hear!] I gather from the cheer of my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) that he has received a copy. I have only made these remarks, because I do not wish it to be understood that I had moved the second reading of a Bill which had not been delivered.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: The right hon. Gentleman will do me the justice to suppose that I had ample justification for the statement I made.

MR. DILLWYN remarked, that he had received a copy of the Bill that morning.

MR. HEALY protested against the way in which the Bill had been brought forward. It was introduced and read a first time by a very curious kind of subterranean legislation. About 3 o'clock in the morning the right hon. Gentleman got up—a few seconds before the House adjourned—and whispered something to the Clerk which nobody could hear. Then somebody said, "Merchant Shipping Bill—second reading, Monday;" and that was all anybody knew about it. He objected to 2 o'clock in the morning legislation; and, in order to prevent a recurrence of what had just happened, he should put down a blocking Notice against the Bill. He trusted that what had taken place would be a warning to the Government not to attempt legislation in whispers.

MR. T. E. SMITH said, that, after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, he would, with the leave of the House, withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ANNEXATION OF THE TRANSVAAL—MR. GLADSTONE'S LETTER TO MR. TOMKINSON.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON rose to call attention to a letter in The Times of 15th April, purporting to be written by the Right Honourable W. E. Gladstone to Mr. Tomkinson on the Transvaal War. He said: I believe that since Parliament sat this subject has been under discussion on several occasions in this House, and I wish to take the earliest opportunity of making my acknowledgements to my noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Kimberley) for the fair and considerate way in which whenever my name has been mentioned as one of those concerned in the annexation he has been good enough to deal with it. That makes me all the more sorry that I have to criticize the letter referred to in the Notice I have given. Ordinarily, I should not be prepared to take notice of a letter on a public subject; but this letter is of a somewhat different character from others. It is written by the Prime Minister, and it contains charges of such a very grave and dark character that it is hardly possible for me to avoid taking some notice of it. I think, therefore, the earliest notice which it is in my power to take is the best. The letter purports to be a letter from the Prime Minister to Mr. Tomkinson, who, I understand, was a Liberal candidate for West Cheshire. The earlier part of the letter I need not trouble your Lordships with; but I must read the concluding sentences. They are—

"I am glad that in your address in relation to the Transvaal you take the bull by the horns, and avow your approval outright. I can assure you that when we come to the discussion in the House of Commons I shall adopt no apologetic tone. It was a question of saving the country from sheer blood-guiltiness. I chiefly regret the discussion, because it will oblige us to go back and censure anew what it would have been more agreeable to spare."

There are three different points in these paragraphs. As regards the singular illustration of taking the bull by the horns, I was prepared for something very startling by the vehement metaphor with which it was ushered in; and I was, therefore, surprised when I found that all Mr. Tomkinson did say was that he strongly approved of the moral courage of the Government in their policy in the Transvaal. It is rather a moderate expression to evoke so strong a simile. The points which are of consequence are in the sentences which follow. When Mr. Gladstone says he regrets the discussion "because it will oblige us to go back and censure anew what it would have been more agreeable to spare," that sentence, as far as I can read it, can point only to one of two persons—either to Sir Theophilus Shepstone, who practically carried the annexation into effect, or to myself. Sir Theophilus Shepstone is a man whose name, until within the last few years, was not known in this country. He was one of those public servants of which this country has so many and feels so proud, whose whole lives are spent in the conscientious and faithful discharge of their duty abroad. His has been a very long and unblemished career; but I shall not attempt to defend him until I know more distinctly what are the charges made against him. It is only fair that the accusations against such a man should be formulated. Whenever any charge is directly made against him I am perfectly prepared to take my full share of responsibility in the matter; and I feel confident that I can put his conduct in a light which will satisfy your Lordships and the country. As regards myself and Mr. Gladstone's wish to spare censure, I have no desire to be spared in the matter at all. I ask for no forbearance, and I am prepared to face any charge that may be made against me in this matter. I would, however, venture to offer to the right hon. Gentleman a caution, and it is that when he makes these charges he should beware lest in his haste he involves some of his Colleagues in the common accusation. I cannot help thinking that my noble Friend opposite, the Colonial Secretary, expressed a very honourable and fair approval of the measure at the time. In the other House, the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster) never hesitated to declare his concurrence in the measure; and I believe that no fewer than four Members of the present Government voted in favour of the first Transvaal grant, while there were others who by their silence assented to it. I am not now going into any defence of the original annexation of the Transvaal; but when I hear the grounds on which it is attacked, I shall be perfectly prepared to defend it. At the time no voice was raised against it. Two years subsequently, in this House, when the question was mooted, I stated the facts, and there was not a shadow of opposition. It is not too much to ask now, if it is to be condemned on new grounds, that those new grounds should be distinctly and formally stated. When they are so stated I shall be perfectly prepared to defend the course I took, and to vindicate the course of the Government of which I was a Member. I pass on now to another point in one sentence of the letter, in which the right hon. Gentleman leaves the region of vague charges and comes to the more substantial ground, direct propositions. The right hon. Gentleman says, "It was a question of saving the country from sheer blood-guiltiness." I can truly say that when I read those words I was lost in astonishment as to what their meaning was. They are hard words. What does blood-guiltiness mean? Blood-guiltiness is a term you apply to murderers and other criminals of the highest degree of depravity. If the words had fallen from the lips of some irresponsible speaker perorating on the subject, I should not have troubled your Lordships or myself about them. But this is a very different case; these are the words of the Prime Minister; and they are not words spoken in the heat of debate; they are words coolly and deliberately set down in writing, and used as a manifesto at an Election, which was declared far and wide to be a test Election of public feeling. If there were blood-guiltiness at the time of adopting the policy, there must have been blood-guiltiness in continuing it; there must have been blood-guiltiness in fighting the battles of Majuba, Ingogo, and Laing's Nek, and, above all, in proclaiming in the Queen's Speech on the 6th of January that measures would be taken to vindicate the authority of the Crown. If this policy was right, it was right at every step; if it was wrong, it was wrong at every step. But it really seems to have been reserved to the Government to make this notable discovery after we had sustained three severe and heavy defeats; after one massacre which the late Parliamentary Papers show to have been treacherous and cold-blooded; and after a capitulation obtained by fraudulent means, promised to be cancelled, but which, as I understand, has never been so cancelled. And it is after this succession of events, that for the first time this discovery is made. I should be the last person to accuse anyone of blood-guiltiness; and it is not my practice to use hard words; but I must, in all coolness and deliberation, say, if there be real responsibility for this measure—I do not say conscious responsibility, but a real responsibility for the unhappy events which have taken place—that responsibility is to be found in the actions and words of the right hon. Gentleman himself, coupled with such acts as the appointment of Mr. Courtney to an Office in the Government. Nothing can be more certain than this—that the unfortunate speeches which he made in his Mid Lothian canvass contributed to produce these unhappy events. [Laughter.] My noble Friend seems to doubt it. [Earl GRANVILLE: Very much.] My noble Friend may doubt; but if there be one thing more certain than another it is that the words used then were taken up and carried from mouth to mouth, and have exercised a most sinister influence on the Boers of the Transvaal. Can it be wondered that it was believed the annexation would be reversed when they had the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman? Can it be wondered at that when that annexation was not cancelled their disappointment broke out into insurrection? The very leaders with whom you are in negotiation had appealed to the right hon. Gentleman's speeches, and in a remarkable Petition, signed by Dutch people in Holland, which, no doubt, your Lordships have read, the same confident language was held. When the reports of the right hon. Gentleman's speeches reached the Transvaal, they were printed and circulated with every kind of exaggeration and approval, and it was said that the Transvaal would be restored. But there came a telegram from this country that the annexation must be maintained. Upon which, the Boers said—"Then there is nothing for us but to saddle our horses and get out our arms." I do not here want to say anything of the terms on which this peace has been made. My noble and learned Friend (Earl Cairns), some few weeks ago, went at length into the subject. The Commission is at present sitting, and it may be wiser for the present to leave that part of the question alone. But I must venture on this occasion to express my very strong protest against the time and manner in which it has been made. I should have thought the reversal of the annexation under any circumstances most impolitic; but it might at least have been done without the discredit which now attaches to it. First, you might have abandoned it when you came into Office. Secondly, when the scheme of Confederation broke down you had a fresh point of departure. And there was another opportunity—you might have marched your army to Pretoria, and, probably, without shedding one drop of blood, laid down the terms on which you were prepared to grant peace. But you waited for three defeats, and an unfortunate capitulation, and then gave up everything the Boers had been demanding—terms which every officer and soldier and man of honour in the country know to be terms of humiliation and disgrace. Allow me, my Lords, to add one warning. The position of my noble Friend opposite is one of danger at the present moment. First, because he does not know with whom he is negotiating. Who are the negotiators? They are men—I wish to measure my words—whose hands are scarcely clean, I will not say from blood, but from complicity in blood foully shed. They are men who have scattered far and wide the grossest, most scandalous, and false accusations against English officers. They are men who have declared from first to last that they would take nothing short of independence from the Zambesi River to Simon's Bay; and, worst of all, men who have no real authority over their followers. They are powerless to execute that which they pledged themselves to carry out. Look at the evidence we have of the state of things to which this unhappy policy is bringing us. Compare the condition of the Transvaal now with what it was four years ago. It was then overrun with Native Tribes. It was bankrupt. There was only 12s. 6d. in the Exchequer. The Boers were trembling for their lives. We stepped in and saved them. Their cattle were preserved; their lives were saved; and the anarchy which existed gradually disappeared. Prosperity so far revived that the finance of the Province is not only in a state of equilibrium, but there is a large surplus. But, now, things have reached such a state that society has been resolved back to its original elements. There is no law which the magistrates can enforce. Property is disappearing throughout the country. Here and there a store may be open; but banks and shops are closing. Loyalists are outraged, pillaged, obliged to flee the country. The Natives threaten to rise against the Boers. And what of the Boer leaders? They are powerless. It requires very little foresight, indeed, to prophesy what must happen under these circumstances. Hardly anyone who knows anything about the state of things can doubt that as soon as your troops are withdrawn—perhaps sooner—you will have a fresh rising. The same state of anarchy will result in the same dangers and the same horrible outrages. But it may be said we shall gain the Dutch. While I was in Office nothing was nearer my heart, as far as Colonial policy was concerned, than to win the Dutch back to loyalty and affection; and I venture to say, without egotism, that, circumstances favouring me, I did more in that direction than any other Minister ever had done. I had then just as great a difficulty to solve with the Orange Free State as Her Majesty's Government have now. But I solved it, President Brand was satisfied; and if you now enjoy his loyal co-operation and help it is to that settlement with me that you owe it. I should be the last man to quarrel with conciliation; but this is not the way to win the Dutch. And there is something above the mere conciliation of any section of the community. Something is due to those Natives to whom you have pledged the good faith, honour, and protection of the Crown. Something is due to those loyalists who stood by us, shoulder to shoulder, in the Zulu War, and to whom we have made promises ever since we have been in possession of the Transvaal. Something is due to the English residents there, who have accepted the assurances of two successive Governments, three successive Secretaries of State, and two Governors, and on the faith of those assurances built houses and bought farms, and invested their capital in the country. Something is due also to the English Colonists of South Africa. And by all of these this action is condemned in language far stronger than any I have used, and will be condemned wherever the English name is known or the English tongue spoken. This is not the way in which the English Empire was won; nor is this the way in which it will be maintained. I wish I could think that by this unhappy measure you will secure the object you have in view. But, my Lords, there is no peace in this settlement. It is a house built upon the sand, and very soon to be swept away by the rising flood. You will find that this settlement will lead not only to the strife of races, but to further troubles and even bloodshed. But all this is now in a certain sense a thing past and irremediable. But one thing remains—and, as to this, with no Party feeling, I entreat Her Majesty's Government to be firm in their dealings with the Boers. They have, wisely or unwisely, committed themselves to certain terms. Those terms are laid down in certain telegrams, and in the Instructions to the Commission just issued. I do entreat Her Majesty's Government, having laid down those terms, to adhere to them. There is a feeling abroad that all concessions will be in vain, and that anything may be wrung and extorted out of the Government provided it is only pursued with sufficient pertinacity. I can conceive nothing so dangerous; nothing, to put it on the lowest ground, so expensive. When credit is lost, even the National Exchequer itself suffers. Dangerous it certainly is; because if once the impression gets rooted abroad that you can be driven from pillar to post, and that any concession may be wrung out of you by pertinacity and force of arms, then before long you will have to fight not only in the Transvaal and South Africa, but in India—anywhere and everywhere—for Empire and for very existence.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, the noble Earl has stated that the house we are laboriously endeavouring to build is crumbling away. I will remind my noble Friend that the house which he built has crumbled away, and it is because it has crumbled away entirely that we find ourselves involved in the difficulties we are now discussing. I have always admitted that my noble Friend was actuated by motives of the most honourable kind in what he attempted to do, and that he believed the policy he was pursuing would conduce to our interest in that part of the world. But when my noble Friend says that I entirely approved his policy, he is overstating the case. I have already explained in the House what I did say; but as my noble Friend has referred to the subject, I may be again allowed to state it. What I did say was that if my noble Friend was correctly informed that the Boers were disposed to acquiesce, the annexation of the Transvaal would be a boon to the Empire. But everything depended on their acquiescence. I entirely depended on the information possessed by the Government. I always thought it a disadvantage that there should be an absence of union among the States in South Africa, and I rejoiced that there should be an opportunity if based upon good reasons for uniting a large portion of South Africa to the Crown. But the result has shown that my noble Friend committed a most serious error of judgment. I can scarcely conceive a policy which has more completely and totally failed than the policy he pursued. I freely admit that we owe him a debt of gratitude for settling the difficulty with regard to the Diamond Fields and Griqualand West; but I am profoundly convinced that the whole of his policy in South Africa with that exception was the most complete and lamentable failure that could be. My noble Friend endeavoured to initiate a very wise policy if it could be effected—a policy of Confederation. I told him at the time that I thought his action on the question premature, and that he employed a very unwise agent in Mr. Froude. Anybody who has followed the course of Mr. Froude in South Africa must be convinced that if anyone could have wrecked a policy, Mr. Froude would have done so. Another mistake was the annexation of the Transvaal. When my noble Friend announced that he had committed himself to the Confederation policy, I thought it advisable that every effort should be made for its success. But my point is this—that in that policy, and also in the annexation of the Transvaal, he committed an error of judgment by forcing on a policy for which the country was not ripe. The policy was based on sand. With regard to the annexation of the Transvaal, I should have thought my noble Friend would require no proof that his policy has failed. What proof can be stronger than that three years after the annexation its reversal was pursued by a great portion of the Dutch population with as much energy and determination as in any insurrection I ever heard of? But then for this my noble Friend has an explanation of his own. He says the failure is owing to the speeches of Mr. Gladstone and the appointment of Mr. Courtney as Under Secretary at the Home Office. The latter it is impossible to connect with the question, for Mr. Courtney was not appointed Under Secretary until after the insurrection broke out. Well, Mr. Gladstone did undoubtedly make speeches on the question, and condemned the policy pursued. But anyone who has read the Blue Book on the subject and other publications must know that there was a continuous protest on the part of the Transvaal, showing itself in deputations to this country and in remonstrances addressed to Sir Michael Hicks-Beach; and there is no reason to date the disaffection of the Boers from the time Mr. Gladstone made the speeches referred to. I am perfectly free to admit, if we are to be blamed, that we did not foresee that those discontents would culminate in a serious outbreak against the Government. If I am to be blamed, it is for that. But those who will take the trouble to read the despatches I received will find that there was a most remarkable and continuous expression of opinion on the part of those best qualified to judge, from their position in the country, that the state of things was gradually growing better. It was said, I think, in some despatches that time and patience alone were required to bring about a happy result. There was a very interesting and important despatch from Sir Garnet Wolseley, dated in 1879, as to which he drew my attention to the fact that it had been omitted in the Papers laid before Parliament, and I complied with his request to produce it. In that despatch there was a strong expression of opinion that the Boers had a rooted dislike to English rule, and it has been argued that we ought to have inferred from that that Sir Garnet Wolseley's opinion was that there was danger in our position in the Transvaal. But there were later despatches from Sir Garnet Wolseley which by no means bore out his former opinion. I will refer to one of those despatches, the one dated April 10, 1880; which I take in preference to the others, because it was written either just before or just after I came into Office. In it Sir Garnet Wolseley says—

“Reports from all quarters of the Transvaal sustain the opinion that the people, being thoroughly weary of the uncertainty and the troubles attendant upon opposition to the Government, and seeing no hope of any successful issue from the dangerous measures in which they have been induced to place confidence, have determined to renounce all further disturbing action, and to return to the peaceful cares of their rural life, which was already beginning to suffer from the continuance of political irritation.”

Therefore, it is clear that Sir Garnet Wolseley, although he pointed out the rooted dislike entertained by the Boers for the English, was of opinion that there was no serious danger. And more than this, it was with his concurrence that the late Government reduced the garrison in the Transvaal to only three regiments. I have said that this accusation is the most difficult for me to meet; but I ask the House to consider the state of things that my noble Friend has described. Notwithstanding that you have improved the revenue and the administration of the Transvaal, and in spite of all the advantages which your rule may have brought into the country, so violent is the feeling of the population in favour of independence that they are determined to rise and cast away all those advantages, and at the expense of a severe contest, in order, if possible, to emancipate themselves from your rule. The fact is, that our rule failed in one essential condition—namely, in lacking the consent of the population. Everything turns on that. If the Transvaal had been a conquered country, or if the annexation had been effected on grounds other than the willing acquiescence of the people, then the policy that we have pursued might have been questioned; but if you have taken possession of a country on the express grounds that the White population are willing to accept your rule, and if you find them violently hostile to you after an experience of three years, the only question that you have to consider is how you may most satisfactorily divest yourself of your acquisition. There can be no doubt that the grounds on which my noble Friend opposite annexed the Transvaal have proved to be entirely false. Having dealt with that portion of our policy which has been so readily challenged, I come to the question underlying the phrase “blood-guiltiness.” My noble Friend seems to think it a most astonishing expression, and one that requires explanation; but, as it appears to me, the statement made in the letter of my right hon. Friend is little more than a truism. What he said may be said, with certain limitations, of every war that ever was begun. If you go on with a war and unnecessarily prolong it, you are undoubtedly shedding blood guiltily. But I suppose my noble Friend’s interpretation of the matter is that if there was blood-guiltiness in going on with the war at the moment when we stopped it, there was also blood-guiltiness in ever beginning it. Now, as a matter of fact, we did not begin it, but were ourselves attacked. We found an insurrection in the country, and all our garrisons were beleaguered; there was the affair of Bruncker’s Spruit, and we had nothing to do but to collect our forces and vindicate the Queen’s authority. Then, having collected our forces, it is suggested that we were bound to prosecute the war to the bitter end. But are we to be placed in this dilemma—to be bound either to submit to the insurgents and to grant all their demands, or, if we do not give them all they ask, to go on fighting till they are entirely subdued? That is a dilemma into which no Government ought to be forced. The real question was—was it, at the time when we made peace, in the interests of the country that we should do so? The question of blood-guiltiness is one of conscience, though the noble Marquess opposite may deny that conscience enters into such questions as this. It seems to be assumed throughout that if we had taken no steps to collect our forces, and had made no effort to resist the insurgents, we might still have made the same terms with them. But that is not at all the case. Anyone who reads the despatches will find that the demand was made that we should withdraw our garrisons; but we did nothing of the kind. And more than that, in the present state of things, the present question is this—Is peace finally concluded now? Not at all. What we concluded was an agreement preliminary to peace. And does it not make a considerable difference when you have to carry into effect certain terms whether you have a force at your back or not? Does my noble Friend suppose that, if we had taken no steps to vindicate the Queen's authority, we should now be in a position to make peace? Certainly not. It is a settlement which may be carried through; but it is one of very great difficulty. I concur with my noble Friend opposite that some firmness may be requisite; but I deny that it is the same thing now to negotiate as to have submitted to the insurgents at the first outbreak without making any movement at all to show that we were in a position to uphold our authority in South Africa. My noble Friend spoke of his desire to conciliate the Dutch. I do not think that we should be actuated simply by a desire to conciliate the Dutch, but by a desire for the good and prosperity of South Africa generally; and if a war of this kind be allowed to degenerate into a war of races, a state of things will be brought about which will make it almost impossible to maintain the Queen's authority in that country. When my noble Friend speaks of the possibility of maintaining the Queen's authority in the Transvaal, I reply that it was possible till we had the insurrection; but after it we were placed in this position—we could have maintained it permanently only by conquering the Transvaal Boers, and then we must have maintained a large force to keep them in subjugation. But would the country have borne the expense of such a force, and would it have been possible to avoid difficulties of the most serious kind with the Dutch population elsewhere? I think not; and, therefore, I regard the course that has been taken as just, and right, and sound, and conducive to the permanent interests of South Africa. As regards the present position of affairs, I am far from saying that I am without hope of a satisfactory settlement; but I am aware of the difficulties and dangers of the whole question, and will not speak in a too sanguine tone. But I am certain that the policy initiated by my noble Friend opposite could not have been maintained. Whether ours will be permanently successful, I cannot say; but our motives are as good as his, and I hope the chances of success are greater for our policy than for that which he pursued.

The DUKE of ARGYLL: No Member of the House need be surprised that my

noble Friend opposite should have taken a very early opportunity of saying something in vindication of the policy that he pursued in the Transvaal, and of repudiating the charges which have been leveled against him and against the Government with which he was connected. I confess, however, that, in my opinion, my noble Friend has not taken a very convenient course in raising this great question on a letter written by the Prime Minister in respect to certain electioneering proceedings in England. Having been myself procul negotiis for some weeks, I have not yet seen the letter; but when my noble Friend read it, I was glad to find that the words, though sharp and severe, fairly represented the grounds on which the present Government have acted. I was prevented from taking part in the debate raised some weeks ago by the noble and learned Earl opposite (Earl Cairns), and I shall not endeavour to answer the elaborate speech he made on that occasion. I am going to take a very simple course. There are some advantages in being out of Office, for one can speak the arguments that are in his own mind and need not be afraid of committing others with regard to any of the arguments so used. I wish to explain briefly to my noble Friend the course of argument which I pursued in my own mind when I assented to the course the Government took on this most difficult and delicate question. In the first place, let me say that during the conduct of the Opposition in the winter before last I never took any part in blaming the late Government for their transactions in the Transvaal. I believed that their policy was dictated by a sincere desire to promote the good of South Africa; and, what is more, I believed that the action of my noble Friend was taken upon such evidence as was procurable by him, that the annexation of the Transvaal was really either desired, or at least acquiesced in, by the great majority of the population. I will venture to say that there is no public man in this country, belonging to any Party, be it Whig, Radical, or Conservative, who would have cared to annex the Transvaal if he had believed that it was against the assent of the population. Such assent as was given at the time by my noble Friend who is now Secretary of State for the Colonies, was, as I very well recollect, for I sat next to him on the occasion, qualified by the supposition and assumption that the evidence and reports of our officers in South Africa were true, and that the great majority of the population were in favour of the annexation. I believe that the late Government took part in that transaction under the belief that that evidence was sound, and I think that their action was perfectly justified. Therefore, I never uttered one word blaming the foreign policy of the late Government in regard to the transactions in South Africa. I, therefore, come to the discussion of this question with a mind not only entirely unprepossessed against the late Government, but rather prepossessed in favour of the policy they took. A great deal has been said of the fact that when the present Government became responsible for the Speech from the Throne, a paragraph was inserted declaring our determination to re-assert the authority of the Crown in South Africa. Well, up to a period later than that, I myself saw no adequate ground for doubting the conclusion that the majority of the Transvaal Boers were in favour of our annexation. It was the universal report of all our officers that the malcontents were a small though active minority, that things would soon settle down, and that the annexation was popular in the country. My belief in these statements was not shaken until shortly before the action at Laing's Nek. Reports came to the Government before that date showing that the Boers, to the number of 4,000 men at least, had been congregated in various parts of the Transvaal for the purpose of asserting their independence. I believe that the whole fighting force of the Transvaal Boers could not be more than 8,000 men at the very outside; and when you have the fact that upwards of 4,000 men had congregated in arms to resist the authority of the Queen in that country, it became perfectly evident that our officers who sent the reports had been deceived, and that the idea of the general acquiescence in our dominion was wholly a mistake. It was under these circumstances, and before the action at Laing's Nek, that indirect negotiations, or—if that word should be considered too formal, and perhaps it is so—indirect communications were entered into with a view to peace. The question then arose, were those negotiations or communications with the view to peace to be stopped on account of the defeat at Laing's Nek? That was the question which came before Her Majesty's Government. I do not deny that there were great difficulties in this question. I know that the feeling of military men was universally, and I believe it is now almost universally, in favour of retrieving that defeat before the negotiations were completed. I do not put aside the opinion of soldiers. It ought always to be deeply respected. The honour of the Army is not to be lightly treated, and the sentiment of the Army ought to be respected; but, on the other hand, the opinion of soldiers—the feeling and sentiments of soldiers on such occasions—is not always a safe guide in political affairs. I confess that the evidence of fact in regard to the non-assent of the Boer population affected my own conscience deeply. I felt it might be said that we had taken the country of these people, as it were, by stealth. I could not for a moment feel that allegiance in the true sense of the word—that duty which men owe to the Government under which they have been born and bred—was owing to us by the Boer population. Therefore, I felt it was more than probable that there was a great majority of that population who might honestly say—"England has taken our country from us under a mistake; but she obstinately shuts her eyes to the evidence we have produced, and the deputations we have sent, and she will own to no wrong although she is committing a great wrong." Under these circumstances, I think it was not the duty of England to stop the negotiations for peace in consequence of the check at Laing's Nek. There were two other actions which followed that engagement; and let us look at the circumstances in which they took place. I believe Sir George Colley was a most gallant man and a most able and accomplished officer; but I have heard no soldier speak on this subject who did not admit that he handled his forces with great rashness on those two occasions. He exposed small bodies of men unsupported in situations where they could not be supported to overwhelming forces of the enemy armed in a manner that our men were not skilled to meet. In such circumstances, these military defeats were not to be weighed in the scale for a moment with the great political question before us. Our troops were beaten under circumstances in which they really had no opportunity of displaying their military valour. They were shot down at great distances by deer-stalkers rather than by soldiers. The question for consideration was, whether it was worth while to get a military triumph over the Boers and to stop all negotiations for peace? In dealing with this question we had to consider the nature of the forces by which our troops were defeated. The Boers are not an army; they have no regiments, and no artillery. They are simply armed farmers who are accustomed to deer-stalking, and who are fighting for the independence of their country. Now, I ask any soldier in this House whether a great military triumph could be obtained by conquering such men? None whatever. Who can doubt that the British Army which soon afterwards assembled, consisting of upwards of 10,000 men, had the perfect power of conquering the Boers? The Boer force could hold a mountainous position like Laing's Nek with great success; but on a plain they would not be able to stand for a moment against the British Army. In my opinion it was no question of military glory, it was a question of policy. Was it wise to stop our negotiations for peace for the sake of defeating farmers who had succeeded, under accidental circumstances, and by great rashness on the part of our commanders, in gaining a victory over us? That was the position of the Government, and I maintain that the Government came to the right decision, that the negotiations ought not to be stopped on that account. I entirely agree with the opinion expressed by my noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) that the question was entirely political and not military. In the event of our overcoming the Dutch population of the Transvaal, would that have tended to the restoration of permanent peace in South Africa? Looking to the undoubted sympathy of the Dutch population in the Cape Colony with the Transvaal Boers, there was a serious danger of involving that country in a war of races; the most calamitous of all things in any country, and a result which any Government is bound in duty to avoid, if possible. These were the main arguments which induced me, for one, to agree with the course which the Government have taken; and although, undoubtedly, it is a course which, owing to the previous policy of the Government and the mistakes they had been led into, was full of difficulty and danger, was, I have not the slightest doubt, the right policy to pursue. I entirely agree with my noble Friend opposite in trusting that the Government will now, in the conduct of the negotiations, be firm with the Boers, and give them clearly to understand that the authority of the Crown is to be maintained in South Africa in the fullest sense of the word suzerainty, and that we shall not allow any portion of that country to lapse into anarchy. There was one argument used by my noble Friend, the relations of the British Government to the Native population, which I cannot help saying has been greatly overstated. My noble Friend opposite says that in South Africa we have always made a point of reserving our relations with the Native States. What is the meaning of that? Look at what is going on at the present moment. The Cape Colony has been waging war against the Basutos contrary to the advice of the British Government. My noble Friend remonstrated, and his Representative in the other House made some observations which gave great offence in the Cape Colony. The conduct of the Sprigg Ministry towards the Basutos was pursued entirely independent of the advice of the British Government; and it is rather absurd to say that we are more responsible for our relations with the Natives in the Transvaal, which we have held only two years, than we are in the Cape Colony, which we have possessed for many years.

LORD BRABOURNE felt strongly that the policy pursued by Her Majesty's Government in South Africa would tend to produce the most disastrous results. It was said by the supporters of the Government that the Transvaal ought not to have been annexed except with the consent of a majority of the inhabitants. That, he was sure, was a doctrine which no one would dispute. Those who urged it forgot apparently that possibly enough the annexation of the Transvaal was desired by a majority of the inhabitants at the time it was effected, as being their only hope of safety, and that they changed their views only after the English Government had warded off the danger which threatened them. In any case the fact remained that a serious blow had been struck at our prestige in South Africa. He would be told, perhaps, that prestige was not a thing which a nation wanted, and he knew it was a word objected to by some of Her Majesty's Government. But what was prestige? In its conventional sense it was the reputation which a country possessed in the eyes of others. It was very much the same to a great country as credit was to a commercial house, and could equally little be dispensed with. It would be unbecoming of him to criticize the language of the Prime Minister's letter; but he would observe that it was a mistake to treat the literary productions of the right hon. Gentleman as those of an ordinary individual. It was well known that the speeches of the Mid Lothian campaign condemning annexation were quoted by the Boer leaders in justification of their rebellion against British authority, and his noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies would find these statements in his own Blue Book, which he could hardly have read if he denied that the Prime Minister's speeches had anything to do with the rising. Reference had been made to the massacre at Brunker's Spruit. That was one of the most disgraceful events he had ever heard of. He had carefully searched the Blue Books and had not found a single word from his noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies expressing his sorrow and indignation at what had occurred. What, in fact, did occur? A detachment of some 250 British soldiers, marching in long convoy and with no knowledge of any state of war, with women, children, and baggage, were stopped by the Boers and suddenly summoned to surrender. That war had not then been declared was proved by the very letter delivered to Colonel Anstruther by the Boers, in which they said—"We do not know whether we are in a state of war or not;" but that if he advanced, "we know what we will have to do in self-defence." Self-defence! when even while Colonel Anstruther was reading the letter, under cover of the flag of truce, the Boers were quietly advancing to positions they had before planned, the distances having been marked by them and a regular ambush laid. The Colonel sent a message back, asking for an answer, but immediately the Boers opened fire, without giving him any reply or any intimation that he was in the presence of a superior force. What would Lord Palmerston have done in such circumstances? He would have demanded explanations from the Boers; and if it had been found—as he believed it would have been found—that the act was beyond the usages of civilized warfare, atonement would have been exacted from the Boers, and the massacred troops would have been avenged. Nothing of the kind was done by his noble Friend. No more official notice was taken of the massacre of our soldiers than would have been taken of the killing of so many dogs. He had inquired of his noble Friend, more than once, whether the perpetrators of this outrage would be brought to justice, and the reply he had received was that the Commission would have power to deal with the matter, but that the amnesty would probably cover that act of the rebel Boers. Well, in the Instructions given to the Commission, there was not one word to call their attention to the occurrence, and it appeared as if the Boer version of the affair were to be calmly accepted, and the testimony of our own soldiers cast aside as worthless. The British soldier was not highly paid—his was not a lucrative service—but he did care for the honour of his flag, and up to the present time he had always known that he could rely upon the support and sympathy of his fellow-countrymen at home whilst fighting in distant lands. As far as the Government was concerned this support and sympathy had failed him now, and the Secretary of State for the Colonies seemed to consider the slaughter of British soldiers a matter of no moment. From what he heard he did not believe that the Boers were at all inclined to submit to the authority of the British Crown. His noble Friend could hardly expect it. Why, those men asserted that they were fighting for their independence and for the land of their fathers—a great portion of which, by-the-bye, had been pilched from the Natives within the last 20 years. But in his "Instructions" to the Commission his noble Friend proposed to cut off more than one-third of this land, either to be given to Native Tribes or kept under British authority. Did anyone in his senses suppose the Boers—exulting and victorious —were going to submit to this? Why, in the last Blue Book was printed their notice to a Native Chief not to assist “our enemies the English Government which we have already overthrown.” And again they say—“We alone are able to work out the English.” If we had defeated them, there might have been some show of generosity in our proceedings towards them; but as matters were the Boers, who, no doubt, considered themselves a match for us, would not tamely submit to our terms. There was no hope of tranquillity in South Africa until there was a law-abiding population, under a Government which would assert and enforce equal laws for all; and there was no Government which could and would do that save the British Government. It was well known that the Transvaal rebellion took its rise in the refusal of certain persons to pay taxes to the English, as they had previously refused to pay them to the Boer Government. He wished, too, to know what was to be done for the loyal inhabitants of the Transvaal, who had lost their all because they trusted England? There were good words concerning them, no doubt, in the Instructions; but what power would the Commissioners have to enforce their decisions, or to procure any redress for those men? Judging from appearances, he very much feared that we were only at the beginning of our troubles in South Africa, and he should be only too glad if the result should show that he had been mistaken in his prognostications.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: The only sense that can be attributed to the words of Mr. Gladstone’s letter are that he considers himself not responsible because no Boers were killed at Laing’s Nek or Majuba Hill, and only our own soldiers were sacrificed in vain; but any theologian will tell him that whoever wages an unjust war is responsible for those that fall on both sides. And Mr. Gladstone is responsible for the war, as he did not enter into any communications with the Boers after denouncing the annexation in his Mid Lothian speeches. As to the other matters referred to, I entirely concur with the speech of the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll).

NEW STANDING ORDER.

MR. E. STANHOPE moved the following new Standing Order:—

(Local Authorities to have a locus standi against Gas and Water Bills.)

“That the municipal or other local authority of any town or district alleging in their Petition that such town or district may be injuriously affected by the provisions of any Bill relating to the lighting or water supply thereof, or the raising of capital for any such purpose, shall be entitled to be heard against such Bill.”

The hon. Gentleman said, that anyone who undertook to propose any alteration in the Rules and Orders of the House, and still more anyone who ventured to invade the sacred precincts of the Court of Referees, incurred considerable responsibility. He possessed, however, some knowledge of the practice before Committees upstairs, and the Board of Trade with respect to Provisional Orders. In the first place, he must be allowed to say that although, undoubtedly, the object of his proposal was to overrule the Court of Referees, he did not intend any act of discourtesy towards that body, who rendered great and important services to the House. But the House would recollect that when any particular practice was objected to, and any wish expressed to alter a precedent established by the Court of Referees, the only way in which a re-consideration of the practice or precedent could be secured was by bringing the question regularly before the House, and proposing an alteration of the Standing Orders or a new Standing Order altogether. The proposal which he was about to lay before the House had no reference to any particular case, or to any particular place.

He desired only to discuss the matter as one of the general principles which ought to govern the relations between the local authorities and the Gas and Water Companies of their particular districts. As it stood at present, the Rule practically laid down by the Court of Referees in that House was that when a Gas and Water Company went to that House for the purpose of asking for additional capital, leave to oppose that proposal was not given by the Court of Referees to the local authorities. The object of this new Standing Order was to provide that when a Gas or Water Company came before Parliament, the local authority of the district should be entitled to be heard generally against such Gas or Water Company. Notice of an Amendment had been given by his hon. Friend the Member for East Kent (Mr. Pemberton), who was himself a member of the Court of Referees, and the object of the Amendment was to limit very much the proposal which he (Mr. Stanhope) made. His hon. Friend wished to lay down by the Amendment that the opposition was to be limited to any matter contained in or proposed to be enacted by the Bill. In his (Mr. Stanhope's) opinion, that would be far too limited a proposal. The practice which he desired to establish in that House was exactly the same practice as that which now existed at the Board of Trade in regard to applications for Provisional Orders. And it was the same practice as that which now existed in regard to Private Bills in the House of Lords. He thought that the local authority ought to have power to appear in the case of any application by a Gas or Water Company for an increase of capital. The Gas or Water Company possessed a monopoly practically limited in duration by the amount of its capital; and what was suggested by the Standing Order he now desired to propose was that whenever the Gas or Water Company desired to extend its capital and came to Parliament to ask leave for that purpose, Parliament ought to have the power of reviewing generally all the circumstances of the proposal, and of imposing any fresh conditions which the circumstances of the case might seem to require. In the first place, he thought that this was the manifest intention of Parliament. If not, why did not Parliament, when it first established Gas and Water Companies, give them an easy power by some simple process of acquiring the additional capital which might be necessary for the future development of their undertaking. Parliament decided that it would grant capital to a limited extent only, and that every subsequent application for additional capital must be made to Parliament itself, so that Parliament might have an opportunity of reviewing altogether the terms of the concession. If that were the intention of Parliament, surely it followed as the logical sequence that Parliament intended that the local authority who best represented the interests of the consumers of the particular district should have a locus standi before a Committee of the House, and should have an opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the manner in which the monopoly had been exercised, and of explaining whether there were any reasons why a further extension of capital should not be granted, or to suggest the terms on which it should be granted. It was now the constant practice of the local authorities to purchase these undertakings; and in consequence of the existence of that practice, and of the fact that Parliament usually gave its assent to it, it became more necessary to entrust the local authorities with the power of guarding against the unnecessary increase of capital on the part of these Companies. No doubt, in these days there was some safeguard by the introduction of "the auction" clauses; but perhaps he might be allowed to represent to the House that these clauses did not apply at all to Water Companies; and that, over and beyond anything covered by these clauses, there were many other points which had been developed by experience year by year, which showed that those who represented a particular district should be empowered to go before a Committee of the House of Commons. They were told that the passing of this new Standing Order would have the effect of increasing litigation. He could not see why that supposition should be entertained. The adoption of the same principle had not led to any undue litigation in the case of Provisional Orders, or in the case of Committees in the House of Lords. Then why should it be supposed that it would be likely to lead to litigation in this instance? There were one or two safeguards against undue litigation already in existence. First of all, the House would remember that a statutory power was given to every Committee of that House in any case where they considered the opposition to have been frivolous and vexatious, to inflict the costs upon the opposing parties. That power had already been exercised in not a few cases, and must have had the best possible influence upon local authorities in inducing them to abstain from opposing a Bill where their opposition would not be justified. In the second place, the operation of the Borough Funds Act of 1867 had also operated as a salutary check. That Act would be perfectly familiar to the House. Under its provisions it was absolutely necessary before any local authority could oppose a Gas or Water Bill, that it should obtain the sanction of a majority of the ratepayers at a meeting specially called for that purpose. He did not think that at this moment it was necessary to add anything to what he had now stated; but he would simply submit his proposal for the discussion of the House. He felt that the best mode, after all, of protecting the interests of the ratepayers, was to strengthen the hands of the local authorities. He believed, also, that this popular House of Parliament would not refuse to the local authorities the power which day after day, without jealousy and without inconvenience, was given by the House of Lords.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the municipal or other local authority of any town or district alleging in their Petition that such town or district may be injuriously affected by the provisions of any Bill relating to the lighting or water supply thereof, or the raising of capital for any such purpose, shall be entitled to be heard against such Bill."

—(Mr. E. Stanhope.)

MR. PEMBERTON moved, as an Amendment, in line 4, after the word "against," to insert the words "any matter contained in, or proposed to be enacted by." The hon. Member said, that in rising to propose the Amendment which stood in his name, he hoped the House would allow him very shortly to state, in order to explain the nature of the Amendment, what the practice in the Court of Referees was, how it had arisen, and how it was regulated. He thought that his hon. Friend had not described the course of the practice of the Court of Referees quite accurately, and he hoped that he should be able to set him right in one or two points. The Standing Order under which the Court at present acted was the one numbered 134, which said—

"It shall be competent for the Referees on Private Bills to admit the petitioner, being the municipal or other authority having the local management of the Metropolis, or of any town, or the inhabitants of any town or district alleged to be injuriously affected by a Bill, to be heard against such Bill if they shall think fit."

Under that Order the House would see that the power given to the Referees was optional. They might, as they thought fit or not, allow the local authority of any town or district alleged to be injuriously affected to be heard against the Bill. And he might say this—that in every case that had been before the Court, wherever any alteration was sought to be made, either in the quantity or the quality of the gas or water supply, or in the extension or diminution of the limits of the district, or in the price of the gas or water supplied, the Petitioners in every case had been admitted. They had gone further than that. They even admitted them in a case where the place of testing the gas was simply altered—where it was shifted from one place to another. They had considered that even so trifling an alteration formed a sufficient ground for their admission. The only cases in which they had ever been refused a locus standi were cases where it was simply sought to raise additional capital, and upon that point he must entirely differ from his hon. Friend who had moved this new Standing Order. Where new capital was sought to be raised it did not in any way increase or extend the monopoly, but it simply gave additional facilities to the Companies for the purpose of carrying out purposes which the Legislature had previously sanctioned and authorized. Of course, the Court of Referees were only anxious to carry out the Orders of the House, and it would relieve them, to a great extent, from very laborious duties if this Standing Order was carried. The House would observe that his Amendment did not in any way oppose the principle—as he understood the principle—of his hon. Friend's Motion. His

hon. Friend wished, in cases where additional capital was to be raised, that, as a matter of course, the Local Government Boards should be admitted. His (Mr. Pemberton's) Amendment did not deal with that in any way. He thought that a great deal might be said against that proposition. It might give rise to a great deal of increased expense and of unnecessary litigation; and in reference to the statement of his hon. Friend that the Local Government Boards were checked by the operation of the Borough Funds Act, he might point out to his hon. Friend that that was not so in practice, because, although the Local Government Board could not charge the rates without the previous consent of the inhabitants, yet they constantly in practice did it, and took their chance of getting it confirmed afterwards. On these occasions opposition was raised in many instances unnecessarily, and he thought with very great disadvantage and discouragement to people who had invested their money in undertakings which had already been sanctioned by the House. His hon. Friend had referred to the practice of the House of Lords and of the Board of Trade; but in neither of those cases could he draw a single argument in favour of his Resolution. The practice was entirely different, and could not be compared in any way to that of the House of Commons. In the House of Lords the same Committee decided on the merits of a Bill, and also the question whether the Petitioners should have a right to be heard or not. It was therefore as a matter of course that they were permitted to be heard in every case, because the Committee which decided the question of merits also settled the question of locus standi. With regard to the practice of the Board of Trade, the rule is this—Whenever a measure is proposed, an officer of the Board was sent down to the country, and he admitted everybody to state their objections as a matter of course. He did not think that his hon. Friend proposed that everybody, as a matter of course, should be allowed to petition against a Bill in that House. All he (Mr. Pemberton) proposed to do was to carry out what he believed to be already the Standing Order, and certainly the intention of the House. The object of his Amendment was simply to restrict the Petitioners to those points which were raised by the Petition and by the Bill. There was already a Standing Order, No. 128, which he was convinced had that object in view. It was in these terms—

“No Petition against a Private Bill, or Bill to confirm any Provisional Order or Provisional Certificate, shall be taken into consideration by the Committee on such Bill which shall not distinctly specify the ground on which the Petitioner objects to any of the provisions thereof; and the Petitioner shall be only heard on such grounds so stated; and if it shall appear to the said Committee that such grounds are not specified with sufficient accuracy, the Committee may direct that there be given in that Committee a more specific statement in writing, but limited to such grounds of objection so inaccurately specified.”

He thought that on reading that through for the first time the impression on the House would most certainly be that it was intended that in no case of any Private Bill should the Petitioners be entitled to be heard, except on grounds of objection to the Bill stated in their Petition. But in practice it had been held that these words did not go far enough; that although, as far as any objection taken to a provision of the Bill there must be a distinct ground of such objection stated in the Petition, yet it did not in terms say that in a case where something was raised in the Petition which was not raised by the Bill, the Petitioner should not be heard on any such statement. He thought nobody could read that Standing Order without being convinced that that was the intention of the framers of the Order and of the House in passing it. All that his Amendment did was in the way of general application; but, of course, as the proposed new Standing Order applied only to Gas and Water Bills, it would at present apply only to Gas and Water Bills, although he thought it was one which should be of general application, and which, he believed, only carried out the existing Order No. 128. In this case, he thought it would not in any way interfere with his hon. Friend's proposal. It would in no way prevent a Petitioner from stating any objection to a Bill, and it would not prevent them from being heard as to their objection. It would only prevent, in the first case, a Petitioner raising something for the first time of objection which was in no way contemplated by the Bill, and which was really not one of the issues between the parties. He thought he might give an illustration of a practice which he thought very objectionable, and which he thought the Amendment would remedy. During the present Session the South Eastern Railway Company—a Company with which he had no connection whatever—brought in a Bill simply to enable them to purchase an existing railway of a few miles in length, made by a private Company. In the way of objections, there were allegations raised by the Petitioners against the Bill that the fares charged by the Railway Company, not on the particular line they were about to purchase, but on an entirely different part of their system, were too high, and they asked the Committee appointed simply to inquire into a question whether one Railway Company might sell to another Railway Company their existing undertaking, to go into the whole question of rates and tolls charged by the purchasing Company in an entirely different district. There was a Committee now sitting on the general question of railway rates which might be a fitting tribunal to enter into such matters; but he did not think that on a Bill which in no way raised issues of that sort, the Petitioners should be allowed to spring a mine upon a Railway Company and propose to undo that which the Legislature only a few years before had carefully inquired into and sanctioned. With these few observations he would move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

COLONEL MAKINS seconded the Amendment. He thought that a new Standing Order was hardly necessary at all; and it appeared to him that, to some extent, it cast reflections upon the Court of Referees and their action in the past. But even if the House considered that a new Standing Order was to some extent necessary, he was quite sure it was only fair that it should be qualified in the manner proposed by the Amendment. His hon. Friend below (Mr. E. Stanhope) had stated with regard to Gas and Water Companies that they had a monopoly; but he forgot to state that that monopoly was a restricted one, and that it was accompanied by compulsory provisions requiring them to carry out the business they undertook, and to supply the public with the article water or gas they were empowered to produce or distribute. Therefore, under these circumstances, there was no inducement on the part of a Company to come to Parliament for fresh capital, because since the adoption of the auction clauses and the sliding scale initiated by Mr. Forster's Committee some years ago, it was absolutely of no advantage whatever to a Company to increase their capital. If this Standing Order passed in the words proposed by his hon. Friend, a direct encouragement would be given to the local authorities to interpose with roving Petitions in every case where a Company asked for new capital, and they would be induced to go behind the Bill and raise questions that long ago had been settled on general principles by Committees of that House. The adoption of the Standing Order would also have another effect that would be very unfair to a Company and very undesirable, for it would enable a Corporation who had an intention of acquiring the business of a Company first to attack them in Parliament when they applied for power to raise new capital, and then, having reduced the value of the undertaking by attacking it in Parliament, they might be able to purchase it more cheaply. The Company was bound to supply gas or water, and was bound to come to Parliament, as their district extended, for further powers; and it was certainly not in accordance with his ideas of fairness that in endeavouring to fulfil a responsibility forced upon them by Parliament they should be subjected to the cost and injury which the adoption of this new Standing Order would throw upon them. As he knew there were other Members of the House who wished to speak upon the subject, he would content himself with having stated the views of the Companies and with having seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In line 4, after the word "against," to insert the words "any matter contained in or proposed to be enacted by."—(Mr. Pemberton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. MAPPIN expressed a hope that the House would agree to the Motion of the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln (Mr. E. Stanhope). He could assure the House that under the present Standing Orders considerable difficulties were placed in the way of Municipal Corporations and other local authorities in opposing Bills of this nature. In a town with which he was connected—Sheffield—these difficulties had been felt only this very year. A Bill had been introduced into Parliament to increase the capital of the Water Company there; but the Corporation had been unable to have their objections to the Bill explained to a Committee, although very considerable differences existed between the inhabitants and the Water Company, and a very large sum of money had been expended in obtaining a legal decision in reference to those difficulties, and the Water Company were requested to have the matter definitely settled by a clause being introduced into their Bill before the present Session of Parliament, but which they declined to comply with, and the Corporation had no locus standi, the Bill being promoted only for the raising of additional capital.

MR. STAVELEY HILL hoped he might be allowed to say a word in favour of the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for East Kent (Mr. Pemberton). The original proposition for a new Standing Order might very well, he thought, be negatived. It was proposed that there should be an alteration of the existing Standing Orders, and that the local authorities should have power to oppose all applications by Gas and Water Companies for obtaining additional capital. The question then arose as to the extent to which this power of petitioning should be limited, and he fully endorsed all that had been said by his hon. Friend the Member for East Kent. The new Order proposed by the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln was not drawn, in his opinion, with sufficient care. It would allow the local authorities on presenting a Petition to go into a great variety of extraneous questions. He was quite sure he should have the assent of the Chairman of Ways and Means when he said that it would be much better to keep the parties, when they went before a Committee, to the absolute issue that was raised by the Bill. Let them come in and have full opportunity of being heard on the matters proposed by the Bill; but do not allow them to enter widely into questions which had nothing whatever to do with the Bill. The least the House could do, if they adopted the proposed Standing Order at all, would be to adopt it with the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for East Kent.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The question which has been raised by the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln is one which, on the one hand, is largely interesting to the directors and shareholders of Gas and Water Companies, but which, on the other hand, interests most directly the various local authorities throughout the country who think they are prejudiced by the present practice, which prevents them from appearing to oppose these Companies when they come to ask Parliament for power to raise additional capital. As representing the Board of Trade, I have given the most careful consideration to the matter, and I have come to the conclusion that the proposal of the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln is one that the House would do well to adopt. In saying that I beg to observe that I do not conceive that I am in the slightest degree casting any imputation upon the action of the Referees. This action, however, appears to have become much more stringent in the last few years than it formerly was. I received a letter this morning from Mr. William Livesey, the Secretary of the Gas and Water Companies' Association, and in that letter he says—

“I have been engaged in Parliamentary matters more than 30 years, and as Secretary to this Association more than 12 years; and, so far as my knowledge extends, the rule has always been that when a Company applies for power to raise additional capital the local authority is entitled to inquire into all its powers.”

It is only recently that the Standing Orders Committee have refused this privilege universally to the local authorities. Mr. Livesey goes on to say—

“Although this latter part has not always been adhered to, I believe that, notwithstanding the recent decisions on the question of locus standi, this is the general understanding of the Provincial Companies at the present time, and that there is no desire on their part to alter it. If, however, the decisions are upheld, the Companies will, of course, take every opportunity of turning them to account.”

I agree with the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln that there are no grounds why this House should not agree to the practice already adopted by the House of Lords and by the Board of Trade in the case of applications for Provisional Orders. The hon. Member for East

Kent (Mr. Pemberton) says the two cases are not analogous. To that I assent; but, at the same time, I must be allowed to say that the result of the practice in the House of Lords is that the local authorities have there this power of opposing which is denied to them under the interpretation of the Standing Orders of the House of Commons. I regret that I cannot see my way to the acceptance of the Amendment which has been proposed by the hon. Member for East Kent. That Amendment would have the effect of limiting the proposal of the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln, and would make it practically of no effect at all. Mr. Livesey, in his letter, points this out very clearly. He says—

“If a Company exhausts its capital or uses all its land it is obliged to come to Parliament for further powers; but it is hardly possible to conceive a case in which a Company would be obliged to come to Parliament for an alteration of the price they are charging or the illuminating power of the gas they are supplying; and under the proposed Amendment, so long as these points were carefully excluded from the Bill, the public would not be entitled to inquire into them.”

MR. PEMBERTON begged the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. The effect of his Amendment would be to allow the local authorities to be heard on everything relating to the proposed additional capital.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Precisely; but they would not be entitled, on the proposal of a Company to double its capital, to raise any question as to the quality of the water or gas supplied or the price charged. That is, I think, a most important matter. At the present time the great majority of the Gas Companies are not under the sliding scale system. The first thing to be done in connection with the sliding scale system is to fix the initial price, and in that question the local authorities have the greatest possible interest as representing the communities. And yet, under the Standing Orders, with this Amendment of the hon. Member for East Kent, the local authorities would not be entitled to appear. The only objection of any force which has been taken to the proposal of the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln is that it would have the effect of seriously increasing the cost of Private Bill legislation. I do not deny that there is some force in that objection; but I would submit to the House that if this litigation is expensive, that is a reason for altering the process of litigation and for endeavouring to substitute another and less expensive mode, but is no reason for shutting the door against those who desire to be heard against the proposals of a Private Bill. Under these circumstances, I hope the House will reject the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Kent and accept the proposal of the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR (who was very indistinctly heard): I am sorry to disagree with my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade with regard to the Amendment which has been submitted by the hon. Member for East Kent, and I shall certainly feel it my duty on this occasion to vote for that Amendment. I entirely agree with the proposition that the local authorities should have a locus standi to be heard against every Bill which affects the interests of the locality they represent. The only difference between the Motion and the Amendment is that the latter limits this right to the subject-matter of the Bill, and does not open up past issues settled formerly by often protracted and expensive contests. Recent legislation in regard to Private Bills has kept in view the necessity of diminishing, as far as possible, the expense of promoting Private Bills, whether it be incurred by a Municipality or by a private Company. I think that the effect of the proposal of the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln would be to bring every Private Bill affecting a Municipality before a Committee upstairs, and would enable the local authorities to rake up every question that may have been decided by previous legislation, and might consequently increase enormously the cost of promoting a Private Bill. Let me give an instance in order to show how seriously the adoption of the proposal now submitted to the House may affect the public interests in a particular locality. Suppose that a Company desires to obtain facilities for the supply of water or gas to the suburbs of a town, and for that purpose asks for power to raise additional capital. If the local authorities have the right of opposing them in regard to the powers they already possess, the Company will naturally be afraid of coming to Parliament on account of the excessive expense they might incur. They will therefore refrain from petitioning for a Bill and asking for additional capital, and the suburbs in question would be deprived of the benefit they would derive from the extension of the supply of gas or water. The mere extension of works, for which Parliamentary authority is required, might be made the ground for a renewed contest all along the line. I think, therefore, that it would be inexpedient to give the local authorities, on a question of raising additional capital, a locus standi in matters relating to the quality of the water or the supply of water, or to the quality of the gas or the supply of gas, when these questions have once been decided. I do not think it would be right, in such a case, to allow the local authorities to rake up every question that has been previously decided, for this would inflict great expense not only upon the private Company promoting the Bill, but upon the Municipality itself, and it must be borne in mind that this double expense ultimately falls on the consumer. I see nothing, however, but advantage in asking for a locus standi on the subject-matter of the Bill. For these reasons, I am prepared to support the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for East Kent.

MR. RODWELL was anxious to say a few words upon the question before the division took place. He had had a considerable amount of practical experience, and he certainly agreed to the principle of the proposition made by the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln. He also agreed with his right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Lyon Playfair) as to the danger of allowing the municipal authorities to be heard in opposition upon points that had no connection with the subject-matter of the Bill. The state of things in regard to Water Companies and the municipal authorities was very different from what it was a few years ago. The relations with these Companies now with the public were of such a description that it was necessary that Gas and Water Companies should be opposed when they went to Parliament for the purpose of increasing their capital, because that increase of capital involved a great many considerations, which might be fairly raised before a Committee. He should be the last person to say a word in disparagement of the Referees, who had rendered such great service to Private Bill Committees by lessening time and expense; but while he recognized the principle of the Standing Order proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincoln he should certainly vote for the Amendment.

SIR JOHN MOWBRAY admitted the long experience which his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Rodwell) possessed; but he begged to say at once that, as far as his judgment went, he should support the original Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincoln, for the considerations which had been so well put by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. The Motion of the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln was not intended as a reflection upon the Court of Referees, but to assimilate the practice of that House with that of the House of Lords and of the Board of Trade. He hoped his hon. Friend the Member for East Kent (Mr. Pemberton) would not put the House to the trouble of a division.

MR. WHITLEY entertained a strong feeling in favour of the Motion which had been made by the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln (Mr. E. Stanhope), and was quite satisfied that the Municipalities, as a body, would be much indebted to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade for giving his support to the Resolution. He was sure he was expressing the feeling of everyone who had anything to do with municipal government when he said that they always felt a great difficulty in opposing any provisions submitted in a Private Bill by Gas and Water Companies. Representing, as they did, the localities, and bearing in mind the interests that were at stake when measures of this kind were promoted, they felt that they should always be allowed the opportunity of going before Parliament whenever such Bills were submitted.

Question put.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the municipal or other local authority of any town or district alleging in their Petition that such town or district may be injuriously affected by the provisions of any Bill relating to the lighting or water supply thereof, or the raising of capital for any such purpose, shall be entitled to be heard against such Bill.

Ordered, That the said Standing Order (Local Authorities to have a locus standi against Gas and Water Bills) be a Standing Order of this House.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (HALIFAX, &C.) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HIBBERT, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the Boroughs of Halifax and Leeds and the City of Manchester, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HIBBERT and Mr. DODSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 158.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (ACTON, &C.) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HIBBERT, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the Local Government Districts of Acton, Buxton, and Crompton, the Port of Harwich, the Improvement Act District of Llandudno, the Borough of Monmouth, the Local Government District of Normanton, the Borough of Pontefract, the Local Government District of Wallasey, the Borough of Walsall, the Improvement Act District of Wath-upon-Deane, and the Local Board of Health District of Woolwich, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HIBBERT and Mr. DODSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 159.]

QUESTIONS.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—SUB-INSPECTORS.

MR. FAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it the case that, when the pay of the Irish Constabulary was increased in 1872, the sub-inspectors were the only members of the Force whose work was increased by the enlargement of their districts, and yet they got the smallest addition to their pay; so small, in fact, that it did not do more than cover the extra travelling expenses consequent on the enlarged district; is nearly half the income of Constabulary officers made up of "allowances;" and, is it the case that these "allowances" are ignored when pensions are calculated, whereas in all other branches of the Civil Service the officials have one fixed sum for salary, on the whole of which their pensions are calculated?

MR. W. E. FORSTER was understood to say it was the case that when the pay of the Constabulary was increased in 1872 the sub-inspectors were the only members of the Force whose work was increased. Between 1874 and 1877 the number of sub-inspectors was reduced. It was again increased last year; but it was still under what it was in 1874. The sub-inspectors received considerable allowances, and, as a general rule, the allowances were not taken into account when the pensions were being calculated.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF CHARLES FROST AND EDWARD SMITH.

MR. WARTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention in the case of Charles Frost and Edward Smith (who were on the 1st of November 1878 convicted of burglary, but who being subsequently shown to be innocent received on the 26th of August 1880 a free pardon) to recommend that they, or either of them, should receive any compensation or solatium in the shape of money or otherwise?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that after careful inquiry into this case he had come to the conclusion that it was a case of mistaken identity, and consequently he had advised that a free pardon should be given to those men. But he did not find that the circumstances of the case brought it within the very rare instances in which compensation had been made for the miscarriage of justice. He was happy to say that, as to one of the men, he had been able to find employment for him in the Public Service, for which the man had expressed himself grateful. The other man he had heard nothing of since.

CURRENCY—MONETARY CONFERENCE AT PARIS—BI-METALLISM.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the mission of Sir Louis Mallet to Paris, who is understood to have gone thither with a view of taking part in the Monetary Conferences, is to be interpreted as giving any sanction on the part of Her Majesty's Government to the project of conferring a fictitious value on one of the metals employed as currency, and of aiding whatever consequences may reasonably be anticipated from the adoption of what is called "Bi-metallism?"

MR. GLADSTONE: In answer to the Question of my hon. Friend, what

I have to state is this. The French and American Governments have accepted the terms on which the delegates were to be sent, on the part of India, to the Monetary Conference before these delegates were nominated, and therefore the view supposed to be entertained by Sir Louis Mallet does not enter into the question. The terms upon which the attendance of the British delegate was accepted were these—The Secretary of State for India, in Council, would not be held by his actions to commit the Government of India to any act or proceeding in the nature of the adoption of the principle of bi-metallism. He was unwilling to encourage the expectation of any material change in the monetary policy of India; but he would favourably consider any measure for adoption in India calculated to promote the re-establishment of the value of silver. That is the extent of the pledge given; and I do not believe there is any necessity for making any additional proposal.

ARMY—PORTABLE ENTRENCHING TOOLS.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any, and, if so, what, steps have been taken with a view to providing English infantry regiments or portions of such regiments with portable entrenching tools, such as have long been in use in the Austrian and Roumanian armies; and, if not, whether he can state the reason why such equipment is deemed unnecessary or undesirable?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to the hon. Baronet, I have to state that this question has not been neglected. Two hundred and eighty-five Roumanian spades were issued last year to eight battalions for trial. The reports were generally satisfactory; the spade was well adapted for use in light soil, but not in heavy or hard soils. Seventy spades, of a pattern recommended by the School of Military Engineering, are now being tried in the same battalions. This spade is longer than the other, and has a different shaped head. A portable spade is included in the proposed equipment for the Infantry soldier, and the Roumanian spade can be so carried. Three thousand spades of this pattern have been sent to South Africa; but the question as to the best portable entrenching tool is not yet settled.

STATE OF IRELAND—ALLEGED FORCED LABOUR.

MR. BURT asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to an article which appeared in the "Newcastle Chronicle" of the 3rd instant, under the heading of "What the Miner's Agents saw in Galway," in which, among other statements of great hardship and poverty suffered by the tenants and labourers, it is declared that a system of slavery and forced labour exists in that part of Ireland; whether, in particular, he has noticed the following passage:—

"Mr. Bryson remarked, on the principle that a horse may be led to the water yet he cannot be made to drink, that, after going to the landlord's place by compulsion, they need not work harder than they liked; but he was met by the retort from the men to the effect that the agent, or some one deputed by him, stood over the tenant, armed with a stout cudgel, which he did not fail to lay on to the back and shoulders of the tenant if he showed any signs of shirking his work. The exclamation 'Impossible!' broke out from both of us involuntarily, as we could not for one moment realise that such a system of slave-driving could exist. Up jumped one of the men before us, a respectable-looking man enough, who told us that if we had the slightest doubt on this matter of the stick, he would then and there strip to the skin, and show us undeniable evidence of the beatings he had sustained, the shape of sundry bruises and discolouration which he had received at the hands of the bailiff;"

whether he can confirm, contradict, or give any information relative to these statements; and, if they are true, whether he can do anything to afford protection to these tenants and labourers against the infliction of such gross cruelties and indignities upon them?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The hon. Member was kind enough to show me the newspaper from which he has made an extract, and I cannot believe that there is any truth in the statements referred to. I have received no information, either official or otherwise, which tends in the slightest degree to confirm them, and I really think the statements appear to be quite incredible.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman had received information contradicting those statements?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: If the House looks at this Question, it will see that it is utterly impossible for me to have received such information. The statement is that injury has been inflicted on some persons in the county of Galway. I do not suppose that anyone who is in official communication with me is acquainted with everybody in the county of Galway. We have never received any information which gives us the slightest reason to believe it is true, and I do not believe it.

STATE OF IRELAND—RELIGIOUS PROCESSIONS IN BELFAST.

MR. BURT asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state whether it is true, as reported in the Belfast newspapers, that three Primitive Methodist Ministers have been summoned before the magistrates of that town and sentenced to fourteen days' imprisonment for singing hymns and conducting a procession through the streets, though it was proved by the testimony of the policemen who prosecuted that the procession was most orderly and well-behaved; and, whether, if this is true, the conviction was legal; and in any event he will obtain an explanation regarding a sentence apparently extremely severe under the circumstances?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I find that three Primitive Methodist ministers were summoned before the Belfast borough magistrates, under the Borough Act, which provides that any person who shall be guilty of riotous or indecent behaviour shall be liable to a penalty of 40s. In two cases the defendants were fined 40s., and in default to be imprisoned 14 days. The case against the third was adjourned, and an appeal is to be heard on the 17th instant. I cannot pronounce any opinion on the legality of the conviction. I am informed that singing hymns in the public streets, accompanied by a large crowd, was considered to be an offence; and I must remind my hon. Friend and the House that very frequently crowds and processions in Belfast have excited serious disturbance.

THE ISLANDS OF THE SOUTH PACIFIC—MURDER OF BRITISH SUBJECTS.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he can state the number of British subjects murdered since the 1st of January 1880, including the officers and crews of the "Ripple," "Esperanza," "Lolia," "Mystery," "Borealis," "Dauntless," "Annie Brooks," and H.M.S. "Sandfly," in the Pacific, and how many of the murderers have been tried at Levuka or elsewhere?

MR. GRANT DUFF: I fear it is but too true that not a few British subjects have recently been murdered by savages in the Pacific; and if the right hon. and gallant Admiral will repeat his Question some day next week—perhaps on Thursday—I will endeavour to get full particulars for him.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE BASUTOS (NEGOTIATIONS).

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true that the Basutos have rejected the terms of peace, that an Africander Ministry is about to be installed in Cape Town, that a repudiation of British sovereignty is imminent in consequence of the general disgust at the Transvaal Peace, that the governor, Sir Hercules Robinson, is now 1,000 miles away in the Transvaal, and that a Colonist of influence is on his way to England with claims against the Home Government to the amount of £5,000,000 from loyal Colonists who are being driven out of the Transvaal; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will state what steps they propose taking to preserve British sovereignty and the ten million pounds' worth of yearly trade between this Country and South Africa?

MR. GRANT DUFF: We have not heard that the Basutos have rejected the terms of peace, nor have we any news from Basutoland. The new Cape Ministry seems a very fairly representative one, so far as we can judge from the lists which have appeared. A repudiation of British sovereignty is not imminent. Sir Hercules Robinson is, I should think, quite 1,000 miles from Cape Town, though in constant telegraphic communication with that place. He is not in the Transvaal, but in Natal. We have heard nothing of the influential Colonist; and I should regret that any Colonist, influential or otherwise, had embarked upon what could hardly be described as "a wise man's errand." In reply to the hon. Member's sixth and last Question, I would say that it will be my duty to answer it pretty fully when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) makes his intended Motion; but that to do so now, even in the most cursory manner, would oblige me to tax the patience of the House to an altogether intolerable extent.

FRANCE AND TUNIS—INVASION OF TUNISIAN TERRITORY.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any assurance has been given in writing to Her Majesty's Government by the French Government to the effect that the French Forces will be withdrawn from Tunisian territory as soon as the Kroumir question has been disposed of?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Her Majesty's Government have received no written assurance to this effect from the French Government; but the French Minister for Foreign Affairs has more than once disclaimed in his conversations with Lord Lyons any intention on the part of the French Government to annex Tunis. The latest assurances given to Lord Lyons by M. Barthélemy St. Hilaire, which were of a very decided character against conquest or annexation, have already been made known to Parliament by my noble Friend, Lord Granville.

STATE OF IRELAND—ALLEGED OUTRAGE AT BALTINGLASS.

MR. M'COAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state to the House the Report received from the Irish Police authorities respecting an alleged riot at Baltinglass on Thursday last, in which, according to the Dublin correspondence of the "Times" of Saturday, many Protestant houses were wrecked, and other serious outrages committed? He wished to add that he had received telegrams contradicting the report, and stating that it was a case of a few boys throwing some stones, the matter being grossly exaggerated.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: All I can say is, I have not yet received sufficient information with regard to this matter, and the hon. Member will be kind enough to repeat the Question on Thursday or Monday.

LAW AND POLICE—ELIZABETH BURLEY.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the letters of Elizabeth Burley and Mr. Alfred Dyer, in the "Daily News" of yesterday, Monday 9th May, the former asserting her innocence of the conduct imputed to her, and the latter detailing circumstances and the opinions of others in confirmation of her assertion; and, whether he will deem it right to cause inquiry to be made by an impartial person with such care and discretion as an investigation into the character of a woman demands?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, if this poor girl were innocent, there was no doubt that a great wrong had been done her, and she was entitled to entire sympathy and redress; and he was sure that his hon. and learned Friend would not doubt that he was as anxious as he was that entire justice should be done to her. When he was questioned on this subject, he was bound to answer according to the information which was accessible to him. Anyone conversant with this painful class of cases must know how difficult it was, in the midst of prejudice by which such cases were surrounded, to arrive at the exact truth. When called upon to form a judgment in this instance, he did not think it right to rely on the statement of the girl herself, or upon the statement of the police, both of which would be naturally biassed. He looked rather to the surrounding circumstances, and to the statements of unprejudiced witnesses and persons not likely to be deceived. In the proceedings before the magistrates, the chaplain, who had acted as the girl's friend, made a statement which appeared to be altogether inconsistent with his belief in her innocence. At the conclusion of the proceedings, one of the magistrates who heard the case said he had had some conversation with the unfortunate girl, and that she had expressed her willingness to act properly if anything could be done for her. The Chairman said he "could do no more." If the magistrates had been of a different opinion, they would have condemned the conduct of the police, which they did not do. His (Sir William Harcourt's) position was not an easy one. He had, on the one hand, to take care that no one was molested on unjust suspicion, nor, when justly suspected, that they were harshly dealt with; but, on the other hand, he had to see that the police were not deterred by unfair accusations from the discharge of a difficult duty. He had already stated that if the girl was not innocent the police had acted with a want of discretion for which they would be severely reprimanded. If the girl was innocent, the case would assume a different aspect, and would have to be dealt with in a different manner. If an innocent girl was pursued with unjust suspicion, she was entitled to all the reparation that could be afforded her. He had already directed that inquiry should be made and the facts ascertained by all the means at his disposal. If his hon. and learned Friend could suggest any more effectual manner of dealing with the matter, he should be most happy to co-operate with him for arriving at the exact truth of the case.

PARLIAMENTARY OATHS (MR. BRADLAUGH).

MR. PARNELL rose to put a Question to the Chief Secretary for Ireland, when—

MR. BRADLAUGH, who had been standing below the Bar, advanced again to the Table, and, amid cries of "Order!" from Mr. Speaker and the House, said: I am here, Sir, in order that I may fulfil the duty imposed upon me by Law, as a duly elected Member, and take the Oath required by Law.

MR. SPEAKER: The House has already ordered that Mr. Bradlaugh, upon presenting himself to take the Oath, should withdraw below the Bar. Until the House has otherwise ordered, I shall consider that that Order of the House is in force; and I, therefore, in fulfilment of my duty to this House, call upon Mr. Bradlaugh to withdraw.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Most respectfully I submit, Sir, that the Order of the House is illegal, and I refuse to obey.

MR. SPEAKER: In discharge of the Order of the House, I call upon the Serjeant at Arms to remove Mr. Bradlaugh.

The Serjeant at Arms accordingly conducted him below the Bar.

MR. BRADLAUGH, standing at the Bar: It is my intention to refuse to obey the Order of the House, as it is illegal.

Sir William Harcourt

MR. SPEAKER: The House has been the witness of the course taken by Mr. Bradlaugh, and my powers in this matter being exhausted, I must ask the House for instructions as to the course to be taken, so as to secure the orderly conduct of Business in this House.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I do not know, Sir, whether I am to conclude from the silence of the Leader of the House and of the Government that it is his intention to pursue upon this occasion the same course which he pursued upon former occasions. When an intimation is given to me that it is the intention of the Leader of the House to make any proposal I shall resume my seat, considering that it is more appropriate for him to take steps to support your authority and the Order of the House than it is for a private Member. But, in the absence of any such intimation, I beg to make a Motion, and the Motion I shall submit to you is this—

"That the Serjeant at Arms do remove Mr. Bradlaugh from the House, until he shall engage not further to disturb the proceedings of the House."

It appears to me that this meets the case. It is necessary that the Order of the House should be preserved. We have no desire to press anything in the shape of penal infliction upon Mr. Bradlaugh; but we think it absolutely essential that we should take steps to preserve the peace and order of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Serjeant at Arms do remove Mr. Bradlaugh from the House, until he shall engage not further to disturb the proceedings of the House."—(Sir Stafford Northcote.)

MR. GLADSTONE: I think the right hon. Gentleman has made a Motion which, from his point of view with respect to this question, is perfectly consistent and becoming, and in making that Motion he has used language to which no one can take exception—language of which certainly I do not feel that I am at all entitled to complain. I am, however, desirous that he should distinctly understand the exact nature of the difficulty which leads me, after very full reflection, to consider myself disabled from making such a Motion. On the other hand, I do not hold myself bound to resist the Motion, nor do I encourage resistance on the part of others. On the contrary, I think it is our duty as a minority—I am referring back to a recent occurrence—to tender a respectful submission to the Order of the House. But the right hon. Gentleman will see that it is one thing to respectfully support the Order of the House, and another thing to undertake to guide the House by making a Motion. My belief has been all along, and is still, that Mr. Bradlaugh—whether right or wrong in his own mind—is legally entitled to come into this House and take his seat. With that belief it would not be consistent, it would not be becoming, it would not be dignified, and I do not think it ought to be an acceptable service to the House that I, who entertain that belief, should be the person to move that Mr. Bradlaugh should be taken away from this Table, where I think he has come to discharge the duty which the law requires him to discharge. That is the ground, and not any indisposition to interfere with the proceedings of the House, nor any indisposition to assist and support the authority of the Speaker in the Chair, but a very definite conviction that has led me to see that it is clearly wrong on my part to undertake or to endeavour to guide the House; but it leaves me still fully persuaded that it is right and fit that I should respectfully submit to the House, and that I should tender, as far as I may venture to do so, to those who think with me on the general question, a recommendation that they should pursue a similar course.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I have not risen to ask the House to divide against the Resolution. As the Prime Minister has said, this is the logical outcome of the Resolution passed by a majority of the House the other day. It is very evident that we are here to carry on Business, and that it would be impossible to carry it on if Mr. Bradlaugh were to exercise what he considers, and what we consider, his statutory rights, and persistently to come up to that Table to take the Oath. Therefore, I am not going to ask the House to divide against this Resolution; but I would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon to be good enough to explain what is the precise meaning of the Resolution, because I think many Gentlemen here do not quite understand what it is. Is it that Mr. Bradlaugh should be forbidden to enter the precincts of this House; and, if so, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would tell us what those precincts are? It is simply for information that I ask, and not with any intention of opposing the Resolution.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I understand that when a Gentleman has been returned as a Member of this House, and from any circumstance is unable to take his seat in the House, or is restrained from doing so—as has been the case in several instances, and among them in that of Baron Rothschild, who was in that position for several years—the Gentleman so returned is regarded as an incomplete Member of this House, and as such is entitled to take his seat below the Bar. That has been the practice which has been followed in these cases, and Mr. Bradlaugh has lately followed that example himself, and even remained there during our divisions. It is obvious that Mr. Bradlaugh, remaining in that position, can at any moment, with great ease, enter the body of the House, which he claims to be legally entitled to do, for the purpose of tendering to take the Oath at this Table. I think it impossible that, so long as Mr. Bradlaugh retains that position, it is impossible for the House to have any security that its proceedings will not be interrupted at a moment's notice, and scenes which we all feel, whatever our opinions, to be deplorable may occur. I therefore by the Motion propose that Mr. Bradlaugh shall be excluded from the House—that is to say, that he shall not come within the door that is kept by the doorkeepers, until or unless he shall undertake to the Speaker that he will not disturb the proceedings of the House, in which case I can see no reason why he should not do that which other Gentlemen who have been returned to this House and have not been able to take their seats have done. In that way we shall have security against disturbance in our proceedings without inflicting any hardship on Mr. Bradlaugh other than that which is inflicted upon him by our objection to his taking the Oath.

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Serjeant at Arms do remove Mr. Bradlaugh from the House, until he shall engage not further to disturb the proceedings of the House.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. DILLON.

MR. PARNELL asked the Chief Secretary a Question of which he had given him private Notice—namely, Whether he would inform the House as to the words or acts for which the hon. Member for Tipperary had been arrested, and when and where the words were spoken?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I think, Sir, I had better read the words respecting the arrest of the hon. Member. The warrant declares—

“That John Dillon, North Great George’s street, city of Dublin, Member of Parliament, is reasonably suspected of having since the 30th day of September, 1880, been guilty as principal of a crime punishable by law, that is to say, inciting persons to forcibly oppose and resist the execution of a process of the law to give possession of land, committed in the aforesaid proscribed district, and being an incitement to an act of violence tending to interfere with the maintenance of law and order.”

That is the only reply I can give to the hon. Gentleman, and for this reason—that, at the time of the passing of the Act under which the arrest was made, the question was repeatedly brought before the House as to whether more information could be given than that contained in the Warrant. I have read to the House what was decided by a large majority in one, or, I think, two divisions, which decided that more information should not be given. I do not think, therefore, that I should be acting in accordance with the Act of Parliament or with respect to the House, without an Order of the House, if I gave more information in this case. I can only say for the Government and for myself, so far as I have anything to do with it, that we are perfectly prepared to meet any Motion which may be brought forward impugning our conduct in this matter.

MR. PARNELL: Then, Mr. Speaker, I wish to further call attention to this matter, and to conclude with a Motion. I think the right hon. Gentleman has altogether misinterpreted the intentions of the House in refusing to give information with regard to the arrest of my hon. Friend. In coming to their decision I think probably the House has been influenced by the supposition that, under certain circumstances, it might be impossible or inconvenient to give information; but I submit that in the case of the hon. Member for Tipperary, and in the case of almost everyone arrested under the Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, it is perfectly within the power of the Government to give the information required. Let me call attention to the situation. An hon. Member of this House has been arrested for an offence which is not named, although generally described in the Warrant. That hon. Gentleman has no information as to the particulars of the offence; and when I ask the Government to give me information, and to tell me what offence my hon. Friend has been guilty of, and at what time and place the offence was committed, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland says he is not required to do so by Act of Parliament. When I turn to the circumstances connected with the case, I find that the Government have been singularly unmindful, not only of what is due to this House, but also what is due to an important Irish constituency. My hon. Friend at the time of his arrest was on his way to this House to speak on the Land Law (Ireland) Bill; and it is true that he had announced his intention of criticizing very severely the provisions of that measure, and to influence his Colleagues to reject that measure. This course might have been fraught with some inconvenience to the Government; but my hon. Friend certainly represented a particular school of thought and a particular political line with regard to this Land Bill in Ireland not represented by anyone else. I affirm, then, it was a deliberate interference with the Constitutional rights of my hon. Friend to arrest him on his way to this House. In fact, this Protection of Person and Property Act has been used simply for the purpose of blackening the character of certain Irish politicians. The Government know that they can make no case if they specify the acts and the offences under which the prisoners are charged, and they shelter themselves behind a Parliamentary Return which I have in my hand, which recites in ambiguous terms and in awful language the general character of the offences which are alleged against the arrested persons. But when we ask for information, and when I gave Notice that I should move for a Return in reference to a person detained in prison under the Coercion Act, and under a Warrant that he was "reasonably suspected" of acts of violence or intimidation, or inciting to the same, together with the time and places of the offences, what course did the Government take? The hon. and gallant Member (Sir Arthur Hayter), at the direction of the Government, under the half-past 12 Rule, rendered it impossible for me to obtain the information which it was absolutely necessary for me to have in order to make my Motion. We do not know of what all these persons are accused; and I take it I have shown that the Government have not acted candidly in this matter, and are seeking to evade a full and fair inquiry into the subject. During the first reading of the Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Bill, the Prime Minister, with a great flourish, said that all these arrests would be open to challenge on the floor of the House. May I ask the Prime Minister whether, when he made that statement, that he had in contemplation that Irish Members desiring information should be obstructed by a paid official of the Government? Many of the gentlemen arrested occupy respectable positions, and are honoured by their neighbours, some of them holding places of trust and responsibility in the local Municipalities and Poor Law Boards for the country. It is a perfect mockery to discuss the imprisonment of these men so long as the Government refuse us information; and I desire to move that the information be given. I think I have shown that I have especial interest in directing the attention of the House to the question of the arrest of my hon. Friend. When the Chief Secretary answered a Question put to him yesterday with regard to the health of my hon. Friend, he had received no official information on the subject; but, of course, the House could not be expected to liberate the hon. Member for Tipperary so as to enable him to continue the course he was pursuing at the time of his arrest. Now, I have had opportunities of becoming acquainted with my hon. Friend's character and constitution, and I know very well that confinement and imprisonment lasting for any time will be absolutely fatal to him. He is a man suffering from an illness which requires constant occupation in the open air to keep him alive. Several members of his family have already died of this illness. One of his sisters died this year of the same complaint from which my hon. Friend is suffering; and all his friends and his medical advisers know well that if the imprisonment of John Dillon is long continued it will result in his death, imprisonment crippling him in such a manner as will lead to his death within a short period. I now ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government intend to keep John Dillon in prison until he dies? I ask him to enable us to show that he does not deserve imprisonment; and, for my part, I believe the House would recognize that fact, and would recognize that he was not deserving of the punishment of death which, practically, the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant proposes to inflict upon him. I would ask the Government to re-consider the position they have taken up with regard to their refusal to give information as to the particulars of these cases. I do not want information from them where it is impossible to give it. I do not want information from them where they have not got it to give, or where the giving of it would inflict any wrong or injury upon any other person, or would be prejudicial to the administration of the law or this Act. But I submit that where the Government have no other reason than the mere fact that the House of Commons refused in this Act to direct them to give information, it is perfectly competent for them to consider each case in itself and, where no public wrong would accrue, to give such information as we ask for. I beg, Mr. Speaker, to move that this House do now adjourn.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. GLADSTONE: It is my duty steadily to decline to enter upon the course to which the hon. Member invites us for reasons which appear to me perfectly clear and perfectly unquestionable. Parliament has thought fit, after long and full consideration, to intrust the Executive Government with powers of a character beyond the ordinary rules of the Constitution, for the purpose of preserving peace and order in Ireland; and Parliament has therein proceeded on the supposition that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, it is desirable that the Executive Government should have those powers upon grounds apart from those on which they would or might be prepared to challenge the conduct of the parties who are brought to justice. They have established an exceptional method of procedure, to be exercised upon the discretion of the Executive Government. After a discussion upon the Amendment to the Bill which was proposed on the part of those who resisted the measure, that in every Warrant for the arrest of anyone under the Bill should be specified particulars analogous to those for which the hon. Member now calls, Parliament distinctly rejected that Amendment. I am not sure whether it was not tried more than once; but the deliberate judgment of Parliament was that the information should not be given. Were that information to be given, the effect would be that the whole of these cases would be liable to be vaguely and generally discussed in this House, and the House would become partners in the responsibility which Parliament requires the Government to assume whole and undivided. For that reason it was that the Government did not think it right that occasions when the House might be exhausted, with but few Members in attendance, should be made use of for the purpose of making Motions with a view to the production of this information, as I may call it, wholesale. But the ground that we took during the discussion was a different ground. What we said was this—“Our conduct on each and all of these occasions will be liable to be challenged. Where you think you have cause to think that our proceedings are open to question, there will be nothing to prevent you from raising the question in this House. When, instead of a mere discussion at large upon the merits of a case, you are prepared to make a charge against the Executive Government, then the Executive Government will be prepared to meet you upon that charge.” But the hon. Gentleman does not make a charge against the Executive Government. He makes a speech upon the subject, but does not embody in a Motion the allegations which he travels over in his speech, and he concludes with a Motion that the House do now adjourn. Is that course necessary owing to the position in which the

hon. Gentleman is placed? No; nothing of the kind. We had, even so late as yesterday, upon the Notice Paper a Motion which, however incorrect in the allegations which it made, was perfectly legitimate as to the mode in which it proposed to raise the question of Mr. Dillon's arrest. It was a Motion as follows:—

“That, in the opinion of this House, the action of the Irish Executive in arbitrarily arresting a Member of this House without reasonable ground, and in proclaiming a state of siege in Dublin, is an abuse of the exceptional powers conferred by Parliament; and, coupled with the conduct of the Executive in affording the use of the armed forces of the Crown for the wholesale execution of wanton and cruel evictions, is calculated to promote disaffection in Ireland, and to mar any possible good results from the remedial proposals of the Government.”

In this particular case of the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) had given Notice of a Motion, and no doubt he would in his speech have stated the specific grounds on which he would have founded the charge which he embodied in his Notice of Motion. The Executive Government would then have been put on its trial; and it would have been the right and the duty of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and those who thought with him to place the Executive Government on its trial in relation to matters of this kind. The Executive Government would have taken no step, whether by blocking the Notice of Motion or otherwise, to evade it; but would immediately have challenged the judgment of the House. But as to vague discussions ending in Motions for adjournment, when hon. Gentlemen without any responsibility can say what they please, the Government will decline to allow false issues to be raised, and to abandon the position in which Parliament has placed them by intrusting them with exceptional powers for the maintenance of the law for the protection of life and property in Ireland. I have now stated distinctly the path in which we are prepared to walk; but in the path opened to us by the hon. Member for the City of Cork we decline to walk, for it would be a cowardly attempt on our part to divide our responsibility with the House, and to shift a portion from ourselves on to the shoulders of hon. Members. We intend to bear it undivided, and to confine ourselves—which would be our duty if the case arose—to defending ourselves from any and every allegation that may be made against us.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY failed to find in the right hon. Gentleman's speech any answer to the arguments of the hon. Member for the City of Cork. The right hon. Gentleman did not show by any Resolution or by any clause in the Act that Parliament prevented the Chief Secretary for Ireland from giving this information in cases where it was thought fair and right to do so. It was entirely in the discretion of the Government, if they pleased, to answer the questions which had been put—they could give the reasons why the hon. Member for Tipperary was arrested by the Irish Executive. The right hon. Gentleman complained that the Motion which stood in his (Mr. Justin M'Carthy's) name was not proceeded with, and protested that the Government were eager to meet it. But he would ask what chance was there of bringing it on at a reasonable hour for discussion? The right hon. Gentleman only suggested that if he waited his chance he would, no doubt, be able to bring the Motion before the House. That was to say he might be able to bring it on at the fag end of a long discussion, perhaps at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning, when he should be speaking to empty Benches. The right hon. Gentleman was willing enough on two or three occasions to interrupt the course of Business in the House for the purpose of introducing questions which might very well have waited. He was willing to interrupt the course of important Public Business in order to propose a Vote of Thanks to men engaged in a war which he himself little more than a year ago condemned as a crime. He was willing to interrupt the course of Business to propose a National Monument to the memory of a statesman of whom he had said not long since that he had given some of the best years of his life to thwarting and opposing his policy. He (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) did not find fault with him for taking that course; he only mentioned it to show how easily he found an opportunity for interrupting the Business of the House for any purpose which he himself wished to carry out. The right hon. Gentleman had referred in that House to the grievance of having a constituency deprived of one of its Representatives. For the purpose of preventing such a thing he was prepared to give up the time of the House to a most disagreeable and unnecessary discussion, especially at this period of the Session; but when they came to raise the question whether the act of the Government had not practically disfranchised Tipperary, he had no suggestion to make, except that anyone who had a Motion to make on the subject might wait for his chance, and take the first chance he got. If he (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) was not mistaken, the event which they were discussing was absolutely without precedent in Parliamentary history. He believed there was no other case, so far as he could recollect, in which a Member of that House was arrested and imprisoned under the same conditions as his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary. Mr. Smith O'Brien was sent to prison on a direct charge, openly made and formally recorded against him; and he was, on the first opportunity, brought before a public Court of Law, and tried for the alleged offence. But in this case his hon. Friend was arrested and consigned to prison without himself or any of his friends having any chance of knowing what was the exact charge on which he was committed, and whether he was fairly suspected of being guilty of it. This, he did not hesitate to say, was without precedent in, and reflected discredit upon, a civilized country. His hon. Friend was coming over to Parliament to ask the Government whether the charges which he had made against landlords in regard to the evictions going on were not correct. No reasons had been given by the Government to justify the course which they had adopted; and, therefore, many persons would see in the arrest not the act of legitimate authority, but the desperate stratagem of a political partizan. If the health of his hon. Friend should be seriously injured by his imprisonment, and if the worst should result from it, he would not be the first who had sacrificed his life for the benefit of the Irish people. The speech which his hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell) had made was not in the nature of a plaintive appeal to Her Majesty's Government for mercy to his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary, but was a note of warning to them of the serious and important responsibility which they had taken upon themselves in having, without reasonable cause, arrested an hon. Member of that House, and in continuing to detain him in prison. Her Majesty's Government had also incurred the responsibility of proclaiming a great, populous, and peaceful city like Dublin, and of placing it in a state of siege by a stroke of the pen. Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, who certainly was not an admirer of the Land League, shortly before the Government took that step had declared the state of Dublin to be eminently tranquil; and, indeed, the only ground that the Chief Secretary himself had assigned for proclaiming that city was because one or two speeches had been made in it of which the Government did not approve. Could a parallel case be found in modern history, a case in which a great peaceful city had been placed in a state of siege merely because one or two persons, whose very names were not given, had made speeches which were disapproved by a Member of the Government of the day? He admitted that the course which had been pursued on this occasion of moving the adjournment of the House was somewhat irregular; but the Irish Members had felt bound to take it in order to bring a matter of utmost urgency under the notice of the House and of the country. The right hon. Gentleman had said that Her Majesty's Government were compelled, in the first place, to make the laws of the country respected and obeyed in Ireland. He (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) supposed they could exact and enforce a sort of sullen obedience to the law by the use of their military and police; but to make the law respected in Ireland was not within the power of all their police or all their soldiery until they made the law different from what it was, and administered it otherwise than they did at present.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought that the course adopted by the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) was unfair and unreasonable. It was in the power of the hon. Member to have brought forward that night the Motion of which he had given Notice—a Motion which brought a direct charge against Her Majesty's Government, which the Government were perfectly prepared to have met. To the insinuations of the hon. Member the Government could give a perfect reply. The hon. Member had said that he had been prevented from proceeding with the Motion; but he might easily have made it that night. ["No!"] The hon. Member for the City of Cork dissented from that statement; but, looking at the state of the Order Book for the night, no one could doubt that the Motion might have been brought on. Indeed, he had been much surprised that morning, on looking at the Business for that night, to find that the Motion had been withdrawn. The hon. Member had chosen to raise the question on the Motion for the adjournment of the House rather than by direct Motion, because he was aware that by doing so he could make no charge which the Government could meet.

MR. DALY said, that his hon. Colleague had asked what were the words or acts on which the hon. Member for Tipperary had been arrested; and they believed that all the evidence which the Government possessed, and on which the arrest was made, could be given by the Government officials; therefore, the Chief Secretary need not shelter himself behind the extraordinary powers given to the Government by the Coercion Act, and refuse to answer the questions which had been put. The Government had 30,000 soldiers and 12,000 policemen in Ireland; and, therefore, they could have no fear of any result arising from the reasons which they might give. The Government should have courage, and answer all the questions categorically. He believed that this Liberal Government would be accused of doing a mean and dastardly act, and then of sheltering themselves from the consequences of that act in a cowardly way. Practically, Her Majesty's Government had, of their own motion, disfranchised one of the Irish constituencies. His hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary could have spoken with authority in regard to the evictions in Ireland, and which were going forward in the most monstrous manner, as on all these things he had a more intimate knowledge than any other man. The position of the Government, in not answering the questions put, was unsound and untenable.

MR. J. COWEN said, he was astonished that the Government had not given a more satisfactory answer to the question that had been addressed to them. They would have reasons for arresting Mr. Dillon, and surely they might state them. In the absence of this information, all the House could do was to speculate on the cause of the arrest. No one, he supposed, would accuse Mr. Dillon of having been engaged in houghing cattle, shooting landlords, or burning property. There was no overt act that he had committed. The only ground for his arrest, therefore, must be his speeches. He had not seen any report of those speeches, except such as had appeared in the English newspapers, and these reports were not to be trusted. They were usually attuned to the appetites of English readers. Many of the statements that appeared in the English papers respecting Ireland were absolutely false—others were grossly exaggerated. Even when the statements were themselves correct, the explanation necessary to their understanding was withheld. To form an estimate of what had been said by any man in Ireland from what appeared in the English newspapers was to do that man an injustice. Before the House passed a condemnation of his Friend he begged it to pause. He asked it to consider the circumstances—the strongly extenuating circumstances—under which Mr. Dillon had spoken. There had been great agricultural depression over the whole Kingdom. This depression had been most severely felt in Ireland. In some places it had deepened into distress—in others into want and starvation. Mr. Dillon, during several months, had employed himself in going from one part of the country to another, and had been brought face to face with the realities of the situation. The Government had introduced a Bill designed to improve the social condition of the Irish people. The measure might be wise or unwise; but that was its purpose. The landlords, or at least a large section of them, feared that the operation of the Bill would be injurious to their interests, and, with a view of getting quit of the responsibility that it entailed upon them, they were scattering notices of ejectment broadcast. These ejectments had, in many instances, matured into evictions. He did not know whether hon. Gentlemen had witnessed an eviction. The harrowing scenes that accompanied them could not be viewed unmoved by any man. To see a starving family crouching in the cold on a bleak hillside was a spectacle that no one could behold without emotion. Mr. Dillon had witnessed these scenes, and he had spoken in strong, but not too strong, reprobation of them. He might probably have overstepped the thin line that separated legality from illegality. But the surroundings being recollected, no generous man would judge him harshly. Especially ought this to be the case with the present Government. There were Members of the Administration who had lived amongst Leagues, and had risen to power through agitation. If everything they had said and everything they had done during periods of excitement had been as strictly watched and as strictly judged as Mr. Dillon's speeches and doings had been, some of them would certainly not have escaped a prosecution if they had escaped imprisonment. Mr. Dillon knew that the mass of the English people were ignorant of the condition of Ireland, that a large number were not only ignorant but indifferent, and that some even were hostile. It was a cynical but too common observation that this country would be benefited if Ireland was cut adrift from us, or if she was sunk beneath the Atlantic waves long enough to procure the destruction of her population. This hard view of Ireland and her people was not so prevalent now as it was in former years; yet still it existed. Mr. Dillon also knew that nothing ever was obtained in the way of political or social consideration from this country until there had been an agitation amounting almost to an insurrection. We conceded nothing to Ireland from a sense of justice—only from force. We yielded to fear what we refused to reason. ["No, no!"] Some hon. Members denied that statement. He appealed to history in confirmation of what he had said. Since the Union there had been three serious attempts made at ameliorative legislation in Ireland. And how had those attempts been initiated? One of the pledges given by the English Government in 1800 was that if the Irish Parliament would consent to the Union the penal laws against the Catholics should be at once repealed. How was that pledge fulfilled? Thirty years were allowed to elapse before any serious attempt was made to comply with the engagement, and then it was not complied with because of its righteousness or its justice. The Prime Minister of the day had the audacity to declare that Catholic Emancipation was yielded because there were only two alternatives. The one was emancipation and the other Civil War. Emancipation was therefore, in his judgment, only a less evil than Civil War, and hence it was conceded. Sir Robert Peel endeavoured to deal with the three great Irish grievances—Land, Education, and the Church. But he did not deal with these questions from any intrinsic sense of the injustices under which the people were labouring. England was at the time in trouble with foreign States. There was a dispute with America about Oregon, and a dispute with France about Otaheite. The Government were afraid if they went to war with either or both of these Powers that French or American troops might be landed in Ireland. The Irish, being discontented, might receive them as deliverers. It was not because the people were suffering from an injustice, but because it was desirable to send them what Sir Robert Peel described as a message of peace, that the three measures he had indicated were proposed. It was fear of the Irish aiding the French or the Americans in the threatened wars that got for them the Queen's Colleges, an increased grant for Maynooth, and an attempted amendment of the laws respecting land. The third occasion when Parliament essayed to solve the Irish difficulty was during the last Liberal Government. The circumstances were still fresh in their recollection. They all knew how many times the question of Land Reform had been submitted to the House by Mr. Sharman Crawford and others, and how often Resolutions respecting the Irish Church had been rejected. The House refused to legislate on these points until the Fenians broke open a prison van in the streets of Manchester, released two of their leaders, and blew down the wall of Clerkenwall Gaol, in the expectation of setting free a third. It was a fear of the Fenian insurrection that caused the Church and Land Questions in 1868-9 to pass from the domain of speculation to that of practical politics. Mr. Dillon knew all this. Every Irishman knew it, and they also know that the legislation of the present Session would never have been attempted if it had not been for the action of the Land League. If there had been no Land League there would have been no Land Bill. The movement directed by the League had created a public opinion such as had compelled the Government to take action. The League really had forced the Government measure. The Ministry was the acting power, but the organization which Mr. Dillon controlled was the motive power. It was most unfair to send to prison the men who had aroused the public opinion which rendered the measures of the Ministry possible. What were the simple facts of the case? Mr. Dillon had collected a larger amount of information respecting the condition of Irish peasants than was possessed by any other man in the House. There was no Member there, not even the Irish Secretary, who had anything like the amount of information on the subject that he had. He was on his way to Parliament to submit this information to it. An announcement to that effect had been made in all the papers. It was well known to his Friends that he intended to be in the House last Thursday and to take part in the discussion. The Government arrested him on his way there, and landed him in Kilmainham. And what would be the consequence of that step? If he had been in Parliament his power would have been circumscribed; but now that he was in prison his counsel would be more potent than ever. The Irish peasants trusted him and respected him, and they would trust him and respect him all the more since he suffered for them. Mr. Dillon might be a rebel at Westminster; but he had long been a patriot in Tipperary, and now he would be a martyr. Ministers used no end of smooth words about the condition of Ireland; but they did not back up these words by their actions. The arrest of Mr. Dillon was like sticking a blister on a raw wound. The English people were singularly unfortunate in their government of subject races. For some reason or other—even when they had the best intentions—they failed to win the good feeling or the affections of those they ruled. He could not explain it. He could only lament it. But such was unquestionably the fact. They had ruled Ireland for 700 years, and the people were as discontented and dissatisfied as they were centuries ago. France ruled Alsace some 200 years, and in that time the Alsations became even more French than the Gascons. There must be something either in the manner or the spirit of the English administration that engendered in the Irish people so much distrust. The minds of some statesmen were said to be like the pupils of the human eye—they contracted themselves the more the greater the light that was shed in upon them. With all the experience of the past, and with good intentions, the present Government were treading in the footsteps—the painful and disastrous footsteps—of past Administrations. Just let them look for a moment at what they had done during these troubled times. There never was an agitation that did not have at its head one or two men who typified the hopes and aspirations of the people. These men in the present agitation in Ireland were Mr. Davitt and Mr. Dillon. They embodied, to a larger extent than any other two, the spirit and wishes of the Irish race. And how had the Government treated them? They had sent one to penal servitude and the other to gaol. The late Government, when they believed that Mr. Davitt was guilty of some offence against the law, attempted to put him upon his trial. This was a fair and honourable way of treating him. If he had broken the law, it was right that he should be made to feel the consequences. But the present Government did not follow a like course. They went back upon a conviction that in equity and morals, if not in law, had been more than complied with. He did not speak of the wisdom, of the cruelty, of the justice of Mr. Davitt's re-imprisonment. But he was there to declare that he did not know in his experience—and he did not believe any man in that House knew—of a meaner thing having been done by any Government than the sending back to slavery of this man. If the Government imagined that that was the way to pacify the Irish people they were grossly mistaken. The treatment of Mr. Davitt would neither be forgotten nor forgiven by those who shared his opinions and admired his character. And Mr. Dillon. He was not a common man. He was not angling for Office—he was not canvassing for a job. He knew the wants of his countrymen. He had seen and sympathized with their sufferings.

He was in earnest in what he did and said. He would not equivocate, he would not excuse; he would be “as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice.” If they laboured under the delusion that by degrading such men they would facilitate their rule in Ireland, they were in error. He knew their theory was that Ireland ought to be taught to fear before she was taught to love. The falsity of that theory had been shown by experience. By Coercion Bills and Arms Bills they could not win the confidence of a suffering, struggling, and sensitive race. They could not kill ideas by chains and prisons. Ideas were as indestructible as either earth or heaven, and the attempts to annihilate them by pains and penalties would fail now as they had failed in all past times. It was a source of deep regret to every man concerned in the future of Ireland to see the prospects of the legislation the Government were prosecuting blasted by the harsh, unwise, and illiberal treatment that they were now manifesting towards Mr. Dillon, Mr. Davitt, and their countrymen.

MR. MACIVER said, he agreed most cordially with much that had fallen from the hon. Member who had just spoken. It was not necessary to approve of what Mr. Dillon had done to condemn what had been done by the Government. What the hon. Member for Tipperary had done had been compared fairly in the light of what the Prime Minister himself said when he was in Opposition. But the Government allowed this agitation in Ireland to go on to an extent they ought not to have done. They might long ago have stopped this agitation, which had led to the formation of this Land League; but they did not wish to do it. The Prime Minister said that the explosion at Clerkenwell Prison and the murder of a policeman at Manchester were necessary to bring the Irish Church Question within the range of practical politics. He (Mr. Mac Iver) spoke directly to the right hon. Gentleman, the apostle of peace, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who represented Birmingham, which provided arms and ammunition for all the world. His inconsistency on this and every question was well known to all in that House; but he did say that the right hon. Gentleman in his Irish views was perhaps more inconsistent than on any other question.

The right hon. Gentleman, however, had always been perfectly consistent in one respect. He disliked the landed interest of this country. He (Mr. Mac Iver) had no desire to make any lengthened remarks; but he wished to say that he thought the Government had been very lax. They ought either to have arrested Mr. Dillon before or not at all; but they allowed the time to go by, and they had now arrested him when he was coming to take his seat in that House. He cordially supported the views expressed by the hon. Member for Newcastle.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had been much astonished by the speech of the Prime Minister, which was a remarkable instance of the way in which a great master of Parliamentary Forms could evade the real issue. The right hon. Gentleman said that was an irregular mode of bringing forward that subject, and because he considered it to be so he declined to enter into it. He further challenged them to bring a substantive Motion before the House, when they might discuss the whole transaction; but when the Government were asked to give facilities for the discussion of a substantive Motion they withheld all such facilities. The Irish Members had been prevented at all points from bringing forward the matter in a regular way; and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in the face of all the facts they had had to confront, had risen in his place and declared that the Irish Members were afraid to bring the subject forward. He had told them they could have brought on the Motion that night; but if he had looked at the Order Book he would have seen that there were seven Notices of Motion down for that night, four of which were opposed. One of them related to police superannuation, and the hon. and gallant Member in whose name it stood (Colonel Alexander) took too deep an interest in the subject to give way in favour of the Irish Members. To another of those Motions Notice of opposition had been given by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), who, though his career in the House had not been long, had already acquired a reputation for unyielding and relentless hostility to any proposition which he wished to prevent from coming before the House. If there was anything which the hon. and learned Member desired to impede the discussion of more than another it was an Irish grievance. The line taken that evening by the Government was altogether inconsistent with their arguments when the Coercion Bill was passing through the House. The Government had said that they could not give the House further information, because, if they did, the person who had supplied it would be liable to be intimidated by his neighbours. But the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had now changed his ground completely. Who could intimidate those who had given the information on which the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) had been arrested? He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) took it that his hon. Friend had been put in prison because of certain speeches which he had made openly at a Land League meeting in Dublin. That speech had been published in all the newspapers, and there could be no fear of anyone being intimidated in consequence of the information given against him. Therefore, the whole reason for the absolute silence and secrecy urged in regard to the nature of the information disappeared in the case of his hon. Friend. The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver) had said the arrest should have taken place sooner, or not at all. If his hon. Friend were engaged in the utterance of speeches which were exciting to public disorder, he ought never to have been allowed to make a second speech, and accordingly they were driven to this conclusion—that the hon. Gentleman was arrested for a speech made months ago, or he was arrested for a speech made two or three weeks ago. If the arrest was in respect of a speech made months ago, it had come too late; but there could be no doubt it was made on account of a speech delivered only two or three weeks ago. The only recent speeches made by his hon. Friend that he knew of which had attracted notice during the last few weeks were two, one of which was made on a Sunday, and the other at a Land League meeting in Dublin. The speech made on the Sunday could not have been the cause of his arrest, because his hon. Friend was in prison before the report of it could have come before the Dublin authorities. He was, therefore, forced to the conclusion that it was in consequence of his speech before the Land League meeting that his hon. Friend had been arrested. But, on April 7, Mr. Justice Fitzgerald stated in a Charge to the Grand Jury that Dublin was in an unusually peaceful and orderly condition. For himself, he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had never seen Dublin in anything but a peaceful and orderly state. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland was questioned with regard to the Charge, and his reply was that since the Charge of Judge Fitzgerald one or two speeches had been made in the Land League. Was the Metropolis of Ireland to be proclaimed in a state of siege, and were the liberties of 300,000 people to be placed at the mercy of every policeman, because one man made speeches which it was sought to prevent? If such a thing were heard of as occurring at Berlin, or even at St. Petersburg, English Members would receive it with disgust, and would hardly believe it possible. What was the speech of his hon. Friend? The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had himself declared that if the Irish people had the control of their own affairs, either justice would be done to the Irish tenants, or the Irish tenants would exterminate the landlords. If he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) were to act the part of a plagiarist, and to give as his own, in the Council of the Land League in Dublin, some of the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland on the Compensation for Disturbance Bill of last year, with regard to the horrors of eviction, with regard to the process of eviction, with regard to the threats of violence, and the difficulty of preserving and maintaining the public peace, he had no doubt he would have an uncomfortable lodging in Kilmainham before 24 hours were over; but if he were to adopt some of the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, he did not think he would even be let off with a lodging in Kilmainham, but believed that he would be brought before a packed jury, if a packed jury could be got in Ireland now, and sentenced to penal servitude for inciting to riot. No one could deny the truth of what the hon. Member for Tipperary had said; but its very truth was its guilt in the eyes of the Government. His hon. Friend had said that there were 10,000 persons threatened with eviction; and that was true. The hon. Member was understating rather than overstating the case. Was he to be put in prison because he spoke what was true? Did anybody suppose that the public peace and order could be preserved in Ireland if the Government were criminal enough to allow evictions to be made? No one who knew the animosity which the present action of the landlords in Ireland created, or the feeling of the people towards them, could fail to be aware that 10,000 or 12,000 evictions could not take place without resistance. If that were so, could his hon. Friend, knowing the fact, be blamed for stating it? As a chief officer of the Land League, it was his duty to proclaim the facts; and instead of having been imprisoned for doing so, he ought to be thanked for it; if he had abstained from doing so, he would not have been performing his duty as a citizen. Instead of that, there could be no doubt that that was the speech which led to his hon. Friend's arrest. It was deplorably strange, but it was true, as had been said by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen), that the Irish people had never gained anything from England except by violence or threatened insurrection, and the Land Bill was no exception to the rule; whereas his ideal was that of a country where legitimate ends were pursued by Constitutional and legitimate means. Indeed, a country could scarcely be said to be civilized in which the means did not exist of influencing public opinion by peaceful meetings or through the Press; while violence was the miserable concomitant of English rule in Ireland. He charged that upon the Government as one of the worst and most demoralizing influences which they exercised in this country; and, in conclusion, he begged to say that if the Government gave the Irish Members facilities for discussing the arrest of his hon. Friend (Mr. Dillon), the question would be discussed in a frank, full, and fair manner; but if the Government demurred to or denied that reasonable request, then they would be compelled to take such means as the Forms of the House might afford of securing attention for a matter which lay near to millions of Irish hearts.

Mr. JESSE COLLINGS said, he had opposed the passing of the Coercion Bill, and he now regretted some of the consequences of that Bill. He did not rise to criticize the policy of the Government with regard to the arrests that had taken place in Ireland, because he was not in a position to say whether or not any of the action taken there was justified. There was, however, abroad, he thought, a very general feeling of regret that, as the Government had stayed their hands so long, they had not found it consistent with their duty at the last moment to avoid arresting Mr. Dillon. No one that had read the speeches of Mr. Dillon could doubt that he had made statements which would justify his arrest; but what he (Mr. Collings) wished to ask the Government was this—when were they to stop in the process of arresting various Leaders of the Land League? He could not help regretting that the Government had chosen that particular time to create a feeling of irritation by their action in Ireland, a time when a Land Bill had been brought in, which redeemed the promise of the Government. It was a Bill which throughout the whole of England had been received with favour, and generally in Ireland with thankfulness and appreciation. ["No, no!"] The Bill was generally received with appreciation, and in a manner better than the Government could have expected; and by doing what they had, they were likely to destroy, to a great extent, their remedial legislation. The state of Ireland appeared to be now even worse than it was a few months ago as regarded the feelings of the people; and a word ought, he thought, to be said about those who were the real culprits in the case, and without whom the Dillons could not exist in Ireland. He meant the men who were evicting the tenants from their farms. By arresting 50 Dillons the Government would not secure the object which they seemed to have in view. It had been said by the Prime Minister that "crime dogged the steps of the Land League;" but anyone who had read the statistics of crime in Ireland would see at once that crime dogged the steps of eviction, and if crime was to be stopped evictions must be seen to. The Government must be aware that the Coercion Bill was being put to a purpose which they never contemplated. A week or two ago, evictions were enforced at the instance of a justice of the peace for the county of Armagh, Mr. M'Geough, with the aid of 50 policemen, at which the most painful scenes were witnessed. And who was Mr. M'Geough? Why, a gentleman who, according to the evidence given before the Bessborough Commission, was one of those who had brought Ireland into the condition in which she was now placed. It appeared that one of his tenants, a widow, wished to sell her tenant right in a farm for which she paid £20 a-year; but that he refused to accept a man as tenant who was ready to take it, unless he consented to have the rent increased to £27 a-year. Those terms were refused. The widow, in consequence, could not sell her tenant right, and she was evicted without any compensation. That such proceedings should create a deep feeling of irritation in the minds of the Irish people was scarcely matter for wonder. He (Mr. Collings) gave the Chief Secretary for Ireland credit for his humanity; but he must say people were tempted to commit offences in their despair. They might say that that view was not logical; but then they were dealing with a people who thought they had no right to be turned out on the roadside. When they talked about sending large forces to be present at these evictions, so as to prevent resistance, they lost sight of the fact of what human nature would do under such circumstances. They must not forget that the very beasts would fight for their lair and young ones when driven to desperation; and these evictions must be stopped, unless they were to increase even the disorder which they had now. There had been the greatest misconception in this country as to the character of the agitation in Ireland, and it seemed to him that the Chief Secretary for Ireland had been duped by the Tory landlords in Dublin Castle. The story which had been placed before thousands of people by the English Press as to the roasting alive of a process-server had turned out false. The Times, a short time ago, represented the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) to have told the Irish people to stick to their arms; but, on turning to the Dublin Freeman, he (Mr. Collings) found that what the hon. Member really had said was—

"Your organization has given you the benefits you have gained, and I advise you to stick to the arm which has done so much for you."

What was to be done? He strongly advised the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government to publicly signify his intention of making the Bill retrospective in its clauses. Even this Bill might not pass this Session, and the landlords would be protected in their legalized plunder.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was travelling into a Bill which was appointed for a future day.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS, apologizing, said, he was led away from the question by a consideration of the injustice done to the Irish people while the Land Bill was being delayed in the House. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, speaking last August, stated that if the landlords used their powers in such a manner as to force the Government to support them in injustice, the Government would accompany their request for special powers with a Bill which would prevent them being obliged to support injustice. After that speech, one might have hoped that something would be done to prevent the injustice which the Government would not deny was at present taking place in Ireland. He did not know, for instance, whether it would not be possible to refuse the use of troops and Constabulary at evictions, until the justice of the case of the Irish tenants was first settled. He would appeal to the Prime Minister to say one word of comfort to these poor Irish people, every one of whom, as well as every one of the people of England, believed in the right hon. Gentleman. [Cries of "No!" from the Irish Members.] He would say yes, and, speaking from experience of public meetings in England, he said the mention of the name of Gladstone always raised unbounded enthusiasm.

MR. HEALY: No, no!

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I say, yes.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Not lately.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS maintained that even recent proceedings had not destroyed the popularity of the Prime Minister. He made the appeal to the right hon. Gentleman from a sense of pity for the poor people of Ireland, and could assure the House that, if he were the Chief Secretary for Ireland, he could not sleep in his bed for thinking of the injustice inflicted on these unfortunate persons. He would remind the Prime Minister of the theory he propounded long ago, but which was still well remembered — namely, that the people were our own flesh and blood? [Several Irish MEMBERS: No, no!] Oh, yes, they were. He was sorry the Irish Members were so parochial that they could not understand his meaning. In a wider sense the Irish people were their own flesh and blood. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to hold out some hope to these poor creatures who were turned out of their homes every day, and who, if they left the country, left with curses on England. The Government dare not logically carry out the Coercion Act; if they did they would be compelled to shoot down the people. [An Irish MEMBER: They have done so already.] He maintained that the people of England were not prepared to approve of any such extremities. The Government were in the position of an unskilful physician dealing with a skin disease. They were taking steps to spread that disease inwards, and, by casting into prison the leaders of the Land League, they were leaving the whole thing in the hands of the ruffian part of the population. He therefore appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to say something whereby the bad landlords would be taught that if they persevered in the course which led to crime they would have to make restitution. He was saying nothing against the Government; but he was asking that they should give effect to their good intentions. He regretted that the Coercion Act was being used simply for the purpose of evictions and of collecting rents whether those rents were just or unjust, in a most barbarous manner, and with a total disregard to the position and poverty of the poor people who were evicted. Let the House remember that the Irish people were turned out of their homes for resisting a law which Parliament was about to proclaim an unjust law. Insisting on those evictions, bad landlords were doing that which they knew two months hence it would be unlawful for them to do; and what was more natural than that the people of Ireland should refuse obedience to the law which gave them no protection in return?

MR. GIBSON and Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT rose together; but MR. SPEAKER called upon

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, who said, that he did not rise to reply to the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Collings), but to ask the House to consider the Position in which it had been placed by the hon. Member. He would admit, as fully as the hon. Member could desire, that the evictions in Ireland, and the consequences to which they led, were a very serious question; but he could not help thinking that the hon. Member had ingeniously intended to do the Government a good turn by continuing the debate on the Land Law (Ireland) Bill. That evening was devoted to private Members; but his hon. Friend had managed to make a speech which would have been very suitable for the second reading of that Bill, but was scarcely appropriate to a Motion for the adjournment of the House. He did not propose to follow up the discussion introduced by his hon. Friend. That would be very irregular on the part of the Government. The debate had been diverted into that channel, and that was why he rose at the same time as the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gibson), who, he rather thought, was about to make an elaborate reply to the hon. Member for Ipswich. There was no doubt the discussion had been raised upon another matter, and no doubt it was a very serious and grave matter that a Member of the House should be arrested and imprisoned. So serious a matter was it that it was a most unsatisfactory thing to attempt to deal with it upon a Motion for adjournment, for on such a Motion no decision of the House could be taken. If there ever was a question upon which the House should definitely pronounce, it was upon the conduct of the Government in arresting a Member of that House; but it was quite clear that no definite and distinct opinion could be pronounced upon such a Motion as that, however willing anyone might be to give an opinion. How, on a mere interlocutory Motion, could the Government enter on the details of the grounds of the arrest of the hon. Member for Tipperary? That was a question of the gravest gravity, and the Government were not entitled to go into it except upon the most urgent grounds, and after a distinct challenge of their conduct had been given, and a decision of the House invited. He thought that, in the circumstances, the House would, upon reflection, agree with him that no advantage could be gained by continuing the debate.

Sir William Harcourt

MR. GIBSON said, he quite agreed with the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department in thinking that no good object would be gained by discussing the matter further. He would have been glad if the discussion had terminated before the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Collings) had spoken; but a new direction had been given to it by that hon. Member, who had made a peculiar, not to say extraordinary speech. The Motion had been introduced unexpectedly by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). Thereupon the hon. Member for Ipswich, watching his opportunity, had risen and produced a mass of letters and documents which he fired away for half-an-hour, and pleaded earnestly for a reply from a Minister. He avoided calling upon the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who the hon. Member knew was always ready to speak; and, indeed, he looked thoroughly put out when the right hon. and learned Gentleman got up to say a few words on the subject. He (Mr. Gibson) had no intention of making an elaborate speech; but he should like to make a few remarks in answer to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Ipswich. The hon. Member from one of his documents drew comfort, which he found in the speech made last August by the Chief Secretary for Ireland; but he forgot to draw the obvious moral, when the right hon. Gentleman stated last August that if he saw occasion for interfering with the landlords he would not hesitate to take action. It must therefore be fairly and honestly assumed that he had found nothing since that time, with all the vast information at his disposal, that would justify him as a responsible Minister in submitting to the House a proposal on the subject. But the case did not rest on that obvious inference; for, within the last two months, the Chief Secretary for Ireland stated in the House there was nothing whatever in the conduct of the landlords as a class calling for objection from him, and similar remarks were made on a recent occasion by the Prime Minister. What, then, was the meaning of the extraordinary remarks about landlords made by the hon. Member for Ipswich? Some glimmering of what was due to justice appeared to have crossed the mind of the hon. Member towards the close of his speech, when he said no one could tell at present whether the evictions were just or unjust. That thought should have suggested to him some caution, when he said just before the real culprits were the landlords; that they were trying to clear the land from tenants as from vermin. What proof did he offer of that, or of his other statements, that they were seeking for ill-gotten and legalized plunder, and that what they were doing were reckless outrages. ["Hear, hear!" from the Irish Members.] He did not object to applause from any quarter. He desired to point out that those were strong statements to be made in that House without any proof, especially as they culminated in the statement that the speaker was unable to tell the House whether evictions were just or unjust. In the name of common sense, what did the hon. Member for Ipswich think the Irish landlords should do when they were not paid their rents? Had the hon. Member the faintest conception that, at the present moment, on many thousands of holdings in Ireland rents were deliberately, without reason, justice, or cause, withheld from the landlords? Were the landlords to remain idle in those circumstances? Was it to be suggested for a second that the landlords, face to face with an organization whence came unjust and improper teaching, were to remain utterly quiescent, and not to seek to recover their legal rights? The proposition of the hon. Member, when seen from a sensible point of view, was utterly absurd. Did the hon. Member deny that in thousands of cases rents were improperly and unjustly withheld? Did he mean that the landlords so treated were to do nothing? Why, there must, in the very nature of things, be a substantial increase of evictions. That would of necessity be so, unless the landlords were, in the words of the hon. Member for Ipswich, to submit to be made the victims of legalized plunder and legalized outrage. He regretted that there was some truth in one sentence used by the hon. Member for Ipswich. The hon. Member had said that the condition of Ireland was worse now than when the Peace Preservation Act was passed. He held also that the state of things in Ireland now was grave and serious, and the responsibility of the Irish Executive was of the gravest kind. He (Mr. Gibson) concurred in that, and should not, at the proper time, hesitate to criticize frankly and fully the conduct of that Executive. Before the Irish officials were strengthened by the addition of exceptional powers, they did not apply until on the very eve of the meeting of Parliament the powers left in them by the ordinary law with anything like adequate vigour. Before the meeting of Parliament the Executive in Ireland had, in fact, been so administered that it did not command proper respect in that country. For a short period after the passing of the Peace Preservation Act many people thought that a quieter state of things was going to arise; but the fact remained at that moment, that with the powers of the ordinary law and of the exceptional law at their disposal, the administration of the country had been such that the Irish Executive was not regarded by the community, from the Giant's Causeway to Cape Clear, with anything approaching to due respect. These, of course, were matters to be gone into when they should come regularly before the House for discussion, and the Government had the opportunity of defending themselves. He should then, probably, not hesitate to take part in the discussion. He would admit that the position of those responsible for the maintenance of law and order was a difficult and responsible position, and that every fair allowance should be made in reference to their conduct; but, at the same time, they must expect that their conduct would be jealously scanned and anxiously scrutinized by those who had to look to the law for their vindication and protection.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, that his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had made some very natural observations on the strange divergence of the debate from its original purpose. It might, accordingly, have been expected that his right hon. and learned Friend would have kept in mind the principles which, according to him, ought to have guided the hon. Member for Ipswich, and, at all events, would not so far have forgotten his position as to make the Motion for adjournment the occasion for a somewhat fiery Party attack upon the Irish administration of the law during the last six months, at a time when he knew that the responsible Minister who could best answer him must sit with his mouth closed. The right hon. and learned Gentleman must have known, indeed had called attention to the circumstance, that the Chief Secretary for Ireland was one of the two principal Ministers now present who, having already spoken, could not be heard again on the question before the House. Knowing, however, that this was not the proper occasion for such a speech, his right hon. and learned Friend had delivered an angry philippic with the not very amiable object of destroying any respect that might be entertained for the present Administration. His right hon. and learned Friend, after administering his gentle rebuke to the hon. Member for Ipswich, might, without any disadvantage, have wandered back to the particular subject under consideration, and not have proceeded to make a gratuitous attack upon the conduct of the Government under cover of a Motion such as this. A proper occasion would, no doubt, soon arise for the discussion of that question; and the Government would be then perfectly ready to meet the charges made by his right hon. and learned Friend and take the judgment of the House upon them.

MR. R. POWER said, he did not think that Her Majesty's Government ought to regret the discussion which had taken place, as it had been turned into a very good debate upon the Irish Land Question. If, however, they did regret it, he could only say that they could at any moment have stopped it by giving an honest and straight answer to an honest and straightforward question. The question was—why did they arrest Mr. Dillon? They defied the Government to give them an answer there that night. When the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department said this was a question of the greatest gravity, he (Mr. R. Power) said that was all the more reason why the Government should give them an opportunity for discussing it. Would the Government give them an opportunity for discussing the question? He thought they would not. He thought the Government had too much common sense to allow them to discuss the arrest of

Mr. Dillon. He quite admitted that Mr. Dillon was, to the Government, a great annoyance and a great inconvenience. The Chief Secretary for Ireland did not want him in Ireland, and the Secretary of State for the Home Department did not want him in the House of Commons. The Chief Secretary for Ireland imagined he saw in him a great conspirator against his authority in that country; and he (Mr. R. Power) could not help thinking that the Secretary of State for the Home Department imagined that he saw in Mr. Dillon a second Mr. John Devoy, who might come into that House and put a cask of dynamite under the Government Bench and blow it up, thereby sending the right hon. and learned Gentleman to another place. Was Ireland in a disturbed state at present, and was it on account of Mr. Dillon? He did not think it was on account of Mr. Dillon; and he was very glad indeed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) gave them, the other night, the reason why Ireland was in a disturbed state. He said that "Rapacious landlords keep the country in a state of disturbance." He (Mr. R. Power) should like to know why the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not put into Kilmainham some of those gentlemen who, he said, kept the country in a state of disturbance? He himself should be sorry, in Ireland, to say, in the Land League rooms in Dublin, for instance, that the rapacious landlords kept the country in a state of disturbance. He did not think it would be a safe thing to say under the present circumstances. He thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had certainly qualified himself to become an honorary member of the Land League by that statement. He did not remember any speech made in Ireland which would excite people more than to tell them that the rapacious landlord was the man who created all this disturbance—the man who turned them out on the road-side, and had no mercy for his tenants in any respect. But he would ask seriously—what was the feeling that the arrest of Mr. Dillon had created in Ireland? If there was one man in Ireland whom the people looked up to for counsel and advice—if there was a man who, by his character and his acts ever since he came into public life, merited and obtained the confidence of his countrymen—it was Mr. Dillon; and the arbitrary arrest of that man could not but weaken the hold of the Government, if they ever had any, upon the affection of the Irish people more than all the Coercion Bills they had ever passed in that House. He had just received a resolution from the Dungarvan Board of Guardians condemning the Government for what they had done, and they might expect similar resolutions of condemnation from the various Boards and public bodies in Ireland. They might depend upon it that by his arrest they had done more to create disloyalty and disaffection in Ireland than anything Mr. Dillon ever could or ever did do.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, that when the Coercion Bills were being passed through the House, he warned the Government that those measures would be used for the purpose of vengeance by the Irish landlords, and used by the Government for the purpose of suppressing political feeling in Ireland; and he thought the result had proved the perfect truth and justice of those forewarnings. It was a notorious fact that the men now arrested and imprisoned in Kilmainham and Galway were not the class of men described to the House by the Government as the persons whom they desired to arrest. The Government alleged that they desired to arrest the inciters to outrage, the midnight marauders, the village ruffians, and all the rest of it; but they, the Irish Members, alleged, on the other hand, that that was not their intention, and that their intention was to arrest the young men who were carrying on in a spirited, but in a perfectly legitimate and Constitutional way, the organization and the agitation of the Irish Land League, and that was really the case. With respect to his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), it was a remarkable fact that he was not arrested until the eve of the second reading of the Land Bill, and after he had made a speech which did not differ in character from many of those he had previously delivered. He must say that that looked very like foul play. Only last week a young man of excellent character, named Higgins, was arrested for signing, as honorary secretary, a resolution passed at a meeting of a local branch of the Land League, and sending a copy of it to a farmer residing in the neighbourhood. No one had, in fact, been arrested under the Acts answering to the character of those who were described by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland during the debates on the Bills. The Government secured the passing of the Coercion Acts by false pretences; the grounds they gave to the House did not and do not exist; the whole story was shown to have been a mass of exaggeration by the manner in which the Acts had been carried out. The Government should have been slow to arrest Mr. John Dillon at any time, and especially at the time they did. At the commencement of his political career he was grossly attacked in his absence by the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The most serious outrages in Ireland were those that were being committed under cover of the Act. The real criminals nestled in Dublin Castle, and their "head centre" was the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

MR. T. C. THOMPSON said, he would ask the Government to remember that clemency was far more powerful than cruelty. What was the result of the course the Government had pursued? Had any good ensued? Was Ireland any quieter, were the peasantry more contented, or were there fewer evictions? No; the evictions were increasing day by day, proving that the policy the Government had pursued was a bad policy. Everybody was sorry that Mr. Dillon was arrested; but the question was whether his imprisonment had been for good or evil. He was as much interested in the success of the policy of the present Government as anyone, believing the failure of it would be a misfortune to the country; but he must admit that Mr. Dillon's arrest was producing no good in either Ireland or England. Let them remember how English public opinion was aroused in regard to the trial of Governor Eyre for proceedings in Jamaica. The English people disliked the trickery used in that case; they resented the manner in which, in Jamaica, Gordon was arrested in a district not subject to martial law, and then transferred into a district where martial law had been proclaimed, and there tried by subaltern officers under such law and hanged. What was the feeling of England in this case? Was it not that the proclamation of the City of Dublin was made with a view of entrapping Mr. Dillon? Was it not also felt that he was arrested at a time when of all others he should have been left free, when he was coming over to England to discharge his duty, and when he considered his person safe. He (Mr. T. C. Thompson) said the feeling of the people of England was a feeling of indignation. The Government had many opportunities of arresting him. They had heard Mr. Dillon say many things in that House for which, supposing the Government had done their duty now, they ought to have arrested him then. Why did they arrest him now? A belief had gained ground that it was simply because his evidence on the Land Law (Ireland) Bill would have been most important? The Land Law (Ireland) Bill was a middle-class Bill, and there were few men in that House who represented anything but middle-class people, while Mr. Dillon represented a class he would have been proud to represent—the peasantry of Ireland. The blot upon that Bill was that there was no provision made in it in favour of the peasantry, no provision to prevent eviction in bad seasons, and Mr. Dillon would have spoken strongly against such an omission. They might pass hundreds of measures to relieve Ireland; but if no relief against evictions in such seasons as the peasantry had gone through lately was included in them they would be of no use. He appealed to the Government to let one of their first acts be the release of Mr. Dillon from prison, and the next the repeal of the odious Coercion Acts.

Mr. O'DONNELL rose to address the House, when—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. O'DONNELL resumed, by saying he wished to utter a few words upon the matter. It appeared hopeless to expect that either the English or Irish Government, so amply represented on the Treasury Bench at the present moment, would give anything like a satisfactory reply to the request of the Irish Party that evening. They had asked for facilities to discuss the case of Mr. Dillon. It was admitted on all hands that various suspicious circumstances attended that arrest; and they wanted an opportunity, in a straightforward manner, of grappling with the Government case. It certainly appeared that the probability of his appearing in the House to express the opinion of a very large body of the Irish people on the Land Law (Ireland) Bill had something to do with his arrest. Mr. Dillon had said nothing within the last few weeks preceding his arrest in any way different to what he had been saying months before; and the matter required a little more explanation than the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had given it, for he had simply defended himself for not giving information by reference to the bare letter of the Coercion Act. But an engagement had been given, when that Bill was under discussion, that the causes which led to every arrest should be laid upon the Table, and the breach of that engagement ought to bring a blush to the face of every Member of the Government. He saw that he was still more unfavourably situated than when he rose to address the House, because now there was not a single Member of the Government present. But he must say that there was as much intelligent knowledge of the affairs of Ireland on the Treasury Bench now as at any time since the Government came into Office.

Mr. WARTON said, he had no sympathy with the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon); but he must say he had, at least, been consistent in delivering exactly the same kind of speeches five months ago as three weeks ago; and it was the duty of the Government to have arrested him long before they had done. He (Mr. Warton) had himself brought to the notice of the Chief Secretary for Ireland many passages from the hon. Member's speeches; but he was always met by the right hon. Gentleman in a shuffling manner, and told that the passages cited were correctly given, though in some cases he had produced reports from different sources. The right hon. Gentleman was inconsistent in his conduct, and deserved the epithet he (Mr. Warton) had applied to him long ago.

PARLIAMENTARY OATHS (MR. BRADLAUGH).

MR. SPEAKER acquainted the House that he had received a letter from Mr. Bradlaugh, returned as one of the Members for the Borough of Northampton, relative to the proceedings of the House in his case, which he read to the House as followeth :—

To the Right Honble.

The Speaker of the House of Commons.
House of Commons Library,
11 May, 1881.

Sir,

I beg through you to place on record my protest against the Resolution of the House, hindering and preventing me from exercising my statutory right, and from performing my constitutional duty to my constituents. I have been duly returned as one of the Members to represent in the House of Commons the Borough of Northampton. The legality of that Return has been admitted by, and certified to, the House. There is no Petition against my Return, and it is not pretended that I am subject to any legal disqualification. Yet without any precedent in the Journals of the House, and in absolute defiance of the Statute, the House has thought fit—while recognising me as a duly elected Member—to prevent me by actual physical force from fulfilling the duty imposed upon me by the express words of the Law. The privileges of the House render it impossible for me to submit the question to the decision of a Court of Law. I can only for the moment solemnly protest, in the name of the electors of Northampton, whose rights have been infringed, and whose lawful representative I am. And I beg most respectfully, Sir, that, in such manner as to you may seem fit, you will communicate this protest to the House.

I have the honor to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient Servant,
CH. BRADLAUGH.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: With reference, Sir, to the letter you have just read, I wish to ask whether it will be competent for any hon. Member to move that it be taken into consideration on a future day; and, if such Motion may be made, whether it would be a question of Privilege, and taken at half-past 4 o'clock on whatever day may be fixed for the Motion?

MR. SPEAKER: The letter of Mr. Bradlaugh will appear in the Votes, and will be in the hands of Members to-morrow morning. It will be competent for any hon. Member to give Notice that the letter be taken into consideration on a future day, when it may be brought forward as a question of Privilege.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

NEWSPAPERS (LAW OF LIBEL) BILL.

(Mr. Hutchinson, Mr. Gregory, Mr. Edward Leatham, Mr. Samuel Morley.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HUTCHINSON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that during two successive Sessions Select Committees were appointed to inquire into the subject of newspaper libel, and each of these Committees was presided over by the Attorney General for the time being. The first of those Committees heard a mass of valuable evidence, but made no Report owing to want of time. The second Committee asked permission to have that evidence referred to them, and this Bill embodied the recommendations of that Committee, and was confined to them exclusively. The justification of the Bill lay in that fact, and he was thereby relieved from the necessity of entering upon any long argument in its support. The provisions of the Bill were few and exceedingly simple. Rightly considered, the interests of the newspaper Press and those of the public were quite identical; and the Bill, while intending to remove acknowledged hardships, also provided guarantees against danger that might be apprehended in some quarters. It proposed, in the first place, to protect newspapers in the exercise of an important function, the due performance of which was expected at their hands. A newspaper was the record and expression of what took place in public, of all political life, and of all municipal and social activity—in short, it was the record of everything outside the domain of strictly domestic intercourse; and he asked whether it was fair that an agency which met an ever-increasing demand of this kind, and which was expected to perform its functions with accuracy, should have to do its work in the midst of red-hot ploughshares, and should be subject to consequences for the injudicious language of persons whom it correctly reported. Protection from private liability in the discharge of an important public function was the end sought to be obtained by this Bill. It provided that a fair and honest bond fide report of lawful public meetings should be held as privileged in the same manner as reports of a similar character of proceedings in Parliament and the Courts of Justice. In the matter of comment the Bill left the law precisely as it was. It made no change in the law of civil action; but it did make some change in the present law of criminal prosecution for libel, and for good and sufficient reasons. He could give a long list of cases in which criminal prosecutions had been resorted to on the most frivolous pretences, either for the purpose of extorting money or gratifying private malice. A man's character could be quite as well vindicated by civil action as by criminal prosecution. He did not ask for the total abolition of criminal prosecution against a newspaper, because there might be cases of violation of public decency; but it seemed to him that the tremendous power of that law ought not to be placed within reach of capricious and unscrupulous persons who might be wickedly disposed and worthless. The Bill, therefore, asked that no criminal prosecution for libel against a newspaper should be instituted unless the Attorney General for the time being were satisfied that there was a prima facie case for resorting to that method instead of the ordinary one of civil action. Lastly, as the price which the newspapers would have to pay for those concessions, the Bill provided for the registration of newspaper proprietors. At present it was very difficult to find out who was the real proprietor of a newspaper; but by this registration clause the responsible person could be got at in case of need without any difficulty, and would prevent a man sheltering himself under the wing of a man of straw as at present—the nomini umbra. It would be noticed by the House that this Bill referred to England and Ireland alone, but not to Scotland, and the reason was significant. In Scotland, the changes he proposed by the Bill were practically, and had long been, in operation. Scotch newspaper proprietors would not thank them for including their newspapers in this Bill, because there was a large measure of free publicity as regards the reports of public meetings. These prosecutions must first be authorized by the Procurator Fiscal; and the strongest argument he could adduce for this Bill was that in Scotland, where criminal prosecutions for libel were almost unknown, civil actions also were extremely rare. The journalist was put upon his honour, and he acted accordingly. He (Mr. Hutchinson) believed a similar state of things would obtain in England and Ireland if this Bill were passed. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Hutchinson.)

MR. INDERWICK said, he did not rise for the purpose of opposing the second reading; but, at the same time, there were one or two provisions to which he could not give his assent. The main provision of the Bill was one that would meet with approbation—namely, that fair, honest, and bond fide reports of lawful public meetings should be privileged in the same way as reports of proceedings in Parliament and in Courts of Justice were privileged, it being thoroughly understood that the privilege did not extend to comments that might be made outside of such reports of public meetings. But it was also important that it should be laid down in very precise terms what was to be held a public meeting, for, of course, if two or three persons met to condemn the conduct of a person obnoxious to them that would not be a public meeting. By the second part of the 2nd clause it was provided that the defendant should not be entitled to avail himself of the defence that the report was a fair one if it were shown that he had refused to insert in his newspaper a reasonable explanation of the circumstances tendered for publication on the part of the persons reflected upon in the alleged libel. As the law stood now, no such limitation of the right of the defendant to avail himself of a legal ground of defence existed in the case of reports of proceedings in Parliament, or in the Courts of Law, and he did not see why it should be introduced in the case of reports of public meetings, especially as it might lead to endless and most inconvenient controversies in the public Press. He would be glad if that part of the Bill were altered in Committee. The Bill also provided for a better registration of proprietors. That, he thought, was extremely necessary, and it would obviate a great amount of difficulty which now existed in ascertaining the person morally responsible for the publication of a libel. The third proposal was open to very grave objection. He could not go the length of approving a suggestion that no criminal proceedings should be taken in respect of any libel without the consent of the Attorney General. He did not think that the right of any of Her Majesty's subjects to take criminal proceedings in respect of any libel, however gross or personal it might be, should be limited by the view which might be taken of the matter by the Attorney General. There were other matters that he should like to see dealt with by the Bill. For instance, as the law now stood, the person who considered himself aggrieved by the matter published had an alternative remedy. He might sue the defendant in a civil action, where he could give evidence on oath in his own defence, or he might, by taking criminal proceedings, shut the mouth of the defendant altogether. It was contrary to all right and justice that the accusing party should, by choosing one form of proceeding rather than the other, have the option of declaring whether or not his opponent should be heard. There was a growing feeling that the accused in all criminal cases should be permitted to make his statement upon oath; and, therefore, what he should ask the House to do in the present instance would be to enact that every criminal proceeding in respect of libel should be conducted in the same manner, both as to evidence and costs, as though it were a civil action—that was to say, that the defendant should have the right to go into the witness box at each stage of the proceedings, and make his own statement in denial or justification of the charge made against him.

MR. GREGORY said, the question the Select Committee had to consider was whether the proprietors of newspapers could be to any extent relieved from their present legal liabilities without prejudice to the public interests; and, after taking a great deal of evidence, and giving very careful consideration to the subject, the inquiry resulted in the Bill now before the House. The Committee felt that publishers of newspapers were very often made liable for acts which were not their own, and which it was almost impossible for them to control; and they, therefore, recommended that any report published in a newspaper of the proceedings of a public meeting should be privileged, if the meeting was convened for a lawful purpose, and open to the public, and if the report was fair and accurate, and published without malice. The privilege solely applied to public meetings, publicly convened, and would exclude railway and other meetings, where shareholders often called each other hard names, and where strong reflections were sometimes cast upon the commercial credit of individuals. The clause also required it to be proved that the publication of the matter complained of was for the public benefit; and he could not, with deference to his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Inderwick), think that there was much in his objection to the proposal that the protection afforded by the clause should not be available as a defence if the defendant had refused to publish an explanation or contradiction. In the course of his experience, he had always found that a respectable journal was ready to insert a reasonable explanation, or apology, for any libel that might have found its way into its columns; and in a case of libel before a jury the refusal to publish a contradiction was commonly treated as an aggravation of the offence. The 3rd clause, by providing that no prosecution for newspaper libel should be commenced without the fiat of the Attorney General, did not, of course, make the Attorney General responsible for the prosecution; but only required him to declare whether or not a prima facie case was made out, and he could not think the restriction was unfair. The registration of newspaper proprietors appeared to him to be a very important part of the Bill; but he was not sure whether the Bill would not be better without the clause, which imposed a £10 penalty for the omission of the printer, or publisher, to make the required return. A proprietor who wished to conceal his name would not be made by so small a penalty to disclose it; and it would be better either to make the penalty £10 for every month during which the return was not furnished, or to leave the omission to be dealt with under the ordinary law.

MR. J. COWEN said, he trusted the Bill would be read a second time, and that reasonable facilities would be allowed to his hon. and learned Friend for getting it through the House this Session. The subject had been dealt with many times, and in no instance had a more generally satisfactory solution been hit upon than that now before them. The late hon. and learned Member for Glasgow, the late Mr. Butt, and himself had been concerned in more than one Bill dealing with this subject during last Parliament. The difficulties that now beset the question had beset them; but those who were formerly unwilling for legislation had been brought to see the necessity and the justice of it. Two special Committees had inquired into the whole matter. Both the public and the newspaper proprietors had had an opportunity for putting their case before this Committee, and the Bill was the outcome of these deliberations. He recognized the difficulty of defining what was a public meeting; but, after full consideration, the words that were in the Bill had been hit upon as the best that could be chosen. Anyone who was capable of suggesting better words could do so in Committee. After repeated trials, those who had concerned themselves in the question had failed to define the meetings more accurately than in the clauses as they stood in the Bill. He thought it was only fair that persons who felt themselves aggrieved should have the liberty of requesting the insertion of corrections or explanations. If reports of public meetings were to be privileged, the public, on the other hand, should be at liberty to correct any inaccuracies in these privileged reports, and newspapers would only be too willing to comply with the request. It was not to the interest of a newspaper proprietor to circulate what was incorrect. It would not add to the reputation of the paper, and certainly it would not add to its influence, to give persistent publicity to unfair and incorrect reports. Everyone now admitted the hardship under which newspaper proprietors lay in being held responsible, both civilly and criminally, for fairly reporting proceedings of public bodies. The Bill would free them from that responsibility. In consideration for that concession, newspapers were to register the list of proprietors. That he regarded as a retrograde step. It was going back upon an obsolete law. In former times the owner of every printing press had to be registered. Printers were regarded as disturbers of the peace. Their types were considered as explosive materials, and they themselves were treated as rogues and vagabonds or dealers in dangerous commodities. That was when the Press was in its infancy. The law had gradually been modified, and now it had only a nominal force. Papers might be registered, but it was not compulsory for them to be so. He did not see any reason why the owner of a newspaper should be registered any more than the owner of a coal mine or the owner of a chemical works. A chemical works might destroy the vegetation in a neighbourhood, or it might injure the health or lead to the death of cattle. Persons who suffered by these had their remedy against the proprietor of the works, although these proprietors were not registered. If, in consequence of the working of a coal mine, the surface subsided and injury was sustained by anyone, the people who suffered could sue the coalowners and get redress, and yet the coalowners were not registered. He did not see why newspapers should be treated differently. If newspapers undermined the character of anyone, the persons attacked could get at the owners of the newspaper just as easily as people could get at the owners of chemical works or coal mines. He objected to this exceptional legislation. It was quite true that there had been isolated instances where newspaper proprietors had got out of their responsibilities by quibbling; but these cases were rare. That was a point of the Bill he objected to, and, when in Committee, he would try to modify it or amend it; but the Bill generally was a fair attempt to settle a complicated and difficult subject, and he hoped the House would assist his hon. Friend in giving it the force of law.

MR. MACLIVER said, he thought that reports of the proceedings of Boards of Guardians, of Town Councils, of School Boards, and of other public bodies through which public money was expended, should be held to be privileged. He cited a case in which the law, as it at present affected Boards of Guardians, operated manifestly to the prejudice of the ratepayers. When the Bill got into Committee, he should propose a clause to the effect that any report of any public body having the administration of public funds, such as Town Councils and Boards of Guardians, to whose meetings reporters of the Press were admitted, should be privileged, if such reports were fair and accurate, and published without malice. Such a provision would be a considerable protection to newspapers, and would confer a real benefit upon the public.

MR. WARTON said, he rose for the purpose of supporting this Bill warmly. In his opinion, the Bill would be more useful than all the other measures put together which had been brought forward on the Ministerial side of the House since the present Government came into Office. He did not, however, agree with the criticism of the hon. and learned Member for Rye (Mr. Inderwick), as he thought that no definition should be given of a public meeting; but that every case should be left to be decided by a Judge and jury, who would consider all the facts and circumstances of the case. He most strongly supported the 3rd clause, believing that no criminal prosecution for libel should be brought without the consent of the Attorney General. Very often criminal proceedings were taken in respect of libels for the purpose of stopping the mouth of the defendant. Until the time came when the Criminal Code, which was too valuable a measure for the Government to deal with, was before the House, he should not like to say anything on the subject of the propriety of permitting defendants in criminal cases to give evidence.

MR. ASHTON DILKE said, he was sorry to interrupt the harmony which this Bill had brought from every part of the House, including the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), who as a rule did not sympathize very strongly with attempts at legislation on the part of Liberal Members; but he could not entirely agree with any part of this Bill. The point as to "being privileged" was a good one. As to deciding what a public meeting was, they knew there were a great many bodies who often excluded reporters just as they pleased, and there was also a class of meetings which were semi-private. For instance, meetings of Conservatives in different parts of London, to which admission was almost invariably by ticket, could hardly be termed public meetings. It was unfortunate that they should have to discuss this Bill so much in detail; but it was not their fault, because it in reality consisted of three measures, which might be embodied in three different Bills, and more closely debated in Committee. With regard to prosecutions by the Attorney General, he did not think that provision was all that was wanted. What was wanted was that magistrates should have a discretionary power of dealing with them. They might have the power of inflicting fines or short sentences of imprisonment instead of sending defendants for trial. There was a danger arising from occasions which were not very important, but distinctly libellous. Magistrates desired to give defendants the benefit of the smallest possible doubt. He did not think the scheme, as at present proposed in the third part of the Bill, would work at all. There were two classes of proprietors. They would have to deal with what he might term good proprietors and bad proprietors. This Bill was aimed at the wicked proprietors; but sufficient machinery was not provided to carry out the intention of the Bill in this respect. Very often, too, the printers and the proprietor were entirely different people. The responsibility for libel was now a meaningless one. It was quite right that there should be civil and criminal responsibility; but it was well known that newspaper proprietors were often civilly responsible when they were not criminally; and criminal actions were often brought against publishers who ought not to be implicated at all in the Law of Libel. It should be defined where the criminal responsibility ought to end. He thought the penalty of £10 was a ridiculous one. A wicked proprietor would give the printer an indemnity, unless the amount of the fine was extremely heavy. They would find that under this provision the law would be practically inoperative, and things would go on very much as they did at the present moment. Whatever law was passed, they would find that the man they were seeking to get hold of was seeking to evade the law, and they would be no better off than they were before. He should not oppose the second reading of the Bill; but he thought it might be materially altered in Committee.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he fully shared the objections against the Bill which had been raised by the hon. Member who has just spoken. He entirely agreed that the registration of newspaper proprietors was antiquated, obsolete, and unsuited to the present time. As to public meetings, it had been argued that the definition applied only to meetings of corporate bodies or great assemblages open to the public, and did not include the meetings of public companies. But this latter class of meetings were the very class to which it was most necessary often, for the sake of the public, that attention should be called, and fair reports of the proceedings published in the newspapers. He had known instances where companies in a tottering condition had been enabled to keep on drawing in new victims by the absence of fair and full reports of their proceedings. If fair and full reports were given of the proceedings of such concerns, the public might be warned, and the final crash of the company foreshadowed. There was no class of reports out of which libels were more likely to arise than those of the proceedings at meetings of public companies and shareholders. He remembered one case in his own experience in which some of the shareholders of a company felt convinced that one of the officials was literally cooking the accounts and mismanaging the affairs. A meeting of shareholders was called, and the charges were distinctly repeated, and a newspaper with which he (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) was at that time connected published a report of the proceedings. The person accused brought an action for libel, and no doubt would have got a verdict but that his guilt in the meantime was found out and he had to abscond. This incident showed the importance of their not narrowing the scope of the Bill so as to exclude the reports of the public meetings of companies from the category of privileged reports, and he thought some improvement might be made in that particular.

MR. LABOUCHERE hoped that the Bill would be read a second time; but thought that certain changes would have to be made in Committee. It would be necessary to define more clearly than the 2nd clause did what was a public meeting. With regard to the 3rd clause, he did not entirely agree with it. He thought it was a mistake to vest any more power than was absolutely required in a Minister of the Crown or other central authority. If a summons for libel were obtained, the magistrate was not able to dismiss the case summarily, even if he thought a jury would not convict. He was obliged to send the case to trial. If a newspaper were to say when the claimant came out of prison that the claimant had been in prison, the claimant might go before a magistrate, and might insist on the newspaper proprietor or whoever was responsible being sent for trial at the Old Bailey. He might put him to heavy expense, although there was no doubt there would be an acquittal. It, therefore, seemed to him (Mr. Labouchere) very desirable that, instead of a fiat being obtained from the Attorney General for a trial in such a case, a magistrate should be able to deal summarily with any application made to him on the subject. As to the registration of proprietors, there was formerly not a register of proprietors, but a register in which one person was entered as proprietor. He might have half-a-dozen partners; but it was not necessary to enter their names in the register. The hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) had remarked that colliery owners were not registered. The cases were, however, different; and while everybody knew the proprietor of a colliery, it was difficult with regard to newspapers to discover who was the responsible person. In almost all cases the printers and publishers of newspapers were mere dummies. He submitted to the Attorney General whether it would not be possible to render the printer liable if he did not give up the name of some responsible person as proprietor. He did not see the necessity of registering the names of all the proprietors. Some were mere shareholders in a newspaper, and it would only gratify an idle curiosity to put their names in the register. He thought the Bill was in the right direction, and he hoped the House would agree to the second reading.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), said, the Bill appeared to him to be a very useful measure, and he hoped it would not only be read a second time, but that an opportunity would be afforded for reading it a third time. The House would remember that newspaper proprietors had formerly held liable for criminal proceedings where they had not personally erred, and that this state of things produced considerable discussion some years ago in relation to the liability of newspaper proprietors. But some few years ago, in a case that was heard before the late Lord Chief Justice, the opinion was strongly expressed by the Court that Lord Campbell's Act would protect from criminal proceedings those who had intrusted editorial duties to others and had not been deficient in any want of care themselves. This Bill did not deal with that point, because it was felt by the Committee which considered the matter last year that the law already existing afforded sufficient protection. The Bill was the result of the deliberations of a Select Committee of last Session, on which it could not be said that those interested in newspapers had anything like a preponderating influence, but in which the general public were well represented. One or two objections had been made to the Bill. It had been said that there ought to be greater clearness in the definition of what a public meeting was. As to that objection, he would only observe that those who made it should be good enough to define what was a public meeting. Directly you defined what was a public meeting you excluded all other meetings from the operation of the Bill. He thought it was much safer to leave a judicial tribunal to define the term "public meeting." Prima facie, he should say if reporters were admitted in order to report, the meeting would be regarded as public. The hon. Member for Rye (Mr. Inderwick) said under this Bill a few persons might meet together, and by means of private scandal ruin the character of any man. But no editor would have the protection of this Bill in such a case as that, for the editor must show that the publication was for the public benefit, and that it was not a mere private slander. The objection to Clause 3 which the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had urged—namely, that the requirement of a fiat from the Attorney General before proceedings for libel could be commenced would have the effect of giving too much power to the Executive Government, was an objection which he would meet by stating that the principle was one which had been much extended of late years. He had always given notice to persons accused to say what they had to say before he issued his fiat; but he would suggest to the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill that the 2nd clause should be so altered in Committee that a fiat should not be issued against editors of newspapers until they had had an opportunity of making a statement before the Attorney General. As to the question of registration, he thought that registration was, on the whole, beneficial to the public, while he did not think it was injurious to editors of newspapers. That, however, was a matter to be discussed in Committee, and he would now content himself by asking the House to allow the Bill to be read a second time.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR GABRIEL GOLDNEY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, observed that the object of the Bill was to get rid of a statute called Horne Tooke's Act, which was passed for the purpose of getting rid of a man whose political opinions were obnoxious. The Act excluded clergymen from sitting in the House of Commons. Mr. Horne Tooke was returned for Old Sarum at a time when political feeling was very strong. He (Sir Gabriel Goldney) did not know the reason why his right hon. Friend (Mr. Beresford Hope) sitting below him and others objected to clergymen sitting in the House of Commons.

It was formerly held that clergymen sitting in Convocation were not privileged to sit in the House of Commons, because they claimed the right of taxing themselves through Convocation, instead of through the House of Commons, and it was felt that they ought not to have a double voice; but in 1846 the powers of Convocation were abolished. Clergymen were now eligible for all civil offices and functions, and why should they be excluded from the House of Commons? Why should they be ostracized from all political feeling and action? They performed all the ordinary duties of citizens, and became Guardians of the poor. It might be said that it was inconsistent to be in the pulpit one day and in the House the next; but this applied with equal force to officers in the Army and Navy. It might be said that they ought not to be in the House of Commons, but performing their duties as officers, and looking after their men. Nonconformist ministers also could sit in the House without any objection being taken on the ground that political life was inconsistent with clerical functions. The history of the disabilities of the clergy was remarkable. For instance, at one time clergymen were excluded from hunting, on the ground that it was inconsistent with their duties; but a statute was passed which declared that it was necessary they should have that excellent exercise for the purpose of carrying on their duties more efficiently, and it was one of the prerogatives of the Crown that when a Bishop died his pack of hounds should go to the Crown, or that in lieu thereof compensation should be paid. In the performance of secular duties clergymen were admirable examples to the rest of the community. Nearly a third of the Bills in the Journals of the House dealt with subjects—such as Augmentation of Benefices, Burial Fees, Church Patronage, Ecclesiastical Endowments, Marriage Law Amendment Act, Poor Removal—in the discussion of which clergymen would be able to take part and give to the House the advantage of their knowledge and experience. He thought Parliament ought to abolish an Act that was passed for the purpose of excluding a man whose political opinions were adverse to the Minister of the day. Being unable to exclude him individually, they excluded the whole body of clergymen. He spoke as a Churchman, and as one who did all he could for the Church; and he asked the House to say that the clergy should not be treated as a different social order from the rest of the community. He was quite satisfied it would be beneficial to the Church if some clergymen were to come within an arena like the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Gabriel Goldney.)

MR. BERESFORD HOPE, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, congratulated his hon. Friend on the array of authorities he had pressed into his service. Even the venerable "Brother Bragge," of political poetry, had made his appearance; and he presumed that Brother Bragge and Brother Hiley were kept in reserve. The present state of matters was that clergymen, whether with or without a cure of souls, could not sit and vote in the House, and his hon. Friend wished to alter that state of things. On previous occasions his hon. Friend promoted a Bill to allow clergymen who had not a cure of souls to sit and vote in the House. He (Mr. Beresford Hope) thought there were sufficient reasons even against that measure, and he had the satisfaction of carrying the House with him. There were already plenty of elements of disturbance in the House, plenty of heart-burnings, plenty of faction—he was not accusing one side or the other, but only that human nature, of which they were all sharers—plenty of misunderstanding, plenty of class grievances, plenty of everything which dis-tempered debate and paralyzed wise counsels. Was it desirable, then, to introduce fresh elements of discord by bringing in what he must as a Churchman, a Christian, and a citizen say would be a most pestilent specimen of the genus citizen—namely, the political parson who would use his partizanship for his political advantage? He might either be a rich rector, with aspirations, or a discontented curate, with a grievance. In either case, he had his pulpit to preach in, his school to lecture in, his parish vestry, his meetings for mothers, for fathers, and for uncles, and did they want to introduce that man into Parliament also? Did they want to have the scandal of a man being able to spend his Sunday mornings and evenings in preaching his political speeches from the pulpit, and upon weekdays inflict his tedious sermons on the House? Did they want such a man to be able from the rising of the sun until 4 o'clock to be able to canvass in his cassock, and then come down to the House and be addressed as the hon. and rev. Member for So-and-so? He should regard the introduction of "political parsons" to the House as a fresh scandal to good order and religion and piety. His hon. Friend had given a list of a dozen Bills which he thought ought to be canvassed and traversed by clerical Members. He (Mr. Beresford Hope) prophesied, however, that if clergymen were admitted in sufficient numbers and of sufficient variety of clerical opinions to influence a debate, the non-clerical Members of the House would rise in revolt against them. In order to attain his hon. Friend's Utopia, half-a-dozen High, half-a-dozen Low, and half-a-dozen Broad Church clergymen would have to be secured. It was urged that it was hard that there should be no clergymen in that House, seeing that there were Bishops in the House of Lords; but it should be remembered that a clergyman would enter the House of Commons after a contested election and with constituents at his back. The election of a Bishop, on the other hand, was a ceremony which might be very abhorrent to the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), but it had not much effect on his position in the House of Lords afterwards, and he had no constituents. The Bench of Bishops in the other House might be a valuable part of the Constitution or it might not. That was not the question before the House now, but it depended on totally different considerations; and to attempt to darken counsel and mix up that matter with the present discussion was only to show how trivial and imaginary was the grievance alleged in the case and how weak was the ground for the Bill. In conclusion, he trusted that the House, considering the present state of Public Business, would not encourage even so respectable a Member as his hon. Friend to air his crotchets at the expense of the national time; but that the House, which had already, before getting into Committee upon the one single Bill of importance, taken 200 divisions during this Session, would, if necessary, have its 201st division that morning for the purpose of relieving itself from the present annoyance for the rest of the Session. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Beresford Hope.)

MR. THOROLD ROGERS, in supporting the second reading of the Bill, said, he would not attempt to follow the heated rhetoric and habitual prophecies of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. He could not, however, share in the apprehensions entertained by that right hon. Gentleman as to the dangers that were likely to arise from the possible introduction of a clergyman into the House if a constituency could be found to return him. He thought, moreover, that if any clergyman were to resort to the objectionable means to acquire a seat in that House which the right hon. Gentleman had so graphically described, the constituency would know how to deal with him and would emphatically reject him. He maintained, further, that Horne Tooke's Act, which it was now proposed to repeal, was entirely unconstitutional, having been directed, not only against an individual, but against the privileges of a class without the smallest justification. All persons who were liable to be taxed for their lay possessions were in justice and on constitutional grounds eligible to be returned to Parliament if they were untainted by crime and subject to no legal disqualification. This was the result of the arrangement made between Clarendon and Archbishop Sheldon in 1655, as was proved by the cases cited in Bragge's Report of 1801, for all the cases in which clergymen, having spiritual fees, had been elected and were disqualified by vote of the House occurred before 1655, and all cases, notably those of Gordon and Rushworth, in which their seats were unchallenged, occurred after that date. Horne Tooke himself had stood twice for Westminster before he was elected for Old Sarum, and no one thought of saying that votes given to him were thrown away. The clergy had ceased to be represented, for purposes of taxation, in Convocation, and, therefore, they got votes for the House of Commons and were eligible for seats there. Mr. Horne Tooke had been a clergyman. He had abandoned his living at an early period, and he took a very active part in politics. He was a very considerable politician, as well as a very considerable scholar, and also a great advocate of constitutional progress and reform. The passing of the Act against him was a scandal, being dictated by antipathy to a single individual. It was intended that the Act should be confined to the clergy of the Church of England, or rather to the united Church of England and Ireland; and the question might well be raised whether the united Church of England and Ireland, having now ceased to exist as it did before the Irish Church was disestablished, any person could really be brought under the penalties of the statute. That, however, he said only by the way. The Scotch Presbyterian minister was somewhat differently placed from the Anglican clergyman, not being a minister when he left his benefice. He held, however, that a clergyman was not a clergyman in the eye of the law or within the range of spiritual authority unless actually in possession of a cure of souls. After Catholic Emancipation was conceded the same disabilities as attached to the Anglican clergy were extended to Roman Catholic priests, and he would not have the least objection to see a provision inserted in the present Bill stating that if an Irish constituency elected a Roman Catholic clergyman to that House their choice of such a Representative should be respected. The passage of Horne Tooke's Act was an invasion of the rights of a section of the community, and he hoped to see the day very speedily arrive when it would be repealed.

COLONEL MAKINS said, he did not desire to enter into any historical discussion of Horne Tooke's case. It was enough to say that the Preamble of the Act which it was now sought to repeal declared that it was passed to remove doubts which existed as to the eligibility of persons in Holy Orders to sit in that House. They had nothing to do now with the motives which might have induced men to vote for or against that Act; they had only to consider that the Preamble expressed the mind of Parliament in passing it. Persons who found that they had made a mistake in entering the Church had already been relieved by the Act of 1870; and the present Bill was intended to carry that Act a step further in a direction which he did not think would be indorsed by the opinion of the House. The Bill was designed to admit beneficed clergymen as well as unbeneficed to the House, and if it passed they might have Dean Stanley sitting in the House both as Dean of and Member for Westminster. The Canon Law and the Common Law were brought into accord by Horne Tooke's Act; but by passing the present Bill the discord between the two systems of law would be restored. There was, he maintained, no necessity for the change, inasmuch as clergymen were now represented in their lay capacity by their local Representatives, and in their clerical capacity in Convocation, and in the House of Lords. This Bill was principally promoted, as was well known, in the interest of an individual. He objected to that. He objected to the alteration of the Oath to please an individual, and he opposed that Bill on the ground that it was intended to meet the scruples of an individual or of a few individuals. The only argument that he could see in favour of the Bill was that if they were to have the Member (Mr. Bradlaugh) who had taken up so much of the time of the House introduced, it might be desirable to have a countervailing element in the presence of some of the clergy. They might, if this Bill were passed, have the hon. and rev. Augustus Smith, M.P., advertised to preach in some Northampton church on the text "Fear God and honour the King." He must oppose the second reading, seeing there had been no Petitions or meetings in favour of this measure.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, he was as anxious as any Member to open the portals of the House to every man whom a constituency might think it right to return, without imposing on him any religious disabilities; but he was sorry that it should have been thought necessary by the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just spoken to impart into the present discussion any reference to the unpleasant scenes which the House had witnessed with regard to the hon. Member for Northampton. At the same time, he could not see his way to support the Bill, which would admit into the House clergymen having the cure of souls. That would be a very incongruous state of things. They might have a clergyman using his pulpit as a rostrum on Sundays to preach an election address. That would be a scandal. He was very much opposed to clerical justices of the peace, and had formerly introduced a Bill to disqualify them, and he must oppose the present proposal. If clergymen felt anxious to enter the House, there was an Act—to which he (Mr. Hinde Palmer) was a party—already in the Statute Book of which they could avail themselves. Holy Orders imposed certain disabilities on clergymen, and unless they divested themselves of their clerical character he could not agree to the removal of those disabilities. The Bill before the House he regarded as unqualified in its nature, uncalled for, and one that ought not to receive the encouragement of Parliament.

MR. HIBBERT said, the Clerical Disabilities Act of 1870, which he had been instrumental in passing, had in every way successfully carried out the intentions of its promoters, and had not only enabled a large number of gentlemen to retire from the Church, but had admitted three or four Members to that House. Although ready to vote for the second reading of this Bill, he could not give it his entire support unless clergymen holding cures of souls or offices under State appointment were excluded from its operation. It was said that this Bill was aimed at one person, and the hon. Gentleman opposite said he should oppose it on the same grounds that he opposed the Oaths Bill. But the opposition to the Oaths Bill was aimed, not at the admission, but the exclusion of one person. If, however, it had been permissible to pass Horne Tooke's Act for the purpose of excluding one person, the House might fairly be asked to pass a Bill to admit one person; but he supported the measure on broader grounds. He desired to see a disability removed. The Clerical Disabilities Act required the person taking advantage of the relief it gave to retire from the Church; but he wanted to know whether they could not go a step further, and provide that a person in Holy Orders, if he had ceased to hold preferment, should not be required to divest him of his reverend character before obtaining admission to that House? If a clergyman became a Peer he could enter the House of Lords without divesting himself of his clerical character, and he saw no reason why the House of Commons should not be placed in the same position as the other House in that respect. Why should they compel a clergyman to divest himself of his black coat before entering that House? He did not see that the House would have suffered in any way if the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers) and the hon. Member for Waterford County (Mr. Villiers-Stuart), who had resigned Holy Orders to become Members of the House, had not been compelled to do so, and had, if they pleased, attended in their places in clerical costume and retained the title of "Rev." Therefore, he saw no objection to the repeal of Horne Tooke's Act, but on the conditions he had named as to excluding beneficed clergymen. So long as the Church of England was connected with the State, it would not be right that clergymen of the Church should be placed in the same position as ministers of other Denominations. Whenever the Church was separated from the State—and he hoped that time might be far distant—then they might agree to place clergymen of the Church in exactly the same position as those of other Denominations.

SIR JOHN MOWBRAY said, the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) said that the Act of 1870 had worked exceedingly well. Why, then, alter it? This Bill proposed the repeal pure and simple of Horne Tooke's Act. But a Bill without reservations or restrictions or limitations would only bring the law back to the state of confusion which existed before Horne Tooke's Act was passed. The hon. Member for Southwark, who always addressed the House with perfect confidence, laid down as a fact about which there was no doubt that, whatever the law, clergymen had sat in the House. If there was no doubt about the question, how was it there had been so many inquiries before Select Committees? Horne Tooke's Act was not passed in a day or a week. It was the result of inquiry, grave deliberation, and animated debates. He found it laid down that, from the time of Edward I. to the year 1800, neither that House nor the Constitution of the Realm had ever recognized the right of clergymen as such to sit in Parliament. If clergymen had in fact sat, it was because the House had not recognized them as such. But whenever the House took notice of the return of clergymen it declared the return void. Reference had been made to Rushworth's case; but it would, he thought, be found that that completely broke down. Rushworth was ordained a deacon at 21, and only exercised his calling for two months, and the Committee which seated him expressly distinguished his case. As to the Bishops in the other House, they had been placed there either by statute enactment or in great official capacities; therefore, the case of the Bishops was no argument at all. They did not go through contested popular elections; they did not sit for Macclesfield or Boston, or even so immaculate a city as Oxford. He would remind the House of the words used by Lord Temple, who, in 1801, said—

"I conjure you to pause well before you allow priests to desert their pulpits, to search for fame on the benches of the House of Commons, and force them to leave the plain and beaten road of religion, to wander in the crooked and uneven paths of politics; and finally, before you sink the sanctity of the clerical character in the chicanery of private prejudices, of party, and of faction."—[Parl. Hist. xxxv. 1368.]

He hoped the House would reject the Bill.

MR. GREGORY said, he did not attach much importance to the argument that clergymen would be damaged by taking part in contested elections. What they were really dealing with was Horne Tooke's Act. They could not ignore the circumstances which led up to that legislation; on the contrary, he thought they must take them into their present consideration. Clergymen had sat in that House previous to Horne Tooke's Act, but no objection was ever taken to them before. He asked, was this a time for continuing that disability? He believed there was nothing to apprehend from the introduction of clergymen to that House; and as the law at present stood, it operated against those who were too conscientious to relieve themselves of Holy Orders, whilst it did not prevent others who availed themselves of recent legislation for that purpose from sitting in the House.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the arguments that had been advanced seemed largely to preponderate in favour of the second reading of the Bill; but he could not support it on the ground adopted by some hon. Members. He could not adopt the grounds advanced by his hon. Friend the Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers), or by the hon. Member who had just spoken. They had put it on the ground that clergymen were entitled to sit in that House until Horne Tooke's Act was passed. He believed the opposite opinion was the true one, and he had looked carefully into the matter. He believed that the greatest Parliamentary names were found in favour of the distinct and clear declaration that clergymen were ineligible to sit in the House of Commons. He might mention the names of Addington, Sir W. Scott, Mr. Law (afterwards Lord Ellenborough), Lord Eldon, and Mr. Charles Williams Winn; and this weighty roll of distinguished lawyers declared clearly on this point. As to the present Bill, it would be necessary that it should be altered. They could not take it for granted that but for Horne Tooke's Act clergymen would be entitled to a seat in that House if elected. The ground on which he would support, generally, the second reading was not because the law had been so hitherto, but because he was against the principle of religious disabilities interfering with seats in that House. That was the principle on which the Party to which he belonged had constantly acted; and step by step, and degree by degree, they had removed all the disabilities which existed by the law of Parliament or the Statutes of the Realm. He must ask, however, with regard to this Bill, what the promoters meant to do with the disabilities of the Roman Catholic clergy? Because it was impossible to pass this Bill in its present form without dealing with the 9th section of the Emancipation Act. Under that Act, Roman Catholic priests were subject to certain penalties if they sat in that House; and it would be impossible to admit one class of priests and exclude another. He thought, before the Bill went further, this was a point which the hon. Member in charge of the Bill must very seriously consider. No doubt,

Sir John Mowbray

n old days the Secretaries of State were nearly always clergymen; and Ambassadors were more often clergymen than not. Gardiner was the Minister of Henry VIII., and the religious and secular elements were combined without difficulty. There was another difficulty, which it would be well if the hon. Member took into consideration, and that was the question of Crown patronage as it would effect clergymen. Would a clergyman holding a seat in the House, accepting preferment from the Crown, be required to vacate his seat? The object of the Act of Queen Anne was clear; and he thought this question would be a thorny one for a Committee to determine. A point was raised as to clergymen being engaged in corrupt practices. Well, they all hoped that under the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General those practices would cease to exist. But there was a much more formidable danger which threatened the right hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) and the right hon. Member for Oxford (Sir John Mowbray), and that was the formidable rivals which this Bill would, when carried, raise up. He should not be surprised to find his right hon. Friends determined opponents of the Bill, for a more formidable rivalry he could not imagine. It had been advanced by the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Hinde Palmer) as an argument against the Bill, that it would create a new evil by tempting clergymen to turn their pulpits into political rostrums; but he (Sir William Harcourt) did not think that that was an evil which would be "created" by this measure, inasmuch as they had already had some experience of it. He did not think, therefore, that that was an argument that they need be afraid of. There must be some restriction in the Bill upon beneficed clergymen; and, subject to the considerations he had advanced, and on the general principle that religious disabilities ought not to be allowed to interfere with the choice of constituencies, he would support the second reading of the Bill.

MR. WARTON protested against the historical disquisition, not of "Historicus," but of the learned Professor the Member for Southwark, and urged, as an argument against the Bill which had not been mentioned by any of the previous speakers, that the Church was one of the Estates of the Realm, and as such was properly represented by Lords Spiritual in the other House of Parliament, and that it was unconstitutional for the Church to seek to extend her rights in that House. If clergymen were admitted into the House of Commons, there would be a demand that the Bishops should retire from the House of Lords.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he rose for the purpose of referring to the point mentioned by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary with regard to the disabilities of Roman Catholic clergymen. He would have great pleasure in supporting this Bill if it went the whole way in the direction it professed to take; but it did not go the whole way. The Bill proposed to remove the present disability of clergymen of the Established Church to sit in the House; and he contended that if one denomination of the clergy were to be allowed to sit in the House he did not see why the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland should be excluded. If the Bill passed it would keep out the clergy of all Denominations, except those of the Church of England, and this at a time when the doors of the House of Commons were being thrown open to Infidels and Atheists. He should like to see in that House the Bishops and Priests of Ireland, and he believed they would make efficient Representatives of the Irish people. He had no doubt, if the law were altered, they would see in that House as the Representative of Tipperary, Archbishop Croke with Mr. John Dillon. He should be very glad to see in that House Dr. Nulty, who was, perhaps, better acquainted with the Land Question than any Member of that House. He should like to see in that House Canon Doyle and Father Sheehy, because they would be a great advantage to its deliberations. The Bill, if passed, would exclude the Irish Catholic and Protestant clergy; and if it were passed they would soon have a new and a lively agitation in Ireland, because the Catholic and Protestant clergy of that country would not submit to lie under the disabilities which had been removed from the clergy of the Established Church in England. If the Bill were passed, the Irish people would send those clergymen to the House of Commons to fight out their battle in the same way that Mr. Bradlaugh was doing, and then it would be found that Parliament would have to legislate upon the subject. If the hon. Member who had brought in this Bill would adopt the suggestion of its Seconder, he (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) would be glad to support it; and he believed that other Irish Members would be prepared to do the same.

Mr. S. LEIGHTON said, that the Act of 1870 had relieved the clergy from the professional grievance—complaint of which was made by some persons on their behalf, but not by themselves. He might refer to the case of barristers and officers of the Army, to show how inconsistent the two functions of being Members of Parliament and being actively engaged in their Professions were with the proper discharge of their duties in the latter capacity. The combination of the two functions exercised a demoralizing effect on the Bar as a Profession; the same result would be produced in the case of the clergy if they sat in that House, seeing the vast amount of patronage which was in the hands of the Government. Suppose a number of aspiring and able clergymen constantly attacking the Government, and hon. Members could easily conceive how great would be the temptation to stop their mouths by giving them some ecclesiastical preferment. Suppose the Dean of Westminster, as had been suggested, were in the House, he might in a little time become Prime Minister, and then recommend himself to the Archbishop of Canterbury and hold the two Offices together, as they had been held together before. They would thus be going back to the state of things that existed in the time of Henry VIII. It was an error to suppose that constituencies might return whom they liked, and that the House was bound to admit the per-

MR. WOLFF rose

He had to comin which the Bill

It was religious ious, and ought, he sole House.

Mr. GABRIEL GOLDNEY said, it was so introduced.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, he was reminded by the present debate of a scene once enacted in the National Convention of France, when one Anacharsis Clootz made his appearance there as the representative of All Nations. It seemed to him that if the ultra-Liberal disposition to remove all restrictions were to prevail, aliens, now excluded, would be admitted to seats in that House, and then Mr. Speaker would occupy a position analogous to that of Anacharsis Clootz. If the restrictions upon the admission of Atheists were to be removed, he should see little reason for maintaining them against the clergy. Until professed Atheists were admitted, he should abide by the exclusion of the clergy. He asked the House to consider for a moment the probable consequences of the measure it was now invited to assent to. It was his belief that the clergy were best represented by the Bishops in the House of Lords; but the authority of the Bishops was contested, and even openly defied, and if beneficed clergy were admitted to that House, their action might further weaken the authority and power of the Bishops. He saw no advantage to an Episcopal Church in counteracting the authority of the Bishops; and that must result from the admission of the inferior clergy to seats in that House, for their admission would inevitably encourage those among the clergy who were inclined to rebel against the authority of the Bishops. It was upon the practical ground that the measure tended to introduce a principle of confusion into the Constitution of this country that he took objection to it. Moreover, the admission of the clergy to seats in that House was not demanded by any considerable section of them. On the contrary, he believed that the wishes of the clergy pointed in a distinctly different direction. His hon. Friend (Mr. Leighton) had stated that many persons objected to the clergy acting as justices of the peace, and, no doubt, that was the case; but he (Mr. Newdegate) did not concur in that objection. The function of a magistrate was consistent with the Constitution of the Church of England, which defined herself to be a congregation of faithful men, and her clergy as citizens. There was, however, a broad line of distinction to be drawn between the making and the administration of the law. The clergy of the Church of England were peculiarly bound to obey the law, and he (Mr. Newdegate) held that they were peculiarly adapted and qualified to administer the law as justices of the peace; and he believed that their admission to seats in that House would be the introduction of an element of weakness, or he might rather say an aggravation of an element of weakness in the Church, that would be without any countervailing advantage to the House itself.

MR. W. FOWLER said, the real question to be decided was whether there was any good reason for the exclusion of a large body of highly intelligent men from the House, and he had failed to hear a single sound argument against their admission. It was a matter for a man's own conscience to settle whether his duties as a beneficed clergyman were or were not compatible with those which he would have to discharge as a Member of Parliament. But there were many clergymen who were not beneficed, but who objected to make the declaration under the Act of 1870 which they must do before they could become Members of the House; and why should Parliament exclude them? The true test of qualification was that a Member should be the choice of a constituency, and it was not for the House to say that such or such a man should not be elected. It was absurd to suppose that a clergyman could be defiled more than any other man by having to pass through the turmoil of a contested election. He was glad, he might add, to find that no speaker, not even the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), had opposed the Bill on the ground that if it were passed its provisions should be made to include the Roman Catholic clergy.

SIR GABRIEL GOLDNEY said, he was in error in stating that the Bill had been introduced in Committee of the Whole House. It had, however, been brought in in a perfectly regular way, in accordance with the precedent set in Horne Tooke's case. He would only add that if the Bill were read a second time he should be prepared to refer it to a Select Committee, by whom the various suggestions made for its amendment might be considered. He should also be prepared to introduce a clause providing that any clergyman taking advantage of the Bill should resign his benefice or preferment, and sign a declaration that he would be incapacitated from holding a benefice or preferment in future.

SMALL DEBTS (LIMITATION OF ACTIONS) BILL.—[BILL 78.]

(Lord Randolph Churchill, Mr. Arthur Balfour, Sir Henry Wolff, Mr. Gorst.)

Order for Second Reading read.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, explained that its object was to diminish the evils of the long-credit system which obtained so largely in this country by limiting the period during which debts under £100 could be recovered to 12 months. Among the upper and middle classes it was a common thing for bills to run on for three or four years, and, as the result, people were tempted to buy articles which they could not really afford; minors ran up enormous bills without the knowledge of their parents or guardians, and wives and daughters in a similar way deceived their husbands and fathers; while the tradesman charged an excess of 16 or 17 per cent, or even more—there was a tailor's case not long ago before the Courts in which as much as 50 per cent was charged—to recoup him for the loss he sustained by waiting so long for his money. He heard the other day of a man owing as much as £14,000 to his fruiterer. The lower class, though affected in a lesser degree, suffered a good deal from the "tally" system. On the whole, therefore, the Bill would, no doubt, be of great public advantage. Tradesmen, as a rule, he believed, would welcome it, though he was not surprised to hear that it had been condemned by some of the West End tradesmen, who, having a wealthy clientèle, were interested in keeping up the long-credit system with its attendant surcharges.

Even to West End tradesmen, however, it would probably in the long run prove a boon by saving them from the bad debts which very frequently led them into bankruptcy. Under a ready-money system the co-operative stores, which had done so much harm to tradesmen, would have no raison d'être, and the tradesmen of the lower class would reap a direct and immediate benefit from the Bill by receiving the ready money which now went exclusively to the publican. He believed the working classes very seldom paid for necessities on the spot. The long-credit system was peculiarly English. It was, at all events, quite unknown in France and America, the principal commercial rivals of England, the ready-money system obtaining almost entirely in those countries. Financially, English society at the present time was in a very unhealthy state, and the habit which so many people had of living beyond their incomes was greatly stimulated by the long-credit system. As minor evils of this system, it would be within the knowledge of many hon. Members that young men at the Universities ran themselves head over ears into debt, and that people who were not careful with their receipts were not unfrequently made to pay a bill twice or thrice over. He was aware that there was another Bill before the House on the same subject—the Limitation of Actions Bill—which had come down from the Lords in the name of Earl Cairns. But that Bill applied to all debts, no matter of what amount, and did not limit credit to less than three years. He thought that in the case of large commercial transactions interference of this kind would produce great embarrassment. Hence he had restricted his own Bill to debts incurred on account of necessities, for which a year's credit seemed ample. It would be well, of course, to allow some interval to elapse before it passed into law, so that tradesmen might prepare for it; but a period of commercial depression like the present was, perhaps, the most favourable for securing the public acceptance of its provisions. People, he believed, would welcome any legislation which promised to enable them to bring their expenses within their diminished incomes, and which would place the country at large in a sounder financial condition. Of course, he did not propose to make the Bill compulsory; it would always be open to people to contract themselves out of it. The limit of six years now set to the recovery of debts was a purely arbitrary one; and it seemed to him that 12 months, so far as sums under £100 were concerned, would be in every way a more convenient one. The noble Lord concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, no doubt, the subject was an interesting and important one. He entirely agreed with the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock with respect to the evils of long credit; but the question was whether the Bill which he had now introduced would have the effect he had in view. Under the Bill, the tradesman would not be able to refuse credit altogether; but he would—except in cases of special debts exceeding £100—be able to give credit for 12 months, and recover the amount within that time. The consequence would be that although the credit would be limited from six years to 12 months, they would not diminish the number of times during which credit was given. They would put a weapon into the tradesman's power of being able to give the credit, and of having the excuse to enforce payment within 12 months. The Bill, therefore, would not abolish the evils of the credit system; on the contrary, its effect would be, in some measure, to aggravate them by giving a kind of legislative sanction to credit in the case of the smaller transactions of life, and by producing a crop of summonses at the end of every year. Besides, the foolish undergraduates and dressy women, to whom the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock had referred, would be tempted to raise their bills to more than £100, so as to escape the limitation of credit proposed in the Bill. There was a Bill before the House, sent down from the House of Lords, which had been introduced by Lord Cairns, and had received the approval of the Lord Chancellor, reducing the limit for special debts to six years, and for simple contract debts to three years. To that Bill, which would obviate the evils attending the present Bill, the Government were prepared to give their assent; and it would be perfectly open to the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock, when that Bill came into Committee, to move Amendments embodying his present proposals.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS saw the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Bass) in his place, and he wished to state publicly that he had considerably changed his opinion on the subject of imprisonment for debt since they both sat on the Select Committee on that subject a few years ago. Without pledging himself to any definite measure, he should like to see an alteration of the existing law, provided that some provision was inserted preventing the fraudulent contracting of debts. He thanked the noble Lord for having brought the subject under the notice of the House; but, speaking for the Friends with whom he usually acted, he preferred the Bill of Earl Cairns, which, he thought, would secure the advantages which the noble Lord desired without the inconveniences which would attend the present measure. He hoped the noble Lord would agree to the postponement of the further discussion of this measure until Earl Cairns' Bill was brought forward for consideration.

MR. MARRIOTT said, he had put an Amendment on the Paper that the Bill should be read on that day six months, and he did not feel inclined to withdraw it after what had been said from the two Front Benches. He did full justice to the intentions of the noble Lord, but objected to the principle of the Bill. The chief argument against the Bill was that it was not wanted. The shopkeepers had made no demand for the measure; on the contrary, they were opposed to it. If, as the noble Lord contended, co-operation had been caused by the high prices charged by shopkeepers, why not let co-operation bring down the prices of West End tradesmen? The noble Lord had also said that minors and wives could run up bills without the knowledge of their guardians or husbands; but, in point of fact, the law took good care that neither guardians nor husbands were charged too much. No people would be so much affected by this Bill as the working classes. He was well aware that credit had many evils, and that it might be abused; but there were times when it was of the greatest advantage, and when it prevented working men from falling into a state of absolute destitution. He did not think this measure was wanted. The period of limitation was at present six years; and even, as the law now stood, the Judges did not look with favour on any person who pleaded the Statute. In conclusion, he moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. BIGGAR seconded the Motion. There were, he said, several objections to the Bill, and the chief one was that it did not apply to either Ireland or Scotland. There ought to be a provision in it to prevent Irish landlords recovering their rack rents when a year in arrear. As it stood, it would be so much waste paper. If, too, it were framed in such a way as to prevent shopkeepers charging frightful prices for articles of household use, it might be of avail, and should have his support. Under all the circumstances the measure was unworthy of the consideration of the House, and he hoped the Motion of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott) would be accepted.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Marriott.)

MR. BROADHURST thought the House was much indebted to the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock for introducing this question. It was a mistake to suppose that the working classes did not want the Bill. At the annual meeting of the Trades' Unions Congress, which represented more than 1,000,000 of our organized working people, a demand had been made for a number of years past for a measure of this kind. Credit such as this Bill was designed to limit was the bane of the life of the working classes. It was not natural credit, but artificial and false credit, from which they suffered, and from which the Bill would relieve them. He also thought the noble Lord had rendered another service in eliciting from the Attorney General and the late Home Secretary their strong language in support of the abolition of imprisonment for debt.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he should not have risen at that late period of the debate, had it not been for the remarks of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General on the subject of credit. He had held the office of County Court Judge for many years, during which he had had ample experience of the habits and necessities of the working classes; and he was convinced that credit was a great boon to them. There were periods, when from want of employment and from sickness in their families and other causes, they were obliged to have credit for food and clothing. At these times the tradesman was their best friend; and he must add, from his own long observation, that the tradesman was kind and forbearing to the debtor. If the artizan could not obtain credit, he would frequently have to go to the workhouse. If the Bill of the noble Lord were to become law, one of two things must happen. Either the tradesman would not give credit at all, which would leave the working man in great stress; or, if the credit were limited to one year, he would prosecute his claim for the debt long before the expiration of the 12 months—the time to which the Bill limited credit for small debts. As regarded imprisonment for debt, he had had many opportunities, during the period he had set as Judge—nearly 20 years—of conferring with the artizan on that question, and he had invariably found that he did not desire the short imprisonment now lawful to be abolished. Workmen frequently had neither goods nor furniture; and if the tradesman could not put this pressure upon them to induce them to keep up their payments, made generally by instalments, he would withhold credit from them altogether.

MR. LABOUCHERE remarked, that although he differed from the noble Lord on many important questions, he had the highest opinion of his views on these small, minor matters. He was surprised to find, however, that the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), whose name was on the back of the Bill, had written a letter to a newspaper stating that his name had been placed there without his authority, and that he was, in fact, opposed to the measure. He saw opposite him three Members of the Fourth Party, or three-fourths of the Party, and he hoped some one of them would explain this discrepancy.

Sir Eardley Wilmot

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he considered that the discussion had been, on the whole, satisfactory, as opinions had been generally expressed in favour of a considerable limitation of the period during which debts should be recoverable. As far as the present Bill was concerned, he would not trouble the House to go to a division. His object was to get an expression of opinion, and that object had been attained. After what the Attorney General had said, he would ask the House to allow the Amendment to be negatived, and then to have the Order read and discharged. If that were done, he should be quite satisfied. He had not seen the letter referred to by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had drawn up the Bill, and it was with his consent that his name had been put on the back of it. If there was any explanation required, it should be given by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham.

MR. DAWSON said, he thought that such a change as was proposed by the Bill would tend to the improvement of the condition of the people.

INVASION.—QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he had any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the despatch of Lord Lyons containing an assurance that the object of the French invasion of Tunis was not the occupation or annexation of any part of the territory of the Regency; also, whether the noble Earl was able to confirm the statement which had been made in the newspapers, that the French troops were within 17 miles of the city of Tunis?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I have reason to think that the French troops are very near Tunis. I propose in the course of next week to lay Papers on the Table of your Lordships' House relating to this matter.

STOLEN GOODS BILL.—(No. 60.)
(The Lord Chancellor.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that as he desired to remove considerable misapprehension on the subject, he would say something both as to the reasons for the introduction of the measure and the provisions which it contained. It was a Bill to increase the powers now possessed by the police authorities with regard to the recovery of stolen goods, and to make other provisions calculated to discourage the receiving of such goods, and to facilitate their recovery. He thought that everybody would admit that this was desirable. It had frequently occurred that very valuable property which had been taken by robbery had never been traced, a fact which showed that the law in its present state was less efficacious in assisting in the discovery of stolen property and throwing difficulties in the way of thieves than it should be. The police authorities of the Metropolis having communicated with those in various parts of the country elicited a unanimous opinion that further legislation was necessary, and that such a Bill as that before their Lordships would give increased facilities for checking the evils complained of. He was told that at present there was no real check on the receivers of stolen goods, and no actual facility for the recovery of goods which had been stolen. For that state of things he did not throw blame on anybody, but it was necessary to find a remedy. A very respectable trade, the pawnbrokers, were, it appeared, greatly alarmed at this Bill, as if it were directed against themselves. When its provisions were carefully looked into it would be found that, though some amendments might be desirable, there was no ground for that alarm. The first set of provisions were perfectly general; the second applied to second-hand dealers; and the third to second-hand dealers and pawnbrokers. The pawnbrokers as a body were a highly respectable body of men; but, of course, in so numerous a class there must be some persons less scrupulous than others, while some who were scrupulous might unwittingly receive articles which had been stolen. He had seen it stated in a printed circular which professed to give reasons why the Bill should not be passed, that its provisions were based on the idea that pawnbrokers and receivers of stolen goods were identical. That was an error into which certainly neither he nor Her Majesty's Government had fallen. No one could be more sensible than he was of the high character of the pawnbrokers generally, and of the high standing of many of them, and nothing could be further from his intention than to throw any slur upon them. It was, however, certain that even the most upright pawnbrokers might sometimes take in pledge articles that had been dishonestly obtained, without knowing that they had been so obtained; and that all pawnbrokers should be exempted from the operation of the Bill was a suggestion which they themselves could not expect to see realized. He had had great satisfaction in receiving a deputation, who very ably represented them. That deputation had made many suggestions; and, as he was not desirous of unnecessarily harassing the trade, he proposed, if their Lordships were pleased to read the Bill a second time, to pass it through Committee pro forma, for the purpose of having it reprinted with some Amendments, founded on those suggestions, which he was willing at once to introduce, and afterwards to have it re-committed to a Select Committee, which would have power to take evidence, so that every opportunity might be given to those who were interested to show how they would be affected by it. The main alteration made in the existing law by the first part of the Bill was in respect to search for stolen goods. At present it was necessary, in order to obtain a search-warrant, that a police-constable should state on oath reasons for believing that articles stolen were in the place proposed to be searched, and should specify what those articles were; and the magistrates did not like to grant such a warrant without proof of a prima facie case, which it was often impossible to establish before search. The 3rd clause of the Bill would enable a Court of Summary Jurisdiction to grant a special warrant on the oath of an officer of the police, being an inspector, or an officer of equal or superior rank to an inspector, that he had received information, from which he believed that stolen articles—without specifying them in detail—were in a particular place. On the authority of this warrant the officer could search, and on discovery of the property and on proof that the person in possession of it had reasonable grounds for believing it to have been stolen, and had, nevertheless, made no communication to the police, penalties would be inflicted. In this respect the Bill did not go beyond the provisions of some local Acts already passed—the Glasgow Police Act, for instance. The provisions of the 4th and 5th clauses rendered it penal to deface or alter goods purchased or received by a person who might have some reason to suppose that they had been stolen. Gold and silver articles were not to be melted down within three days of the time of purchase. The 8th and 9th clauses had reference to the assistance in recovery of stolen articles to be given by pawnbrokers and second-hand dealers, and to the duty of those classes of traders to answer the inquiries of constables. By the Pawnbrokers' Act of 1872, pawnbrokers were under an obligation to keep books, with particulars of the pledges received by them. This Bill extended that obligation to second-hand dealers in precious metals. They were also empowered by the Act of 1872 to hand over to the custody of the police any person whom they suspected of offering stolen goods for sale or in pawn; but that Act contained no indemnity to them in case the person suspected should prove to be innocent. It was proposed by this Bill to give such an indemnity, and the 11th clause gave compensation to pawnbrokers and others for loss of time, and the expense they might be put to in giving information. Second-hand dealers were to be required to take out a licence, which, in the first instance, was to be obtained on the certificate of a justice; and by Clause 14 it was enacted that no second-hand dealer should purchase an article from a child under 12 years old, or from a person appearing to be intoxicated, or employ any person under the age of 16 to receive goods. Similar provisions to these were already in force as to pawnbrokers. By Clause 15 it was provided that where a pawnbroker was convicted of an offence punishable under the Pawnbrokers' Act of 1872, or this Act, and had previously been convicted of the same or any other offence under either Act, or where a second-hand dealer was convicted of an offence under this Act, and had previously been convicted of the same or any other offence, the Court before whom he was convicted might direct his licence or certificate to be endorsed with a record of the conviction, and if any conviction had been endorsed against him within five years previously might direct his licence or certificate to be forfeited. It had been represented to him that, as that clause stood, it was too severe, as the previous conviction under the Pawnbrokers' Act might be for non-compliance with regulations in some matters of detail not seriously affecting the public. He therefore proposed to amend it by providing that the former penalty must have been over £5, which would exclude penalties for any but serious and repeated offences. There were three other clauses of great importance, which he could not help thinking were those which chiefly alarmed the pawnbrokers. It was proposed in the Bill that after any conviction, either under the Pawnbrokers' Act, or this Act, or the Public Stores Act, a Court might direct the person convicted to be registered, the effect of which would be to put him under certain specified restrictions, and the commission of any further offence would entail further restrictions. It had been represented that some of those restrictions were of a kind which, if applied to pawnbrokers, would make it impossible for them to carry on their business. He thought, on consideration, that the objects of these clauses would be sufficiently attained, without extending them to pawnbrokers: he intended, therefore, to limit them so as not to include pawnbrokers. There was also a provision as to the liability of agents and servants of pawnbrokers and second-hand dealers, which he thought would be found useful. By Clause 22 an appeal to Quarter Sessions was given where a fine exceeding £5 was imposed; and Clause 23 provided that a conviction for any offence under this Act should not after five years be receivable in evidence against the person so convicted. He would only add, in conclusion, that the Bill was conceived entirely in the public interest, to facilitate the recovery of stolen property; and, looking to the fact that its provisions would be examined by a Select Committee, he trusted their Lordships would now give it a second reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that the Bill his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack had introduced might be accurately described as being of the same class as another Bill which he would bring forward shortly—namely, as an effort on behalf of a Department of the Government to increase its powers, and consequently to diminish, in a corresponding degree, the rights and privileges of the other subjects of Her Majesty. Everybody knew that Departments of the State often conceived it to be for the interest of the public that their powers should be increased; but it was their Lordships' duty to watch vigilantly proposals of this kind, and to see that they were not adopted without careful inquiry. The public necessity of this Bill rested almost entirely on the evidence of the police authorities. He had great respect for the police as a body; but a Bill to give the police so much more power required some other testimony of its necessity. This Bill had given great alarm to that very respectable body of traders, the pawnbrokers; but he was glad to find from the observations of his noble and learned Friend that the representations of that body had had some effect with him. If his noble and learned Friend had proposed to push the Bill through the House in its present form, he should have felt it his duty to say that their Lordships ought to examine the evidence in its favour with great care; but as it had passed from the hands of the Criminal Investigation Department—where he supposed it originated—to his noble and learned Friend, who was willing that it should be considered by a Select Committee, he need not detain their Lordships further than to express his opinion that the wisest course would be to refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

CHARITABLE TRUSTS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 59.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he was aware that the Bill was objected to by many excellent persons who thought that it might have a tendency to injure certain charities, and particularly to encroach upon charities supported by voluntary contributions; but, in his opinion, the alarm which had been created was not justified by the clauses of the Bill. At all events, he should be sorry to be responsible for any measure which could injure any of those excellent institutions which were petitioning against this Bill. It was never intended to affect that portion of their funds which was derived from voluntary subscriptions. The only ground for any apprehension on that score was a provision adopted from a Bill introduced by his noble and learned Friend (Earl Cairns) in 1878, that permanent investments of savings from subscriptions should, after the lapse of a certain number of years, be regarded in the same light as original endowments. He was willing to modify that clause, if necessary, by extending the time, and also to provide that it should not apply to a reserved fund set apart to meet future deficiencies of income. He disclaimed all intention of injuring these charities. It had been said that ever since the passing of the Act of 1853 the Charity Commissioners had been seeking to increase their power and extend their operations. No doubt they had always endeavoured to extend their operations within proper limits; but no one ought to blame them for that, because if such a body as the Charity Commissioners was to exist at all it must be their duty to exercise their functions in all cases in which they found charities improperly or unwisely administered, and to seek from Parliament the removal of all impediments to their efficiency. Without question, the operation of the Act of 1852 had been most beneficial. The manner in which the Charity Commissioners had discharged their duties entitled them to public confidence. The Commission had been in existence for 28 years, and out of 7,100 orders which they had made only six had been appealed from, and out of those six appeals only two had been successful. That showed the value of their labours. The present Bill proposed, in several respects, to extend their powers, but not, he thought, in any way which the experience of the past did not justify. It contained 26 clauses, of which 16 were taken from the Bill of 1878, introduced by the late Government. The most important of the proposals not taken from the Bill of 1878 were, to enable charity funds to be vested in the official trustees, without in any way interfering with their administration, by the authority of the Commissioners, though no application might be made to them for that purpose; to enable the Commissioners to settle schemes for the better administration of charities, according to existing trusts, subject to an appeal to the High Court of Justice, though the trustees of the charities might not themselves desire it, and though the income might exceed £50 a-year; to enable the provisions of Acts of Parliament—he proposed to limit this to Private Acts—to be altered by such schemes; to enable the Commissioners, when it appeared by the accounts of charities rendered to them that monies had been misapplied, to order payment of such monies, subject to an appeal to the Court; and to place the appointment of new trustees of charities by co-optation under such regulations as would secure the appointment of fit persons, and prevent unnecessary expense to the charities. He should be willing to exempt incorporated charities, such as the great hospitals, and others like them, from those provisions which seemed to have excited their alarm, and which were really intended for cases of a very different kind. The objects of the Bill had been very much misunderstood in certain quarters; and he thought that, when this misunderstanding was removed, on a fair consideration of the provisions of the Bill, it would be approved by the country.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2^d.”
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, his noble and learned Friend had given a faithful account of the Bill; but by a dexterous distribution of light and shade, in touching on its various provisions, he had withdrawn from the view of their Lordships the enormous change it made in the position of the Charity Commissioners towards the various charities of the country. Their Lordships must remember what were the original functions of the Charity Commissioners. The function of the Commissioners was, with the consent of the trustees, to deal with charities all over the country, modifying provisions which had come down from remote times and were no longer suitable to the circumstances of the localities. Absolute power was subsequently given to them to deal with charities of a lower value than £50 a-year. For that there was a great deal to be said, because it could not be expected that charities of an insignificant value would receive the same attention as larger ones at the hands of trustees. But what was proposed now was to take all the charities of the country, from the largest hospital to the smallest village foundation, and hand them over absolutely to the direction of the Charity Commissioners. When he said direction, he did not mean that their daily administration would be in the hands of the Charity Commissioners; but if this Bill passed, the Charity Commissioners would have the power of re-writing the will of the founder, and not only that, but of re-writing the Statutes made since in respect of those charities, and even the schemes which had been sanctioned by the High Court of Chancery. It came to this—that whereas before they required that the trustees and the Charity Commissioners should concur, they now set the trustees aside and gave general and absolute power to the Commissioners. He was not arguing in favour of what was called the “dead hand,” or of an absolute unalterability of the provisions of a trust, for he was well aware that as time went on the alteration of circumstances was such that trusts must frequently need modification; but he argued against the assertion that the Charity Commission were so very superior to the trustees of the great charities that it was right to dethrone the trustees and set up the Charity Commission in their place. While entirely agreeing that the Charity Commissioners had done good service, and disbelieving that they would make any misuse of powers placed in their hands, they could not, on the ground that the present members were excellent men, justify giving them such vast powers. It was impossible not to see that the effect of this great change would be to diminish everywhere the local supervision of the charitable trusts, and sweep them all under the direction of one central body—a central body which would be appointed by the Minister of the day; and the persons who enjoyed the benefits of these trusts and those who took an interest in them would see with alarm the result that the private and independent exercise of these trusts would disappear, and the vast revenues of the charities would be more and more administered in obedience to the behests of the central authority. There were clauses in this Bill for providing new schemes, which would have a very considerable effect. The trustees of all charities, however large, respectable, or important, must in future have their names sent up to the Charity Commission to be approved. Distinguished gentlemen, who devoted a great deal of their time and attention to these charities, might very well decline to have their names sent up to the Charity Commission, who, like other mortals, might cast a slur upon candidates by objecting to the names sent up. If it were not sufficient to be elected by those who were entitled to elect them, such gentlemen would, of course, retire. That would be the very general feeling; and great discouragement to the elected trustees would be the result. Again, some of the charities had a large property in land; but under this Bill in the smallest reference to a Court of Law, for getting the rent, perhaps, of a 2s. 6d. cottage, it would be necessary for the Charity Commission to institute a suit; and where injunctions were required, for instance, to prevent the value of house property being destroyed by building in front of it, it would be necessary to go to the Charity Commission to allow immediate reference to be made, lest delay should make the process useless. He thought the Bill would produce alarm and disgust among a large number of those who took pleasure in the administration of these trusts; and he believed that those who now conferred a great public benefit by much self-denying sacrifice of time and labour would withdraw from their independent administration when they found it transferred to the management of a Central Board in London. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack might have every confidence in the excellent intentions of the Charity Commissioners, and he did not wish to doubt their good intentions; but he could not help calling attention to one recommendation in their last Report, which showed the kind of spirit by which they were actuated. They recommended that a number of inspectors should be appointed, and they added that it would be a matter for consideration whether it would not be advantageous that they should be ex-officio governors of the educational endowments in the district. The result of this proposal would be that the officers of the Commission would have votes, and might be supreme in the government of those educational charities. He did not wish to say a word disrespectful to the Charity Commissioners; but with all their burning desire to do good, and their seeming confidence that they alone could do good, they still required the greatest vigilance to be exercised towards them on the part of their Lordships' House.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday the 24th instant.

MOTION FOR A PAPER.

Moved, for a print of the Irish Land Bill, 1870, as read a first time in the House of Lords, showing by difference of print or ink, or by both methods, the amendments made in the Bill as returned to the Commons, and what afterwards became of such amendments, i.e., whether agreed to or disagreed to or further amended.—(The Earl Cairns.)

EARL SPENCER said, he thought such a Return rather unusual; but it was not the intention of the Government to offer any opposition to it. But there might be some difficulty in carrying it out. He desired to know if the noble and learned Earl wished to have a fac-simile of the Bill, so as to show its complete history, or whether he only wished the Bill to be shown with the Amendments after it left the Commons and was presented to their Lordships' House, and the state in which it left on its return to the other House? He hoped the noble and learned Earl would allow the words to be added—"or otherwise."

EARL CAIRNS said, all he wanted was a print of the Bill as it was introduced in that House, and as it was afterwards when sent back to the Commons.

QUESTIONS.

SOUTH AFRICA—NATAL—SIR OWEN LANYON.

MR. RYLANDS asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Sir Owen Lanyon is still retained in the service of the Crown in South Africa; and, in that case, what are the duties which he now performs?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir Owen Lanyon is on his way to Europe on leave of absence. We believe him to be at this moment at Newcastle, in Natal, ready to reply to any questions which the Commission may think fit to address to him.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—REVIEW OF SCOTTISH VOLUNTEERS BY THE QUEEN.

MR. FRASER MACKINTOSH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether a Review of Scottish Volunteers will be held by Her Majesty at Edinburgh this year; and, if so, on what date?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to my hon. Friend, I beg to state that Her Majesty authorizes me to inform the House that she hopes to hold a Review of the Scottish Volunteers in the Queen's Park, at Edinburgh, on some day between the 20th and 31st of August.

VACCINATION ACTS—VACCINATION IN WORKHOUSES.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it be the fact that Dr. Stevens, one of the Inspectors appointed by the Department at the Board of Guardians for St. Saviour's Southwark, recently suggested that in future all children born in the workhouse should be vaccinated before they were allowed to leave, however young they might be, and, in answer to questions, was clearly of opinion that the Guardians had the power to enforce this, even without the consent of the mother upon admission. It was pointed out to him that, in the opinion of some medical men, this would be injurious to the mother, by causing much mental anxiety, and that fatal cases of this kind had been known; but he replied that it would cause the mother still greater anxiety were the child to have small pox; and, whether such a course of proceeding is justifiable by any, and what, law; and, if not, whether he will not at once express disapproval of it?

MR. DODSON: I find that Dr. Stevens did suggest that children born in the workhouse should be vaccinated before leaving; and that, subject to the opinion of the medical officer in any particular case, this should be done on the sixth day after birth. Dr. Stevens did not express any opinion of his own as to whether the Guardians could enforce this without the consent of the mother; but he did refer to an opinion of the Poor Law Board to the effect that they could. This opinion seems to have been given so far back as 1848.

MR. HOPWOOD asked whether the order was a legal one?

MR. DODSON: The hon. and learned Member asks my opinion on a point of law. My own opinion is that vaccination cannot be enforced in the circumstances if the mother objects.

CRIMINAL LAW—RE-PUBLICATION OF THE "FREIHEIT."

MR. BELLINGHAM asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is a fact that, under the auspices of the Social Democratic Club, the "Freiheit" has reappeared as an English instead of a German newspaper; whether Herr Most's famous article on the Assassination of the Tsar, for which he has been prosecuted by the Government, has been reprinted in English under the title of Regina v. Most; whether the paper states that the publication is intended as an answer to the attempt to suppress "our German contemporary;" and, whether Her Majesty's Government intend to take any steps in the matter?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I believe that there is such a paper as that alluded to by the hon. Member's Question, and that an English translation of the article referred to did appear in that paper. The article professes to appear in the form of a report of the proceedings in the Bow Street Police Court. In answer to the last Question, I have to say that I do not think it desirable to take any steps in this matter—at all events, until after the trial of Most.

CROWN AGENTS FOR THE COLONIES— MEMORANDUM OF SIR PENROSE JULYAN.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If there is in the Colonial Office a Memorandum which Sir Penrose Julyan, while one of the Crown Agents for the Colonies, addressed to Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, explaining the position of the Office; if Copies of that Memorandum were sent to the Colonies; and, if there is any objection to lay it upon the Table?

MR. GRANT DUFF: We cannot give this particular document, which is of a purely confidential character, prepared by the orders of the late Secretary of State for his own information; but, as the subject seems to excite some interest, I will presently lay on the Table Papers which will explain the duties and status of these officers more fully than can be done by answers in this House.

ACCIDENTS IN MINES—REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If there be any prospect of the Royal Commission which was appointed to inquire into the prevention of accidents in mines several years ago making a Report this year before the close of the Session; and, whether he is aware that a similar Commission was appointed some time ago in Belgium, and that the Belgian Commission reported in one year and six months from date of its appointment?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had a letter from the Secretary of the Commission, who said that before the end of the Session he would present a preliminary Report, along with a valuable body of evidence. The Secretary gave as a reason why the proceedings of the scientific inquiry had been so much prolonged that it had been necessary to repeat the experiments on the safety lamps and coal dust in various districts. With reference to the Belgian Commission, it only indicated the inquiry, and suggested the employment of a permanent Commission.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)— TEACHERS OF MODEL SCHOOLS.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If, on the compulsory retirement of the extern teachers attached to the various model schools in Ireland on the 31st of March last, the Commissioners of Education recommended teachers having a lengthened period of service (ten years and over) to the Lords of the Treasury for a gratuity or superannuation allowance, and if such gratuity or allowance has been made to the extern teachers or to any of them; and, if not, whether the Treasury would take the case of this respectable and deserving body of teachers into consideration?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Extern teachers are persons employed for five to seven hours a-week in teaching singing or drawing at model schools. At the beginning of 1881 there were 14 of them; but the services of 12 of these have been dispensed with after four months' notice had been given. Four of these had taught in the manner I have described upwards of 10 years, as stated by the hon. Member, and were recommended by the Commissioners of National Education for a grant of public money. It is impossible to grant them pensions, as this cannot be done even for regular model school teachers, who, I may remind the House, are not civil servants. It did not appear to the Treasury that the occasional character of their employment would warrant the grant of a gratuity from public funds. They received ample notice that their services would no longer be required.

ACT, 1881—ARMS LICENCES.

MR. HEALY: In the absence of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, I wish to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, If he will state whether the Government approve the refusal of arms licences in Ireland on the ground that the applicants are Land Leaguers?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW): According to the provisions of the Arms Act, the issue of licences for arms is left within the jurisdiction of the magistrates, who issue or refuse them in the exercise of their discretion in the several cases which come before them, acting on their own responsibility without interference on the part of the Government. I must, therefore, decline to lay down any general rule for their guidance. Each case must stand on its own individual merits.

MR. HEALY asked whether any instructions had been given by the Government on the subject?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW): None, so far as I know.

CLASS MISDEMEANANTS.

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Colonel Valentine Baker, when imprisoned for twelve months, was treated as a first-class misdemeanant, and whether as such he was not allowed to read any newspapers, English, Irish, Colonial, or Foreign, illustrated or otherwise, that he chose to pay for; whether English prisoners who are merely suspected of crime are while awaiting trial only allowed to provide themselves with London daily newspapers and a paper from their own locality; and, whether in case the London weekly newspapers, or the "Newcastle Chronicle," the "Graphic," or the "Illustrated London News," were sent to such prisoners by their friends, these papers would be stopped by the prison officials?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The case to which the hon. Member refers occurred before the prisons passed under the control of the Government; and, therefore, I cannot state what course was taken by the local authorities in that case. With regard to the treatment of English prisoners before trial, the question as to what newspapers shall be supplied to them lies within the discretion of the Visiting Committee. What view the Visiting Committee may take of The Newcastle Chronicle and of the other newspapers to which the hon. Member refers, I am, of course, quite unable to state.

RIGHT.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in the case of a Petition of Right by an individual seeking to restrain an interference, or threatened interference, by the War Department, or any other Department of the State, with his private property, it is the practice that a "fiat" should issue forthwith, or whether Her Majesty's Government assume to themselves the discretion of advising Her Majesty to delay or withhold the "fiat," at the risk of a differing or negation of justice to the subject, within the meaning of Magna Charta?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, there had been no departure from Magna Charta in the cases referred to. The same rule was observed that had been observed for centuries. The Government had no right arbitrarily to refuse a Petition of Right. A case for a Petition of Right first went before the Secretary of State, who referred it to the Attorney General for his advice. The question whether it should be granted or not was referred to the Attorney General; and every care was taken not to deprive an applicant of an opportunity of enforcing any right he might have to redress. There were, however, some rights which could not be enforced.

PROCLAMATION OF PRINCE ALEXANDER.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he has any information in regard to the political crisis in Bulgaria, and the rumoured intention of Prince Alexander to resign?

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true, as stated in the public prints, that at Sofia the Prince of Bulgaria has violently subverted the Constitution duly established with the sanction of the Powers under the Treaty of Berlin, and attempted to usurp complete authority; if so, whether Her Majesty's Government have yet taken any action in the matter; and, whether Her Majesty's Consul General at Sofia will hold any diplomatic intercourse with the usurper, beyond warning him of the personal responsibility which he incurs?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I greatly regret to say that the statements which have appeared in the newspapers are true. Her Majesty's Agent at Sofia has telegraphed that the Proclamation of the Prince of Bulgaria states that for two years he has endeavoured to govern in accordance with the Constitution, but that he finds that the country is in a state of disorder; that he will convoke a great National Assembly, and that he will submit to it the conditions upon which he will consent to remain. Should these conditions not be accepted, he says that he will abdicate. General Ehrenroth has been appointed Minister, and the elections to the Assembly are to take place in July.

FRANCE—NEW TREATY OF COMMERCE (NEGOTIATIONS).

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government have received any Memorials or Resolutions from Chambers of Commerce deprecating the renewal of the French Treaty of Commerce on unfavourable conditions; and, if so, whether he will lay them upon the Table of the House?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Memorials and Resolutions have been received from Chambers of Commerce, expressing various opinions with regard to the renewal of the French Treaty of Commerce, and they will be laid on the Table in due course with the rest of the Papers relating to this subject. I have to-day laid on the Table some important Correspondence with the French Ambassador and Lord Lyons respecting the promulgation of the General Tariff.

FRANCE—THE NEW FRENCH GENERAL TARIFF—THE COBDEN TREATY.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he will lay upon the Table of the House, a Return showing the difference between the duties prescribed by the so-called Cobden Treaty with France and the Conventional Tariff on the importation of British Goods which is now in force, as the result of the most favoured nation clauses of the existing Commercial Treaty?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, the Returns would have to be prepared by the Board of Trade, and if the right hon. Gentleman would move for them he might have them as unopposed. Perhaps, at the same time, he might reply to a Question on the same subject, of which Notice had been given by the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Birley). The hon. Member was aware that the General Tariff was promulgated on the 8th instant, and on the 10th instant a comparative Return was sent to the printer; but he stated that the proof would not be ready for eight or ten days.

RAILWAYS—METROPOLITAN DISTRICT RAILWAY COMPANY.

MR. FIRTH asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is the fact that the Metropolitan District Railway Company decline to issue Parliamentary tickets by more than two trains each day; whether it is not the fact that the third-class fare between certain stations on the line is double the Parliamentary rate; and, whether the action of the Railway Company is legally justifiable; and, if not, whether he is prepared to take measures to secure the interests and rights of the travelling poor?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, he was informed that the statements generally in the Question of his hon. Friend were correct. He was also informed that the fares now charged by the Company were not in excess of the maximum rates allowed by the Act of Parliament. The Regulation of Railways Act, 1844, provided that the Company should run each day one train each way for the carrying of third-class passengers, and that not more than a penny per mile should be charged. Under these circumstances, it did not seem that the Company exceeded their powers; and the Board of Trade, therefore, had no right to interfere.

LAW OF LIBEL — THE BOSTON ELECTION.

MR. HENEAGE asked Mr. Solicitor General, Whether he has come to any determination as to what steps should be taken in reference to the articles in the "Boston Independent" newspaper, imputing to the Attorney General that the prosecutions instituted by him against certain persons in connection with the late Election at Boston were dictated by motives other than a sense of public duty?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL), in reply, said, the imputations cast upon his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, in reference to the motives which actuated him in instituting certain criminal proceedings, were of a serious character, and it was a matter of great public importance. He had had, therefore, seriously to consider whether he should apply for a criminal information against those who published these articles. But while the matter was under consideration, the proprietor of the newspaper in question unreservedly withdrew all imputations against the Attorney General, and expressed his belief that the Attorney General was actuated only by a sense of public duty. The proprietor of the newspaper had also written to the Attorney General, making an ample apology. Under these circumstances, he had come to the conclusion that the matter might be allowed to drop. But the question whether the prosecutions which had been instituted should be tried in a locality where the jury would not be influenced by these newspaper articles still remained for consideration.

ARMY RE-ORGANIZATION—THE COMMITTEE AND THE NEW SCHEME.

MR. O'SHEA asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in consideration of the length of time during which many officers in the Army have been kept in uncertainty as to their fate under the re-organization scheme, he will urge on the Committees which are sitting at the War Office for the purpose of settling the details of that scheme the advisability of speedily reporting thereon?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to my hon. Friend, I have to assure him that we are making satisfactory progress with the details of the changes due to the General Plan of Re-organization which I have explained to the House. The Committee are sitting from day to day, and a great many questions have been settled by the Commander-in-Chief and myself; and I fully hope to complete and publish the decisions which have to be made in a reasonable time, before the 1st of July.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT—FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE—OUTBREAK AT DUKINFIELD.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether his attention has been called to a fresh outbreak of foot and mouth disease which occurred on the 25th ultimo at Dukinfield, and which has been traced to an Irish cow recently imported, and purchased on the 18th

April from a drover at Ashton under Lyne; and, whether the vessels which bring cattle from Ireland are thoroughly disinfected and cleansed after each voyage?

MR. MUNDELLA: The outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease which occurred at Dukinfield on the 25th ultimo may have been traced to an animal of Irish origin; but we have no doubt whatever that the disease was contracted after landing in England. There has not been a single case of the disease reported in Ireland since October, 1879. And although we are constantly receiving complaints that Irish cattle convey the disease, we are able in every instance to trace that the animals have been some time in England before developing it. Stringent regulations have been issued by the Privy Council, both in England and Ireland, respecting the cleansing and disinfection of vessels carrying animals, and whenever they are found to be infringed the owners of the vessel are prosecuted. We have one such prosecution pending now. We are constantly hearing it stated that Irish cattle bring over disease; whereas the fact really is that Irish cattle contract disease after their arrival in this country.

FRANCE AND TUNIS—THE TURKISH FLEET.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table Copies of the Despatches from Lord Lyons respecting the assurances given by the French Government that the French forces will be withdrawn from Tunis so soon as the Kroumir question is disposed of; and, whether he will also lay upon the Table Copies of the Correspondence with the Governments of Italy, Turkey, or any other power concerning the action of France in Tunis; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have received from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople any Report as to the communications made to the Porte by the French Ambassador on the subject of the departure of Turkish ironclads for Tunisian waters; and, whether he can state in detail the contents of such communications, and lay Mr. Goschen's Report upon the Table?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Papers on the subject are being prepared, and it is hoped they will be ready for presentation to Parliament in the course of the ensuing week. No Report has been received from Mr. Goschen as to what has passed between the French and Ottoman Governments with reference to the departure of Turkish ironclads for Tunisian waters beyond the mention of the fact that a Note respecting it had been presented by the Porte; but we have since received from the Porte a copy of the French Note, which, indeed, appears in a Paris journal of to-day.

MR. DILLON, M.P.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is prepared to afford any facilities for the early discussion of the Motion on the Arrest of Mr. Dillon, M.P., and the conduct of the Irish Executive?

MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot see the cogency of the hon. Member's request, seeing that he withdrew the Motion immediately before Tuesday last, when it was almost certain he could have brought it on. ["Oh, oh!"] There were no other Motions in the way which threatened to lead to any lengthened discussion of several hours' duration was raised on the Motion for adjournment. Still, I should be glad to meet the views of the hon. Member if it were in my power; but if he means to ask whether I will set aside the Land Law (Ireland) Bill to make way for it, then my answer must be in the negative.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would give a Morning Sitting for the discussion of Mr. Dillon's arrest?

MR. GLADSTONE: Nothing but a strong public necessity would induce me to ask the House for a Morning Sitting at this period of the year. The hon. Member withdrew his Motion, and therefore I think we can hardly say there is that strong sense of public necessity.

RELIGIOUS DISABILITIES—LEGISLATION.

MR. BELLINGHAM asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the general principle of absolute religious toleration in the Government of this Country, he is prepared to advocate the abolition of all remaining religious checks at present existing such as those which prevent a Lord Chancellor or Sovereign of Great Britain being a Catholic, and thus to endanger the Protestant succession as established by Law?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; the Government have no intention of advocating anything of the kind.

TREATY OF BERLIN—ARMENIA.

MR. BRYCE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true, as reported in the newspapers on May 9th, that the Turkish Government is disarming the Christian population of Armenia, while permitting the nomad Kurds to retain their arms; and, whether, if the statement is true, the British Ambassador will be instructed to point out to the Porte the danger of such a step, as putting the peaceable inhabitants of the country even more completely than they now are at the mercy of the robber tribes?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: A Report from Van, dated March 15, states that the authorities were taking certain measures in view of disaffection among the Armenians. The Armenian Council had been requested to send in a statement of all Societies existing among the Armenians, with their objects; and a Club which had been started a few months previously had been closed on account of speeches made there. No mention is made of disarming the Christian population. Her Majesty's Government will, however, ask whether there is any foundation for this Report.

PUBLIC HEALTH—SMALL-POX (METROPOLIS) HOSPITALS.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he is aware that the Smallpox Hospitals of the Metropolitan Asylums Board are full, and that persons suffering from smallpox are now lying in lodging-houses in crowded neighbourhoods, to the great danger of the other inhabitants; and, whether he will state what steps he proposes to take to provide the Asylums Board with the necessary powers to deal with the epidemic, and with sufficient authority to carry out "The Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867?"

MR. DODSON: I am sorry to say that the small-pox hospitals are full, or nearly so; but I have no information that persons suffering from small-pox are now lying in lodging-houses, although I fear such may probably be the case. I had hoped that supplementary provision would have been made by the Guardians and the Vestries and District Boards, and this, to some extent, has been done; but I regret to say that in other cases where exertions have been made to provide accommodation these exertions have been paralyzed by actual or threatened legal proceedings. At the same time, it is satisfactory to be able to state that the Metropolitan Asylum Managers are exerting themselves to the utmost to provide temporary accommodation on their property at Darenth for 300 or 400 convalescent patients, and this will afford considerable relief to the present hospitals. I may add that the Local Government Board is in communication with them respecting further immediate provision.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE COUNT-OUT ON TUESDAY.

COLONEL ALEXANDER rose to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Why the House was allowed to be Adjourned on the Motion of the Hon. Member for the city of Cork on Tuesday the 10th instant before 9 p.m., when a Resolution affecting the interests of the Police of Great Britain, for the third time during the present Session, occupied the first place on the Notice Paper? He might, in putting that Question, state that he never left the House during the whole evening, not even venturing as far as the tea-room. When, however, the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) rose to address the House on the Question of the adjournment, he went to the Bar to get some refreshment, which was absolutely necessary, and in the short interval of three minutes he found that the Solicitor General for Ireland had consented on the part of the Government to the adjournment of the House, although it was known that an important Motion was going to be brought forward. He hoped the Government would do something to protect the rights of private Members. The ballot for a place on the Order Book was rapidly becoming a complete farce.

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not know, Sir, whether I am to reply to the speech of the hon. and gallant Member; but, so far as the question is concerned, I will reply to it as well as I can. The hon. and gallant Gentleman asks why the House was allowed to be adjourned? Well, I believe the House was allowed to be adjourned because no Member chose to challenge the adjournment.

COLONEL ALEXANDER: The Solicitor General for Ireland was present, and did not challenge it on the part of the Government.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. and gallant Gentleman says the Solicitor General for Ireland consented to the adjournment on the part of the Government. I understand that statement is wholly erroneous. He had no power, and he had no right to do so; and it would be very unusual indeed for a Member of the Government to rise in the course of a discussion, knowing that there were a number of Motions by private Members on the Paper, and to state that the Government consented to an adjournment; and I know the hon. and gallant Gentleman is under an entirely erroneous impression as to what took place. I understand there were plenty of Members about the House to challenge the adjournment had a decision been taken.

COLONEL ALEXANDER: The Solicitor General for Ireland did not challenge the adjournment.

MR. GLADSTONE: It was no more the duty of the Solicitor General for Ireland to challenge the division than any other Member. I am very sorry that private Members who had Notices on the Paper did not enter into a combination with the hon. and gallant Gentleman, who seems to have done his duty very fully to prevent the calamity that took place.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that in consequence of the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, he thought it absolutely necessary to make a few remarks. He would, therefore, move the adjournment of the House in order to obtain from the Government a fuller explanation. He was perfectly certain that, whatever might be thought by the official and the ex-official Members of the House, private Members would not tolerate the manner in which they were treated on Tuesday night, and the way in which the Prime Minister had just treated his hon. and gallant Friend. His hon. and gallant Friend had obtained the first place on the Paper for his Motion on two former occasions. On both these occasions he gave way to the Government. Then a third time, by extraordinary good fortune, he obtained the first place, whereupon the Government requited him for having given way by deliberately allowing the House to be adjourned, in order to avoid discussion of a subject that was very interesting to a large number of county Members. These Members were prepared to discuss it; but the Members of the Government ostentatiously quitted the Treasury Bench, leaving the unfortunate Solicitor General for Ireland without instructions. Who would deny that that was not a deliberately planned thing? The Government were, no doubt, very much put out at not getting the Morning Sitting, and were determined to show private Members that they were not gaining anything by this refusal. It was perfectly evident that the Government did not care one single rush for private Members so long as they got their measures through. He moved that the House do now adjourn.

MR. SPEAKER: Does any hon. Member second the Motion?

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I will, Sir.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that the noble Lord had made charges against the Government which were characterized by his well-known courtesy and accuracy. The noble Lord said the Government desired to prevent the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member being discussed. All he could say was that he himself and his hon. Friend the Under Secretary (Mr. Courtney) were there all the evening, and extremely anxious to discuss that Motion. About half-past 8 o'clock, when an Irish Member made a Motion to count out the House, he came in himself to aid in making a House. He did not observe present that large number of county Members who had been described as deeply interested in the Motion. He did not observe a single Member—he was not even conscious of the presence of the noble Lord, who was so keen to protect the rights of private Members. With the assistance of several Members on the Treasury Bench he was happy to say that a quorum was found, and the House was not then counted out. He afterwards went out, like the hon. and gallant Member, for refreshment, and was sitting in the dining-room, when he heard, to his surprise, the announcement that the Speaker was going home. He inquired of a Member of the Irish Party what had happened, and was informed very good humouredly that that Party had achieved a glorious victory over the Government. That was the simple history of that diabolical conspiracy, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, against the rights of private Members, for which the noble Lord so severely but unjustly blamed them. All he could say was that the Members of the Government were extremely anxious to have the discussion brought on. There was nothing so disagreeable as to have on one's hands a speech which it was impossible to deliver. That had been his case on the three occasions in question; and he should be extremely glad were he able to think that this speech was a thing of the past, instead of a thing of the future. If private Members valued their rights so much, the Government were entitled to expect some assistance from them; and it seemed very unjust for private Members, who had gone away themselves, to come down and accuse the Government of not upholding those rights.

MR. GORST thought it rather curious that, if the Government were so perfectly innocent, they should have now put up the Home Secretary, who was not in the House at the time of the "count out," instead of the Solicitor General for Ireland, who was. What they complained of was that the hon. and learned Gentleman, representing the Government, assented to the adjournment. The minority had no chance against the will of the Government in favour of an adjournment of the House; but what hon. Members wanted to know was whether the Solicitor General for Ireland did consent to the adjournment; if so, by whose authority and for what purpose?

Sir William Harcourt

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, that as his name had been so prominently brought forward, he might be allowed a few words of explanation, especially as the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), who was not himself present to see what occurred, did not choose to take the explanation that had been accurately given in his absence by the Prime Minister. He had never assented to the adjournment. [Mr. Gorst: I never said anything of the kind.] He was speaking within the hearing and recollection of the House. He (the Solicitor General for Ireland) was, in this instance, very much in the position of the "needy knife-grinder," who exclaimed, "Story! God bless you, I have none to tell, Sir." He would state precisely what happened. He was also taking refreshment, and did not know of anything which exhausted nature so much as listening to some of the debates in that House. Hearing the bell ring, he immediately followed the Home Secretary and assisted in making a quorum, and he did not leave the House from that time except for a moment. He was not a party to this conspiracy which was alleged to have existed, and which was, in fact, as mythical as the knowledge of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham. He listened respectfully, as he always endeavoured to listen, to the arguments addressed to the House by the Members sitting below the Gangway. He was in the House when the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) concluded his speech, and he heard the remarks next made by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton). When the Question was put for the adjournment, he said "No;" but he did not challenge a division, for he took it for granted that the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Alexander) would have been present, or would have had somebody present to represent him, to challenge a vote. Finding, however, that no one—not even the hon. and learned Member for Bridport, whom he looked upon as the champion of the cause—challenged the division, he did not think it his duty to do so. The House was then adjourned, and he left, as the other Members did.

Question put, and negatived.

SOUTH AFRICA — THE TRANSVAAL — THE BRITISH GARRISONS.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether under the terms of the armistice concluded in March last there exists any power of supplying the garrisons in the Transvaal with material of war; and, if not, what steps it is proposed to take to remedy so serious an omission in view of the critical state of pending negotiations, and the probability of a native uprising?

MR. GLADSTONE: In answer to the Question of the noble Lord, I have to say that Sir Evelyn Wood entered into an engagement not to send ammunition into the Transvaal; but the information in his possession, and transmitted to us, is that the garrisons in the Transvaal are amply supplied with ammunition.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. GLADSTONE: As to the course of Business to-night, the Government will offer no opposition to the adjournment of the debate on the Land Law (Ireland) Bill at such an hour as the House may think fit; but, at the same time, I should desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the debate on the Bill has been unusually prolonged. ["No!"] Well, it has gone on an unusual length of time. I do not say it is without precedent; but if it is further adjourned Monday next will be the seventh night of its extension, and I wish to express a hope that the debate will, at any rate, close on Monday.

ALKALI, &c. WORKS REGULATION BILL —CEMENT WORKS.

MR. W. FOWLER asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, having regard to the fact that no means of a practicable character exist for consuming carbonic acid gas, he is prepared to insert words into Clause 8 of the Alkali, &c. Works Regulation Bill, exempting cement works from the operation of the Bill, so far as relates to the emission of this gas; and, whether he is aware that the passing of the Bill in its present form will have the effect of closing cement works; and, if he is prepared, before the Bill is proceeded with, to explain in detail in the Bill what are the other gases emitted by cement works, and what minimum emission of each of those gases the Government is prepared to allow, having regard to the fact that it is impossible wholly to prevent these emissions?

MR. DODSON: I am not prepared to exempt cement works from the Bill; for although no practical means may at present exist for consuming carbonic acid gas, I have no doubt that, in many instances, arrangements are capable of being made for regulating its emission so as to render it much less objectionable than at present. As the Bill simply requires the adoption of practicable and available precautions it is impossible to suppose that it will have the effect of closing cement works, although I have no doubt it will lead to a considerable abatement of the present nuisance—a nuisance which, in the words of the Royal Commission, is substantial, and which may be mitigated, if not avoided altogether. I cannot undertake to explain in detail in the Bill what are the other gases emitted by cement works, and what is the minimum emission the Government is prepared to allow, as this would be to place these works on a different footing from many others named in the Bill, and, as in the case of the alkali works, a test could only be prescribed after the experience acquired by careful inspection.

PARLIAMENTARY OATHS (MR. BRAD- LAUGH).

MR. NEWDEGATE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When it is the intention of Her Majesty's Ministers to invite the House to proceed with the Adjourned Debate on the Parliamentary Oaths? He explained that he put the Question because he found that the adjourned debate stood on the Order Book the last Order for Tuesday next.

MR. GLADSTONE: I think the Question of the hon. Member is perfectly justified by the facts; but, at the same time, I hope he will agree with me that, as the subject is likely to be raised to-morrow by the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle, I should postpone my answer until that Motion has been disposed of.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I rise to put two Questions to you, Sir. I wish to ask you whether it is competent for a Member of this House to move that a Resolution, formally submitted to the judgment of the House, put from the Chair, adopted by a majority of the Members present and voting, and recorded on the Journals of the House repeatedly acted upon by the House, and still unrescinded, is an illegal Motion? And, secondly, Sir, I wish to ask you whether, if such a Motion is in Order, it can be regarded as a Motion entitled to precedence, bearing in mind that more than a fortnight has elapsed since the passing of the Resolution referred to; and, if so, upon what ground precedence would be given to it?

MR. LABOUCHERE: I wish further to ask you, Sir, whether it is not competent for any hon. Member, on any day he may think fit, to raise a question of Privilege as to the arbitrary and illegal exclusion of an hon. Member duly returned by a constituency to this House before he has taken the necessary steps to bring himself within the full jurisdiction of the House?

MR. SPEAKER: Exception has been taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon to the word "illegal," used in the proposed Resolution of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle. I must admit that there is some force in that objection. I have understood the expression "illegal" to be intended by the hon. Baronet as indicating the rescinding of the Resolution of the 26th April, 1881; but I am bound to say that I think the hon. Baronet would have been better advised if he had proposed, according to the usual Parliamentary practice, to move that the Resolution of the House be rescinded. In regard to the other point raised by the right hon. Gentleman, I have to say that if the hon. Baronet had thought fit yesterday to make a Motion on the letter of Mr. Bradlaugh having been read, and if that Motion had been in regular form, he would have been entitled to proceed with that Motion as a question of Privilege; and I cannot think that he has forfeited his claim to have that question considered as a matter of Privilege by reason of his having, for the convenience of the House, postponed it until a future day. I think the answer I have given already sufficiently answers the Question of the hon. Member for Northampton.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish, Sir, to ask if I am right in inferring from your answer to my second Question that you regard the Motion as a question of Privilege, and not as a question of Order?

MR. SPEAKER: I think it is a question of Privilege, and not a question of Order.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I do not think hon. Members have at all gathered whether the terms of the Motion are in Order, because I would submit, before you give a final decision on the subject, when several hon. Members were suspended, one after the other, before the Easter Recess, it was proposed by some other hon. Members to call in question the action of the House as illegal and arbitrary; and you ruled that any calling in question the action of the House would be a breach of Order, which you would be obliged to meet with very severe penalties. Therefore, I would like to ask you to decide clearly whether the hon. Baronet's Motion is in Order; and, if so, how it differs from the Motion which the Irish Members were anxious to make with respect to the suspension of a large number of that body, and which Motion was pronounced to be a gross breach of Order?

MR. SPEAKER: I have already stated that the expression "illegal" in the Resolution of the hon. Baronet is open to exception, and I should advise the hon. Baronet that that expression should be withdrawn; and also upon this ground, that it bears the construction—it may bear it, although I have not put that construction upon it myself—that an expression of that kind is scarcely respectful to the House, and reflects upon a Resolution which this House has already passed.

MR. WARTON: I wish to ask, Sir, whether, in the event of the hon. Baronet refusing to withdraw the word "illegal," you would refuse to allow the Motion to be put?

MR. SPEAKER: I am not prepared to answer that Question until I see the Resolution in its revised form.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: May I ask whether, to-morrow, it will be competent for any hon. Member, on the Motion of the hon. Baronet, to move that it is not a question of Privilege?

MR. DILLWYN: I would further ask whether it will not be competent for any hon. Member to move that it is a question of Privilege with respect to the illegal exclusion of a Member from this House?

MR. SPEAKER: I must wait to see what Motion may be made before I give an opinion upon any Motion which may be taken in this matter. I am not prepared to say now, upon a hypothetical question, what course it would be right to take.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I should like to ask whether, when the hon. Member for Carlisle brings forward his Motion to-morrow, before he rises or after he submits his Motion, it will be competent for any Member to move as a question of Order, or as an Amendment to that Motion, that it is not a question of Privilege?

MR. NEWDEGATE: May I further ask you, Sir, whether, if the subject of the Notice given by the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle is brought forward in this House as a question of Privilege, it will not, and ought not, to take precedence of all other Business?

MR. SPEAKER: I have already stated that I consider that the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, when put in the proper form, would be brought forward certainly as a question of Privilege; and if an Amendment were moved to the effect that it was not a question of Privilege, that would be, in effect, to challenge the ruling of the Chair.

MR. GORST: I beg to give Notice that, when the hon. Baronet makes the Motion with which the House is not yet acquainted, if that Motion should raise substantially the same question as that on which the House has already expressed its judgment, I shall ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it is competent for an hon. Member to bring forward, in the same Session, the same question on which it has already expressed an opinion?

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL— URGENCY.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS asked the First Lord of the Treasury a Question of which he had given him private Notice, Whether, considering that the Government demanded and obtained Urgency for the passage of two Bills which they declared to be necessary for the maintenance of order in Ireland, and that it was equally necessary that the Land Law (Ireland) Bill should be passed for the permanent pacification of that country, he would propose that the discussion of that Bill should be carried on de die in diem until such time as it should be passed?

MR. MACARTNEY desired to know, before the right hon. Gentleman answered the Question which had just been put, whether, if those who wished to address the House should not have had an opportunity of doing so before the end of Monday's debate, the right hon. Gentleman would use his large majority to bring the debate to a conclusion that evening?

MR. PARNELL wished to know, whether it would be necessary to obtain urgency in order to carry on the debate de die in diem. Two-thirds of the House, or a majority of two to one, were required to obtain urgency. Could not the course which had been followed earlier that Session on the Coercion Bills be followed, and the days of private Members be given up to the discussion till the Bill was passed?

MR. GLADSTONE: With regard to the closing of the debate on Monday, it would be extremely disagreeable to my taste and desire that any Gentleman should be precluded from addressing the House in the present stage of the Bill; but it seems to me that we work under very severe conditions as to time, and under very severe conditions indeed as to public interests of a character affecting the whole of the people of Ireland; and, although I may be very sorry to press anything of a restrictive nature against Members, yet I even hope that some hon. Gentlemen will, if possible, submit to a sacrifice rather than allow us to go on, in the face of the very great necessity for this Bill, for the sake of all parties in Ireland, with a debate extending over many weeks on a stage of the Bill in which, after all, we can make no progress towards a final adjustment of its terms. Hon. Members will, I trust, continue the debate longer than usual to-night; but I am afraid I cannot recede from what I have presumed to say with regard to the closing of the debate on Monday. As to the Question put to me, I am not sure that I follow with perfect clearness the Question of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell); but I do not know that it is very important at the present moment, because I may say, in answer to him and in answer to the hon. Member behind me (Mr. Thorold Rogers), it would be more convenient to wait until the House has disposed of the second reading before considering any course which it may be the duty of the Government to propose to expedite the progress of the Bill. All I can say is that there is no recession from the pledge I have given that no Government Business will be allowed to interfere with it, except Business of absolute necessity. A matter of absolute necessity would be the disposal of the Taxing Bill in Committee; but I have no reason to believe that that will occupy any great length of time. That is the only exception. I will be able to answer the questions after the Bill has been read a second time and the Bill has arrived at the stage of Committee.

COLONEL MAKINS asked whether, in view of what the right hon. Gentleman had just said, it was likely that the House would rise for Whitsuntide; and, if so, when it would rise, and for what length of time?

MR. GLADSTONE thought it was rather soon to ask that Question. He would consider the matter.

MR. MACFARLANE asked if it would not facilitate the division on the second reading of the Bill on Monday if a Sitting took place on Saturday?

MR. ONSLOW asked the Prime Minister whether, if the Motion of the hon. Member for Carlisle were altered to omit the word "illegal," the Motion, as amended, would receive the support of Her Majesty's Government?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he should follow the wise example set by the Chair, and wait until the words of the Motion were before him before giving a reply. With regard to a Saturday Sitting, he looked upon the adoption of such a course as a very strong measure, and he would rather postpone raising that question for the present. He did not think it was a satisfactory method to follow, as it was very difficult to secure the attendance of Members.

MR. J. COWEN said, that, as far as he could learn, there were certainly 40 Members anxious to address the House on the Bill. There had been two Agricultural Commissions sitting on this Irish question, and several of the Members of those Commissions were Members of this House. They had visited Ireland, and engaged in an elaborate inquiry, and as yet not one of those hon. Members had had an opportunity of speaking. The Question he rose to put was, Whether it would not be possible for the Speaker and the Representatives of the different Parties in the House to make an informal ballot of the names of the hon. Members who wished to address the House? If such an arrangement could be come to, it would greatly contribute to the convenience of Members; and he wished to know if it would be in accordance with the Rules of the House?

MR. SPEAKER: I am always most anxious to promote the convenience of Members of this House; but the hon. Member is imposing a task upon me which is beyond my powers.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Forster, Mr. Bright, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

[SIXTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [25th April], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, while willing to consider any just measure, founded upon sound principles, that will benefit tenants of land in Ireland, is of opinion that the leading provisions of the Land Law (Ireland) Bill are in the main economically unsound, unjust, and impolitic,"—(Lord Elcho.)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. SHAW said, that he should make his remarks as brief as possible, for the Bill had now been debated for seven nights; and, so far as he could judge, very little impression had been made upon its principle. Many of the speeches that had been made were directed rather to the details of the Bill, and might have been more appropriately made in Committee. When the Bill was introduced, he took the liberty of expressing a general approval of it, and as soon as he possibly could he most carefully read it; in fact, he read it twice, and he was almost ashamed to tell the House that he understood it—at least, he thought he did. But when he heard the speech of his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson), he must say that his mind was quite upset on the question. However, he got right again in about five minutes, and when he came to look at the Bill again he did not feel at all disturbed. To his mind that Bill, dealing with a great and most complicated subject, affecting interests so varied and so important, was a great Bill, and he believed as easily understood as any Bill that had ever been introduced on a great subject. He should occupy the House as briefly as possible in suggesting a few points in which he thought the Bill might be improved. Of course, in proposing Amendments, he recognized the necessity of keeping strictly to the principle of the Bill, for it would be most unreasonable to seek to alter its entire structure or change its principle. Therefore, any suggestion he might make to amend or improve the Bill would, he believed, be entirely within its principle, and would tend to the simplification and better working of the measure. The first part of the Bill contained the rules for regulating the relationship between the landlord and tenant; and as the most important question in that part of the Bill was the question of rent, he should first of all refer to that. His right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gibson) was very much puzzled indeed, as he said, as to this part; but he (Mr. Shaw) happened one evening to go to Belfast, and he met there a conference of hard-headed Northerners, and underwent two hours' cross-examination on the clauses of the Bill; and he thought he was able to understand those clauses dealing with a fair rent. He thought also that the tenant farmers of the North understood them too, though he did not say they entirely approved of them. He did not forget that it was one of the most intricate and difficult parts of the subject; and, in his mind, it would be quite impossible to arrive at any scientific way of adjusting rent between landlord and tenant in Ireland. In that opinion Judge Longfield, one of the most experienced men in Ireland on this question, and other eminent men concurred. Indeed, the former expressed his opinion, before the Commission, that there was no use in laying down rules for the regulation of rent between landlord and tenant; and the only way in which it could be properly done was by getting competent valuers, and letting them go to the holdings and exercise their own common sense on the subject. The clause dealing with fair rents was one which he thought was easily enough understood. It was explained very fully by his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law). The valuator should go to the holding and take the holding as it stood. Of course, if they adopted an economic mode of fixing rent, they must consider several circumstances; they must consider the average of the prices, say, for seven years, of the crops principally grown on the holding; they must consider the position and circumstances of the holding; and they must consider the cost of production. But there was another element which it was absolutely necessary to consider in fixing a fair rent, and that was the natural quality of the soil. He maintained that it would absolutely be impossible for a valuator going to 99 holdings out of 100 to see what was the natural quality of the soil. It would, therefore, be very hard for any valuator to fix the rent by the economic method, or to arrive at a fair rent by any other mode than that suggested. He must have regard to the holding, and give expression to the interest that the tenant had in Ulster and in other parts of Ireland under the Act of 1870. He would ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin, would he suggest that a valuator going on his land was not to regard the interest of the tenant? Was he not bound, as the very first thing, and as a matter of duty, to find out what was the interest the tenant had in his holding? Of course, he was not to calculate that in such a way as to absorb the interest of the landlord, or the rent of the landlord. No valuator that ever went, or was ever likely to go on land in Ireland, would adopt such a course. In fact, if such a course as that were adopted, in many parts of Ireland it would make the rent nothing at all. Any Judge that went on a holding, and commenced to fix rent in that way, the very next thing that ought to be done with that man would be to bring him into a lunatic asylum. He believed that that was not the meaning of the clause, or the intention of the Government in introducing the clause, that the tenant's interest should be calculated in that way; but he believed it would be possible to amend the wording of the clause so as to remove all possibility of misunderstanding. The Government had only one object in dealing with the subject, and that was to do right between class and class, and to do right between man and man. It would not be very good policy for any Government or any Party in that House to act on the principle of what they considered would benefit their own class. If they did that, they would find that it would injure their own class in the long run. It was very curious that before he left Cork for Belfast he had a long conference on this clause with a landlord, and that landlord said if this clause were allowed to stand in the Bill, it would destroy the rent of the landlord; and when he went to Belfast, some of the tenants said if this clause were allowed to stand in the Bill it would destroy their tenant right; but the tenants of the North of Ireland especially did not like to have any re-valuation. They had made the entire improvement on their farms, and they did not like the idea of a valuator going among them every 15 years and putting on a value on the improvements they had made themselves. Therefore, the tenants in the North of Ireland did not wish that the clause should stand as it was, but that there should be some words introduced expressing the meaning of the Bill that their improvements, their work done, or their outlay made on the land, should in no way be valued against them in fixing the rent. He believed such words could be introduced into the Bill. There was another question which had cropped up, and which he was quite sure had frightened the landlords very much, and that was as to whether this clause would tend to reduction of rent generally in Ireland. He must say that on a great many well-managed estates in Ireland there was nothing like exorbitant rents; but he believed that unreasonable rises of rent were not confined to the smaller estates.

Mr. Shaw

Owners that were largely encumbered, whether purchasers in the Landed Estates Court or hereditary owners, had a wonderful tendency to increase their rents, especially in the West and South of Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen might say that rent was but a small matter. It was anything but a small matter. He knew himself, and they had statements before the Commission of this kind—that within 30 years the rent on an estate had been raised from £500 a-year to £1,500 a-year. The meaning of that was that every man on that estate, who, at the beginning, 30 years ago, paid £2, was paying £6 now. Was not that a serious thing for a poor man? Did it not mean the deprivation of the comforts, and, in some cases, of the very necessities of life? Not long ago he had met a man whose position was slightly worse than it was 30 years ago. The man accounted for the fact by saying that on his father's death his rent was increased by £10 a-year. This addition had prevented him from ever knowing prosperity. There was another question he wished to refer to in passing, and that was the question of arrears. It was a very important question, and one that had not been dealt with in the Bill. He confessed, at once, that it was a most difficult question, and most important not only for the tenants, but also for the landlords; because they could not hide from themselves that, in the greater part of Ireland, arrears to a very large extent existed. The people in those districts were poor, and the question arose, What was to be done with them? In the question of arrears, he eliminated altogether the numerous cases where people having the means had not paid their rents, but, taking advantage of the times, had kept their money in their pockets. He would also eliminate those who were not so very knowing, but who were influenced by a sentiment—and, he believed, a very natural sentiment—of loyalty to their class, and who said to themselves that they were fighting a very great fight—that they could not break the rules, but that they must work loyally with their class; and, at the end, he would take away the cases of poor people that no amount of indulgence or help that that House could give them could possibly enable them to keep their holdings, so burdened were they with debts and arrears; but there were within that circle a very large number of cases—such cases came before the Commission and himself privately—in the South and West of Ireland. There, during bad years, poor people who had been compelled gradually to lessen their stock and to retrench their expenses of living, who had endeavoured to pay their way honestly, and who now were as honestly in debt to their landlords as any people were, he believed those were the class that ought to be relieved out of their difficulty. Many of them had been paying exorbitant rents, and would have struggled to pay their rents, but for the bad times. He thought the House ought to pass a Resolution asking the Government to instruct the County Court Judges in every case of that kind to postpone ejectments until such a time as the Court about to be constituted under the Bill could look into the case and afford some relief. He did not know whether the House would give such instructions to the County Court Judges; but he knew that it was not an unusual thing for County Court Judges to postpone payment of ordinary debts. It might be said that it was against the laws of political economy to allow County Court Judges, or any Court, to interfere with debt due; but they did it every day. If an exorbitant rate of interest was charged by a private money lender, or butter merchant, nothing was more common than for a County Court Judge to say it was quite unreasonable, and that he would not allow it. There was, therefore, no difficulty in their way in saying that they would not allow payment of the rent that was exorbitant or excessive. There were one or two other points in the Bill which he thought might be judiciously amended. He knew that there had not been, in the entire evidence taken by the Commission, any difference of opinion almost as to the incompetency of a County Court Judge, sitting alone, to decide on questions of this kind. A suggestion had been made which he thought might well be followed. It was that two Assistant Commissioners should be associated with the County Court Judges as members of the Court when questions under the Act were to be decided. He was not at all in favour of abolishing the Court as a Court of Record. He would retain as Chairman the Judge who was accustomed to hear and weigh evidence; but he thought it would be essential that questions of valuation should not be left entirely to a lawyer, who had no experience whatever of it. There was another question that was of very great importance, which was the question of leaseholders. It had been recommended by the Commission that leases made since 1870, where there was any proof of their having been forced on the tenant, should be re-opened, and with that suggestion he entirely concurred. There was this difference, of course, that if they opened leases in one direction they must open them in the other—if they allowed the tenant to come in and say he claimed the leases should be opened, he did not see how they could deny the landlord the same right. So the question arose, whether on the whole it would not be worse, rather than better, for the tenant if they opened leases. He thought himself there were very few cases where leases containing unreasonable conditions had been forced on tenants since 1870; but he knew there were quite enough to make it worthy the consideration of the House. If they looked into it, they would find it would not be any such great disruption of the question of leases as most people imagined. Therefore, when there was this grievance pressing on the people, he thought it would not be reasonable to ask that it should have some consideration. There was another question of leases. So far as he understood the proposals contained in the Bill, the present leaseholders would not, as a matter of course, become present tenants at the expiration of their leases. He supposed that to mean that the lease must run out, and that the tenant at the end of the lease must become a "future tenant." Now, he thought that, in many cases, that would not be unreasonable—that was, on large estates, where the tenants held the position very much of English and Scotch tenants, where they had taken their holdings with all the machinery of the farm ready for them—where they had taken their holdings, being mostly intelligent men, on conditions which they understood and agreed to. In their cases he did not see why at the end of their term they should not surrender their holdings, as was usual in England, if the landlord required them to do so. A lease in Ireland meant almost nothing, in 99 cases out of 100, but a fixing of the rent for 31 years; and no landlord expected, and no tenant ever thought, that the condition in the lease providing that at the end of the lease the holding should be given up to the landlord would ever be enforced. The holding was as much a perpetual holding as any other with a perpetual right of renewal. Now, his impression was that it would be a very unjust thing to tenants on many estates, where they had taken leases as a matter of form, that they should be excluded from the very best part of this Bill, because they were accommodating enough to take a lease, probably because that lease put £4 or £5 in the pocket of an attorney or agent, or because they took a lease to oblige the landlord; while their neighbours on the same estate, who had refused to take leases—and he had known cases of this kind—were to come in for all the advantages of the Bill. He thought this was a point which was well worthy the attention of the Government. There were many other points of a minor character in the sub-clauses of the Bill; but he did not think it would be at all his part to occupy the time of the House with them now. They would come up more naturally in Committee, when the Bill had reached that stage. Now, as to the purchase clauses. They were by many looked on as the most important part of the Bill; and he looked on them himself as clauses of exceeding importance, and all the more necessary to be simple and easily worked. The Commissioners that were about to be appointed would have immense power—that was, if they were allowed really to work the Bill. They all knew that Bills and Acts of Parliament were very good things, provided they were carried out properly; and he believed this Act, if the Commissioners had not discretion and power to carry out its provisions, would be just as ineffectual as many other Acts of Parliament were in Ireland. Some landlords, he believed, thought they ought to have the option of selling their estates, in case they did not come under the tenancy clauses of the Bill. He did not at all agree with that. He believed that would put the landlords in a position they had no right to be in, and put the Government in a position they ought not to consent to be placed in. What would be the effect of it? They would have at once a rush of all the landlords of Ireland on the Government. The Government would be bound to buy, independently of whether the tenants were willing to buy or not, and this would be the consequence—that over, perhaps, half of Ireland they would have for the next 30, 40, or 50 years the Government of the country in the position of landlord to all the tenants in the country. He did not think they could have a more objectionable state of things. Now, in the Bill as it stood there was no difficulty, he thought, for any landlord who wished to effect a sale, either to communicate with the tenant, or to negotiate through the Commissioners; for he presumed that the landlords would be authorized through the Commissioners or the sub-Commissioners to negotiate with the tenants or leaseholders. It would be essential that the Commissioners and Assistant Commissioners should not be men merely sitting in Dublin, but men knowing the country, and men in whom the landlords as well as the tenants would have some confidence. Then, when the landlord was willing to sell, they would be able to negotiate between the parties as to the terms of sale. In that way he believed that every landlord in Ireland who wished to sell, if he was willing to sell at a fair price, would be able to sell under the Bill; but there was this defect that he thought the Government would do well to look at—the Commissioners would have power to purchase and power to sell, but no power to reclaim any land on the estate. They might, perhaps, in Munster or Connaught buy a large estate, where half or two-thirds of the tenants were anxious to purchase, and there might be left in their hands an immense tract of land, with tenants scattered over it, on which an outlay of £2,000 or £3,000 would be of immense benefit to the tenants; in fact, by making some outlay upon it, they brought it into a position when tenants would be most anxious to get it; whereas, if they left it where it was, in a half reclaimed state, they would find it very hard indeed to get tenants to purchase. He thought they ought to give the Commissioners some powers in estates of this kind to lay out money on improvements and reclamation. In fact, the clauses referring to reclamation were to his mind very defective. He did not believe in Companies being empowered to carry out these reclamations. They were very backward in Ireland in the way of commercial enterprize. They were very slow in forming Companies; and if this was carried out at all, they would have Companies consisting of English or Scotch jobbers going over to work out some scheme of their own. At all events, there would be a great deal of public money put into it in one way or another, and very little ever got out of it. He believed the reclamation of waste lands should be intrusted to the Commissioners as part of their duty, and he believed it would be best carried out if it was carried out by the tenants themselves. He had seen in the South, as well as in the North of Ireland, wonderful reclamations which had been carried out by tenants in the last 20 or 30 years—tracts of land—mountain tracts, bogs that you could not walk over—and on that land crops of wheat and barley were growing now, and this was all done by the tenants themselves. There would be nothing easier. He did not for a moment deny that there might be estates in Ireland where it might be possible to effect large reclamations, and upon which this measure might be made useful for laying down a large scheme of reclamations; but he believed the best reclamation would be that which the tenant would be able to effect, where he was working on a spot he could make his own by the employment of his own energy. The clauses affecting emigration he did not mean to enlarge upon in detail; but he did wish to say he did not see the slightest harm in their passing in the Bill, if the proposal was to be confined to grants which should enable whole families, and not individual members of them, to emigrate and recommence life in a new world. He happened to be a member of a Committee for the relief of the distress in Ireland, and they set apart a small sum to be distributed by the members of the Committee in helping emigration. They did not, as a rule, give a single 6d. of that money to boys or girls. They did, he believed, in every case, and at least in every one that went through his hands, give help to families to go out altogether to America. He had known some most interesting cases, where a poor woman and her children were left at home with relations, while the father went—and sometimes the father and mother went—across the Atlantic and left their children in Ireland; their hearts in Ireland and their energies and work in America. He believed no Government, even if they meant it—which he did not think any Government ever would—could use these clauses in a way which would be detrimental to the people of Ireland. ["Oh, oh!"] There was the parish priest, whom the man would consult, as a matter of course, before he took a single step in the matter. There was public opinion, there was the Press, and there was that House; and did any man in his senses think that any extensive system of emigration could be carried on in Ireland against the interests of the people? ["Yes!" and "Oh, oh!"] At all events, he was not afraid to say what he thought on the subject; and he spoke, not from knowledge gathered on platforms, but from the knowledge he had gathered from the people themselves in Castlebar, Roscommon, Sligo, and all around the coast. He not only met hundreds of the people in the rooms when the Committee examined them, but he spent every hour he could spare in going among the people. He did not wish them to emigrate. He believed every man in Ireland, and a great many more, would have work very soon in Ireland. He did not believe the clauses would be very much used, no matter how they were framed; but he believed this—there would be many people in Ireland who would be glad to go out of the country, if they saw their way to go in comfort, and settle down in America. How was it the Scotchman was everywhere? The Scotchman did not bind himself down on a rock or a bog; he never was happy except when he got away from his own country. Was he the less a Scotchman? Not a bit of it. There were fine examples of emigration from Ireland and of very successful emigration, at that present time, sitting in that House. But he believed there was plenty of land in Ireland, and that migrating the people, reclaiming the land, and, as he hoped most sincerely, stirring up industries in the country, would give employment, and ample employment, to every one in the country. But if families wished to emigrate, he would much rather that, instead of spending their own few pounds on taking money from the poor rates, they should take from the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the manner proposed in this Bill. As far as the money clauses of the Bill were concerned, he hoped the Government would either propose or accept Amendments which would have the effect of making them more elastic. The other night the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) suggested a plan, which, of course, he (Mr. Shaw) could not object to, as he happened to suggest it himself when acting as Royal Commissioner, and that was that the money necessary for assisting the tenant to buy his holding should be raised as a separate fund upon debentures, the Church Surplus, or some other fund, being taken as a basis, as security. He, however, very much preferred the plan proposed by the Bill; because it must be borne in mind they could not get any separate Commissioners to raise money by debenture, and get it in the open market within 1 per cent of the rate at which the Government could borrow. However good the security they offered might be, the Commissioners could not borrow a sufficient amount in Ireland to enable them to carry into operation with effect the great work proposed to be effected by the purchasing clauses of the Bill. As a matter of fact, they had barely enough money to carry on the business of the country, and if the business grew very much without the wealth increasing proportionately, they would have to get money elsewhere. They would have to come to England for money, and no man in his senses would suppose that any Dublin Commissioners could borrow money in the London market on such security as they could offer, except at a high rate of interest—that was to say, under 4 per cent, unless they could give Government security. But it was in the interest of the poor man that the money should be got as cheaply as possible; and, therefore, Government security should be given for the money borrowed. Of course, if they adopted the plan in the Bill, and if they found this fund at any time to be increasing to an enormous extent, so as to derange the monetary affairs of the country, it would always be open to any Chancellor of the Exchequer to introduce a Bill to separate this fund from the general funds of the nation. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster had laid great stress upon the danger to which future Governments would be exposed if the fund were to be mixed up with those of the nation. The right hon. Gentleman said that a Chancellor of the Exchequer would find himself in a position of great difficulty if the Irish Members were to come to him and say—"If you do not do so and so, we will not support you; but if you do so and so, we will support you." The right hon. Gentleman seemed to speak from experience. He (Mr. Shaw) knew this—that when the right hon. Gentleman was at the Treasury, he happened to go there concerning some reduction in interest; and he never met a man who could say "No" with better grace than the right hon. Gentleman. Some people said "No," and it was very much like a slap in the face; but the right hon. Gentleman bowed them out, and wished he could relieve them, but he really could not. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean to say there were any Irish Members who, when he was at the Treasury, offered any corrupt compromise with him? [Mr. W. H. SMITH: No, no!] No; nothing of the kind ever occurred. The right hon. Gentleman would be the first man to spurn such overtures; and if such audacious proposals were made to him he would lose much of his sweetness of manner and return a very stern answer to the suggestion. The thing was perfectly absurd. He (Mr. Shaw) believed that payments required for any source made under the Bill would be made by the poor people of Ireland as honestly as payments were made now when they owed money. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes, as honestly; for he could say, from his own experience, there were no people in the world honester than the Irish peasantry. There were no people as thrifty and cheerful; and when they owed a debt as anxious to discharge it. Of course, at the present time they were agitated, and they were told that certain things were not debts; but let them really believe they owed a debt, and they were most anxious to meet it. He did not see they could improve the Bill very much in that way. They would be glad to have all the money the Exchequer could give them, and he thought it was very likely it would be used with great advantage. Now, how was the Bill met? They had two Amendments on the Paper. The first one—the Amendment by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho)—was one of a stock character. It could be put down against any Bill ever brought in; for it declared that the House was anxious to do the best it could, but the Bill was economically unsound, unjust, and impolitic. There was nothing original, nothing that touched the Bill specially, nothing but what induced him to believe that, subject to a slight verbal alteration, the Amendment could not as well have been set down against the Bankruptcy Bill as against this Bill. Then, again, last week he read an essay by a Nobleman who had made some sacrifices for his opinions, and who therefore deserved respect. The Nobleman in question, the Duke of Argyll, had said that the bright spots and comfortable homesteads of Ireland had been brought about by the landlords of the country. He (Mr. Shaw) could well understand anyone, after reading the essay, saying—“Oh, the gentleman who wrote these words knows nothing of the subject. He knows it theoretically, and he frames a scheme of Land Reform for Ireland, just as an engineer in Westminster would plan a railway from Cork to Bantry, without even taking a measurement, or going over the land.” No one who could write these sentences could really know anything about the matter. Who had made the bright spots of which the Duke of Argyll wrote? Who had turned the country from North to South and East to West into a smiling garden in many places? Not the owner, but the tenant farmer. He (Mr. Shaw) would take them to the estates of Lord Downshire, the Duke of Abercorn, Lord Portsmouth, and the Duke of Devonshire, and ask them whether the outlay of the tenants on those estates did not amount to the value of the landlord's interest in the land. In fact, if they came to some bright spot, to some comfortable homestead, they found that in all cases, except those of landlords whom they could count on their finger ends, the spot had been made bright, and the homestead had been made comfortable, by the tenant farmers of Ireland. The landlords themselves had the opinion at one time that they had done an immense deal in Ireland. At all events, a Committee of landlords came before the Commission in Dublin, and they gave them a tabulated statement of the outlay made during the last 40 years. That outlay amounted to something like £3,500,000—a great deal of money; but he (Mr. Shaw) asked them—“How much of that was borrowed from the Government, and for which the tenants paid interest?” One of the gentlemen very honestly said—“The greater part.” It struck him (Mr. Shaw) that the money was laid out, not by the landlords, but by the tenants; but, after all, what did it amount to? Something like £90,000 a-year for 40 years. Even if it were all landlords' money, it would be a mere nothing compared with the sums that English and Scotch landlords spend in connection with their land. An attempt had been made to frighten the House by saying the Bill laid down principles which must come into use in England and Scotland. The moment the land in England and Scotland was reduced to the same condition as that of Ireland, the sound and just provisions of the Bill would come to the people of England and Scotland as they had come—late enough—to Ireland; but what had been the position of English and Scotch landlords? He believed that if they took the rental of England, it would be found that about half of that rental represented the outlay of the landlord on the land itself, for which he got a very small return indeed in interest. They had heard a good deal of the unfortunate Irish tenant, because of his land hunger; but there was never such land hunger in Ireland as was shown by the rich men in England. The moment men in England got hold of money, hunger for land took possession of them as a disease, and even for 1 or 2 per cent they put their money in land. The Irish tenant put his money in land; but in his case he got a foundation in the earth; he got a home for himself and family. The English capitalist had invested in land for the sake of influence. If the land in Ireland was managed on the same system as that of England by the landlords, instead of this miserable sum of £3,500,000, £200,000,000 would have been expended on the land. If the landlords were to come to the tenants of Ireland and ask to settle their claims, he believed the interest of the tenants—he did not mean any sentimental interest—would be estimated at £120,000,000. He did not speak without having looked into this matter carefully, and the amount would not be less than £120,000,000. It was said—“You are in this Bill transferring the property of one man to another.” They were not doing anything of the kind. For generations and centuries they had allowed the property to grow up in Ireland in the manner it had, and they had allowed the poor man to put his energy and money into the property; and the result of that labour they had allowed the landlord by the law, but against all principle of equity, to appropriate to his own benefit. The consequence was that they must now lay down principles which must define the relation of the labourer to the land, for the Bill would merely give the tenant what was justly his own. He did not know how the Bill would be dealt with in Committee; but he supposed and hoped it would be improved, and that, after undergoing that process, it would proceed to “another place,” to be amended there. But there were adverse Amendments; and it might also come down, after having passed through that “other place,” in a form which this House could not accept at the end of the Session. He wished to ask the Irish Members who sat in that House what they thought they would do if the Bill, through the action of Party, or through a desire to show off a new Leadership, or to damage the present Government, or to annoy the Prime Minister, or for any other reason, forgetting the interests of the country, the Bill was so damaged that the Irish Members could not accept it? Why should not the Conservatives try and make that a good and workable Bill? The landlords were involved in the question, and there was no desire to hurt or injure them; and when the Bill went into Committee he was sure the majority of the Irish Members would be found voting on the side of justice. Some landlords thought they would be hurt by the Bill. He did not think they would be. He had spoken on the subject of the Bill to a landlord who was at that moment sitting under the Gallery. That landlord had a large estate which he derived from his ancestors. He asked him whether he thought the Bill would hurt him? The answer was “No.” He asked whether he was going to leave the country when the Bill passed. In reply, the landlord said he was not going to do so, but would make improvements on his property. The Whig landlords of Ireland had more fear of the Bill than the Conservative landlords; and he (Mr. Shaw) had heard more absurd nonsense talked about the Bill by Whig landlords than by Conservatives. The Whigs knew just enough of political economy to confuse them; whilst the Conservatives would not be troubled with such nonsense as political economy; and he thought they would give less opposition to the Bill than those whom he termed the Whig landlords would. Many of the Conservative landlords lived in Ireland, and were good landlords; and when the present agitation subsided they would be as good friends to the tenants as they were before. But if the Bill did not come down to the House of Commons from the House of Lords, the country would have to respond to the challenge made to them by the hereditary sense-carriers. Would the House of Commons be content to let another 12 months pass without settling the question? Would the result of all this be that the Irish Members would be sent back to Ireland to take the matter into their own hands to settle. [“Hear, hear!”] He did not mean in the sense that some people had been settling it. He thought that if the landlords and tenants came together and compared notes, in nine-tenths of Ireland there would be no question at all. But they had not come together. The system of land agency in Ireland was altogether different from that in England, for the agents of property in Ireland were men who got so much per cent on the rent paid by the tenants; and, as a result of that system, landlords of Ireland knew very little about their tenants, or the state of their farm or house. With regard to the question of a collision between the two Houses of Parliament on this subject, his opinion was that it would not be for the interest of the country, or of any reform of this kind, that it should be wrung from any particular class by force. But it would be a miserable thing to have it go forth to the community that that class had no considerations but of selfishness and self-interest. If any powerful class placed its foundation on such motives so surely was the doom of that class near. He hoped the matter would not be looked at from a Party point of view, but from the point of view of a great and serious desire to settle this urgent Irish question. They needed a great deal in Ireland; they needed industries for the people; and they needed that their powers and energies should not be dissipated in anything but the work of the country, and in the progress of the country. He believed it would not be the fault of any Irish Members of that House if that was not the result; and he hoped Party consideration would be laid on one side, and that this reform would not be shelved through Parties striking blows not for justice, but for self-interest.

MR. MACNAGHTEN: Sir, I envy and admire the hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw). I envy his power of understanding this Bill. I admire the complacency with which he regards it. I am not so fortunate—I cannot say I understand the Bill, and I do not altogether like it; and then I do not like the Amendments at all. I am unable to vote either for the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), or for the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners). The two Amendments differ in tone and in language. In substance and in reality they are much the same. They both mean, if they mean anything, that the Bill is to be shelved or put by for a time. They will be so understood in Ireland throughout the length and breadth of the land. Sir, the question cannot be dealt with in that manner. It will be nothing less than a national calamity if the House does not put aside all Party feeling and do its best to settle the question as speedily as possible. I cannot, therefore, support the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire, or any Amendment that may tend, or even have the appearance of tending, to delay the settlement of the question. But, I am sorry to say, that does not entirely relieve me from difficulty—for I am not much enamoured of the Bill, regarding it in relation to its probable effect on that part of Ireland with which I am connected. Into the wider and more general question as to its effect on the rest of Ireland and the United Kingdom I do not propose to enter. There are many Members in the House, and on both sides of the House, who are much more competent to deal with that question than I am. If the House will bear with me for a short time, I shall have quite enough to do in dealing with Ulster, speaking mainly from my own personal knowledge of the county of Antrim and the relations which exist there between landlord and tenant. Sir, as I said, I am disappointed with this Bill. I had hoped for a measure plain, simple, and intelligible. I find a Bill complex and complicated, intricate and perplexing beyond all precedent—beyond the precedent of 1870—confused and involved in its arrangement, ambiguous and obscure in its language, silent where it ought to have spoken, speaking not infrequently where silence would have been better and wiser—in some places unfair to the tenant, in others unjust to the landlord. I had hoped for a tribunal that would have been cheap, expeditious, and accessible to all, and one that would have commanded universal respect. I find a tribunal which, in my humble judgment, will be utterly unable to grapple with the multifarious business and diverse interests that will come under its ken—that will have to appoint deputies and substitutes, and journeymen liable to be dismissed at a moment's notice, with no fixity of tenure for themselves, and no security in their occupation; and, above all, a tribunal that leaves untouched, as the Court of First Instance, a Court which has been discredited throughout Ireland, a Court that has not conciliated the good-will or secured the esteem of the people at large, or of any class or party in Ireland. But, for all that, I am constrained to vote for the second reading of the Bill. I know that there is a pressing necessity, and I believe that this Bill, with all its imperfections, is an honest attempt to deal with that necessity. And, above all, I rely on the assurance of the Prime Minister that the Government will welcome any Amendment, from whatever quarter, that may tend to improve the Bill. I quite admit that, in dealing with this question, the Government have had great difficulties to encounter. At the same time, it must be remembered that they have some advantages. They have this advantage, that everybody agrees that things cannot remain as they are. They have also the advantage that there is a very general feeling, at least in the North of Ireland, that any measure, to be satisfactory and acceptable, must be based on the lines of what is popularly called the "three F's." Sir, I am not afraid of the "three F's." Fair rents everybody desires, or professes to desire. Free sale, sale absolutely free and unrestricted, has long been the rule in Antrim. And as to fixity of tenure, we all desire that the utmost security should be enjoyed by the occupying tenants that may be consistent with leaving the landlords some interest in their property and some possibility and power of improving it, and that does not reduce them to the level of mere rent-chargers—an idle burden of the ground. Now, Sir, with the permission of the House, I will state shortly what are the demands of the tenants in my part of Ireland—demands which are admitted by the landlords to be fair and reasonable, and which have been conceded without legislation, but which both parties desire to have secured by legislation. A year ago, the demands of the tenants were these. First, they demanded the abolition of all office rules. The House knows what office rules are. They are rules of particular estates limiting the price of the tenant right to so much per acre or so many years' purchase. The next demand was that tenant right at the end of a lease should be recognized. That is dealt with by this Bill rather clumsily, and not very generously; but yet, I think, it is sufficiently secured. In the third place, as the House knows, at present it rests with the tenant to prove the existence of the Ulster Custom. In some cases, that has led to inconvenience and great expense, and it was thought that the burden of proof should be shifted, and that, considering the almost universality of the custom, it should rest with the landlord, if he chose to dispute its existence, to prove that it did not exist, but that prima facie it should be taken to exist throughout Ulster. A year ago, those were, I believe, all the demands which the tenants in my part of Ireland made. A year ago, there was great diversity of opinion as to the expediency of appointing a tribunal to regulate rents. As a rule, the landlords were more in favour of the proposal than the tenants. The tenants, living, for the most part, on fairly-rented estates, seemed to think that if such a tribunal were appointed, some part of the odium or unpopularity which results from an increase of rents would be shifted from the shoulders of the landlord to the shoulders of the Government or the Government tribunal. However, in the last year, opinions have advanced. Some few cases of hardship, mostly of old date, have been published and re-published, and repeated until a general feeling of uneasiness has been created. Now, everybody is agreed that there ought to be a tribunal to regulate rents, and everybody is agreed that that tribunal ought not to be the Civil Bill Court. I will now consider how far the present Bill satisfies the demands of the Ulster tenants. I am not going into minute details. I will only deal with the questions of free sale, fair rents, and the constitution of the proposed tribunal, and the question whether the landlord ought to be allowed to set the tribunal in motion. The question as to the burden of proof is not touched by the Bill. In pursuing this inquiry I am at some disadvantage, for I certainly am not in the position of my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Shaw), who thoroughly understands the Bill. I frankly confess that there is much in the Bill, especially in relation to the position of the Ulster tenant, which I do not understand at all. We have done our best, on this side of the House, to understand the Bill. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) sought to engage Gentlemen who sit on the Treasury Bench in a sort of competitive examination. Three or four of those Gentlemen have responded. But I put it to the House whether any one of them has passed even a qualifying examination? The Prime Minister told us the other evening that the purely legal aspects of the measure would be explained by one of his Law Officers. By a fortunate accident or divine chance, he did not name the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) as the person who would give that explanation. Still, when my right hon. and learned Friend rose to explain the Bill, I thought some of the fog and mystery would be cleared away, and that we would learn something; but to my dismay and consternation, and, I think, also to the dismay and consternation of the House, the right hon. and learned Gentleman said he must decline to let himself be entrapped into any discussion in regard to the particular expressions in the Bill. Why, the particular expressions in the Bill are the very things that we want to have explained. How can we understand the Bill unless we understand the particular expressions in it? I am thoroughly puzzled by the Bill. I would gladly resort to any expedient—I would go to any quarter to obtain information. The House knows that in one of those weekly publications which elevate the tone of society, a series of prize puzzles appears, which, I think, are called "Hard Cases." A gentleman, usually designated by the first letter in the alphabet, is supposed to be in a position of some difficulty, as either landlord or tenant may be under this Bill, and he is supposed to have three or four courses open to him, as the landlord and the tenant under this Bill may have. And the question proposed for solution is, what should "A" do? Now, I should like to see the knotty points of the Bill broken up into hard cases. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) would afford any facilities to the Government. If the competition were limited to Members of this House it would be very interesting; and the Government, who seem to be at a great loss for answers, might adopt the answers that pleased the generality of the House. Of course, they would bar obvious answers. No one would be allowed to tell the landlord that he must grin and bear it, or to tell the tenant that he must consult his attorney. That would occur to everybody; and I am bound to say that in some of the positions which I have considered there appears to be no other answer. But, seriously, can nothing be done to make the Bill simple? Perhaps the hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw), who thoroughly understands the Bill, will assist the Government. I am pleading for the Ulster tenants. Before the Act of 1870 their position was perfectly clear. The rules which governed Ulster tenant right were well known to everybody. Then came the Act of 1870, which confused everything. That is not my opinion only. I will appeal to a work which ought to have some authority with hon. Gentlemen opposite. I refer to the book of Professor Richey, of which the Prime Minister has spoken in terms highly complimentary, though somewhat singularly qualified. The right hon. Gentleman said the book was "a very able, although a concise work." [Laughter.] As if conspicuous ability must needs be exuberant and diffuse. What Professor Richey said was—

"The few and simple rules in which the Ulster Custom may be expressed contrast favourably with the bewildering sections, subsections, provisions, and exceptions in which the Act of the 33rd and 34th of Vic. chap. 46, is hopelessly entangled."

Why, you might have thought Professor Richey was speaking of the present Bill. What will he say when he comes to discuss this measure as bearing on the position of the Ulster tenant? There are many reasons why the Bill should be plain and simple. In the first place, it is to be the charter of the tenants. Surely they ought to understand their own charter. Again, it must be borne in mind that it will be utterly impossible to obtain a binding legal decision on any clause of the Bill. If, a year hence, my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland should be asked his opinion on any clause, no doubt he will give it with great courage; but if he retains the caution which compelled him to decline to be entrapped, he will add that it must be borne in mind that, after all, the Act means what the Land Commission, or any one or two of its members may happen to think for the time being. That Commission is to have extraordinary power—power as absolute as that of the ruler of Olympus, and a power which Jupiter himself did not claim—that of reversing its own decrees over and over again. I find from the Bill that the Land Commissioners may review, rescind, or vary any order or decision previously made by them, or any of them. The proceedings before them are not to be restrained by injunction or removed by certiorari. No doubt, the Commissioners may refer any matter to the Land Judges of the Chancery Division of the High Court; but they are not bound to adopt or follow the decision of the Chancery Judges. I do not, in the least degree, blame the draftsman of this Bill. That gentleman, no doubt, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland has said, may be a very skilful draftsman; but he must have lost all interest in his work long before he came to the 23rd edition. How could he possibly divine that that edition would have more vitality than those which went before it, and which fell still-born or perished among the discussions—I do not say the dissensions—of the Cabinet? Passing on to the consideration of free sale, and premising that I do not altogether understand that part of the Bill, I wish to ask how far the Bill carries out those points which it seems to me it ought to have secured in the interest of the Ulster tenant? Why, the Bill does not provide for the abolition of office rules at all. It merely provides an alternative mode of sale, which will not, I think, be largely adopted in Ulster; and then it goes on to say that a tenant shall not sell partly under the custom and partly under the Act. That, I suppose, means that the vendor must make his election, and sell either under the custom or under the Act. This provision seems designed to put an Ulster tenant in a position very like that of the ignoble animal between two bundles of hay. Now, it seems to me that a very nice question arises on this part of the Bill. The House knows that the right of sale is of the very essence of the Ulster Custom. I wish to be informed whether, if an Ulster tenant renounces the Ulster Custom, and sells under the Act, the holding will afterwards be subject to the custom or not? That is a most important question, and it ought to be put beyond all possibility of doubt. Then I come to the question of fair rents. That has been very much discussed; but I must say, for one, that I do not understand the provisions of the Bill in reference to fair rents. I was in hopes that the hon. Member for Cork County, who understands the Bill so thoroughly, would have thrown some light upon the subject; but the hon. Gentleman has left us entirely in the dark. There are certain rules laid down for guidance which different Members of the Government who have spoken have interpreted in very different ways. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, for instance, stated that all the clause meant was the competition rent minus the interest arising from the tenant's improvements.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW): I said—"The yearly value of the tenant's interest in his holding." It was correctly reported in The Daily News, but not in the other papers.

MR. MACNAGHTEN: I was quoting from The Times. I accept the right hon. and learned Gentleman's correction; but even now I do not understand him. Being of opinion that the rules are unnecessary, as well as confusing, and that it would be better simply to use the term "fair rent," I hope to see the clause re-constructed. There really is no difficulty about the valuation of rents in Ulster. The principle is well understood. It is only where the principle has been departed from that trouble has arisen. The thing is perfectly simple and clear, and will continue to be so, unless this Bill intervenes and throws everything into confusion. What Professor Richey says about the valuation of rents in Ulster is in perfect accord with my own personal knowledge. He says—

"The essential point in the Ulster tenant right was, undoubtedly, the mode in which the fair rent to be paid by the tenant was ascertained. It was fixed, not by open competition, but by valuation. The re-valuation for the purpose of fixing the rent at the determination of the lease, or at any time during a tenancy from year to year, was always made by a professional valuator, or, at least, one in whom both parties had confidence, who valued the farm, having reference to the fair value of the ground, exclusive of buildings and tenants' improvements."

According to my experience, that is always done. The valuator first excludes the buildings, then he gives credit for the tenant's improvements; and, lastly, he puts a fair value on the land. Why cannot the Bill deal with the question in this simple manner, instead of making the addition wrong, and the subtraction wrong, and then hoping to arrive at a right result? No one, I venture to think, has condemned the rules for guidance under the Bill so forcibly as the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, when he said—"We do not mean the words to be absolute guides." Now, I put it to the House whether there is anything so treacherous and misleading as guides which are not to be absolute guides? I earnestly trust, therefore, that the Government will re-consider the wording of this clause, so as to bring it into harmony with what has long been and is the custom of Ulster. I believe that nothing more is required than to direct the Court to determine what is a fair rent under all the circumstances of the case. If the Court cannot find out what a fair rent is in any particular case, the Judges certainly will not be worth their salary; they will only be fit for the lunatic asylum with which the hon. Member for Cork County threatened Judges who fail to understand this Bill. I should like to ask the hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Biddell), who, I believe, has had great experience on the subject, whether he or any other competent person directed to value land for the purpose of fixing the rent was ever tied down by such absurd rules as are contained in the Bill? As for laying down rules of this sort for the guidance of the Court, I venture to say it will prove absolute nonsense. In connection with this subject there is also the important question whether the landlord shall be able to put the Court in motion. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland observed that a landlord does not want the power, because he can raise the rent of his own motion. I do not think that that in itself is a satisfactory answer to the objection, for if the tribunal is to be a fair one as between both parties, it is difficult to see why it should not be open to the landlord as well as to the tenant. To the objection that the tenants would rush to the Courts, the right hon. Gentleman replied that they would have a wise reluctance to do so, because they would fear lest their rents should be raised. In my opinion, the tenants are far too shrewd to entertain any such fear as that. A tenant may go before the Court in order to feel his way, and, being dominus litis, he may withdraw his application at the last moment. There would be something in the answer of the right hon. Gentleman if the Bill provided that a tenant applying to the Court should not withdraw his application without the landlord's consent, and that the landlord might carry on the proceedings. But there is no provision of that sort in the Bill. The hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers), whose knowledge is as infinite as his contempt for our acquirements, and who always speaks with that mild wisdom which is peculiarly grateful to our feelings, said the other night that, according to his experience, lawyers knew very little of law or history either. And then the hon. Member proceeded to show his appreciation of both, of the uses of history and the principles of law, by citing as evidence against Irish landlords of the present day a passage written by Dean Swift 150 years ago. I think the House will hardly accept that as evidence. But possibly someone casting about to find a parallel for the probable position of Irish landlords after the passing of this Bill may turn to one of the more popular and trustworthy writings of Dean Swift. Some may think that on the morrow after this Bill passes Irish landlords will be in the situation of Lemuel Gulliver, who, awaking on the green slopes of Lilliput, found himself fast bound with chains and cords, so that he could turn neither right nor left; and while he lay in that plight, smaller men came with bows and arrows and shot at him, withdrawing and returning to the charge "from time to time," as the Bill has it, till at last he had to submit to be carried, bag and baggage, to the Metropolis from the country. That may, perhaps, be thought an apt parallel; but, as I do not wish it to hold good, I will venture to suggest one or two Amendments. The position of a landlord in reference to the Court is not satisfactory; but there are reasons which, perhaps, make it inexpedient to permit a landlord to initiate litigation. If that power were conceded, and the new tribunal proves expensive, as it probably will, some landlords might put pressure on their tenants by threatening an application to the Court. My proposal, by which, I believe, equal justice will be done to both parties, is that a landlord should be allowed, in a fair and reasonable manner, to go to the Court, and say—"Here is my rent roll; here is a list of my tenantry. There are the rents, and there is a schedule of their holdings. I do not want to raise my rents; but I want you to look at the roll, and if on inquiry you come to the conclusion that the rents are fair and reasonable and not in excess of what is right and proper, give me a certificate to that effect, and I will undertake not to raise my rents for a certain number of years." If, on the other hand, the Court thought the rents excessive, the landlord might re-adjust them, or, if he declined to act on the suggestion of the Court, the case would fall to be dealt with under the

[Sixth Night.]

Act in the ordinary way. Of course, I would give the Court power to make suggestions, and the landlord power to adopt them; but I would not give the Court power to treat the case as contentious business. By permitting applications of that kind on the part of the landlord, the Bill would, to some extent, anticipate and prevent the operations of agitators, and would encourage arrangements fair to both sides. Again, the provision I have suggested would be of great value to a landlord wishing to sell. The certificate of the Court would make it clear to the purchaser that in buying the estate he was not also buying indefinitely numerous lawsuits. There is a prejudice in this country against buying a lawsuit; but who would buy the germs of 150 lawsuits? There is another point to which I wish to allude. I have long thought that it would be a great advantage if there was a law passed that, after a sale, the purchaser should not be allowed to raise the rent for a certain number of years. Rents are frequently raised by a new purchaser. The purchaser who is wise in his generation knows that if he raises the rent 30 per cent when he buys and the next year reduces the rent 10 per cent, he will probably get a great deal more credit than a fair landlord who declines to make any reduction. I cannot see that there would be the slightest injustice to anybody in passing a law to the effect that after a sale the rents should not be raised for a certain number of years. As things are, the changes made by a new owner are often scandalously unjust to the tenants and unfairly profitable to the landlord. Before the Richmond Commission, one of the witnesses, who was a man of large experience and of high reputation, told this story of himself. He bought a property in the Encumbered Estates Court for £12,000. The rents amounted to £530, or about 4½ per cent—not a bad return for his money as things went. The tenants he described as being situated all higgledy-piggledy. He did nothing for them, and almost immediately he raised the rent from £530 to £790. One of the Commissioners, the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), was curious enough to ask the reason why he raised the rent. He said, in the first place, he wanted interest for his outlay. By his outlay, he meant his purchase money; secondly, he said the bad times were over, he thought. Those two reasons may, perhaps, commend themselves to the judgment of some hon. Members. Then he gave a third reason—and I am afraid hon. Members on both sides of the House will think this an Irish reason. He said that he did not consider the tenants were entitled to much consideration, as they had only been there a short time. Again, the hon. Member for Galway was curious. He asked—"How long?" The answer was, "Between 30 and 40 years." One would have thought a gentleman who had raised his rents in the belief that the bad times were over would have kept the property in his own hands that he might make a remission if the bad times returned. But no. He determined to turn the estate into money. The man who was the most desirable purchaser from his point of view was a man of ill-omened name, so much disliked and feared that the tenants went in a body to petition that he would not "sell them" to this particular man. The words are printed in italics in the Report, so he knew the full import of their prayer. And he sold them; and the new purchaser, intending, I suppose, to walk in the footsteps of his predecessor, immediately issued notices to the tenants; then came an outrage or two, and then, I believe, a murder. This is one of the cases that brings Irish landlordism into disrepute, and Irish landlords into disgrace; and I dare say hon. Members think justly. I do not. That man was not an Irishman—he was an Englishman, one of yourselves—and when he had sold the property he returned to this country with the fruits of his enterprize. I will not mention his name, as I believe he is a thoroughly respectable man—[Laughter.—according to English notions. According to my notion as an Irishman, it was absolutely shocking, and I think the law ought to step in and prevent such a thing being done. I appeal to the Prime Minister to give his favourable consideration to the point I have urged. There is another matter I wish to mention. Before the Act of 1870 no Probate or Legacy Duty was payable in respect of tenant right—now it is subject to both. This is thought a great hardship. It is strange that almost the only practical result of the Act of 1870 is to tax tenants in respect of their tenant right. I am sure that is not what the right hon. Gentleman intended, and I trust he will be able and willing to remove this grievance. Then comes the question of the constitution of the Land Court, which is really the pivot upon which the Bill hangs. What is wanted is a Court that should possess the characteristics once attributed by a great poet to a great Chancellor—though those qualities have not invariably distinguished the holders of the Great Seal—a Court which should be

As for this tribunal, when it is wanted in Antrim, it will be found in the wilds of Connemara, or lost in the Bog of Allen, or wandering over the Purple Mountains of Kerry. We want a tribunal that we can readily have access to. I believe that if we had two Commissioners for each Province that would be found to be quite sufficient, and you would be able to do away with the Court of First Instance altogether. I believe that two men—a first rate judicial officer and a practical man associated with him—would be able to deal with the whole Province; and I think two a much better number than three. The Commissioners could make Reports to Parliament, and Parliament would then know how things were going on. As it is, the tribunal proposed is anything but satisfactory, and it is not unlikely to wreck the Bill. I am extremely obliged to the House for the patience with which it has listened to me. I have now done with criticisms and suggestions, and I have only to ask the House to look forward for a few months when the Bill will have passed into law. What will it accomplish? What will be its effect? Who will dare to predict? Sir, the result of Liberal legislation for Ireland for the last 40 years should make the boldest prophet hesitate before venturing upon another prophecy. The Act of 1848—the Encumbered Estates Act—was to have inaugurated a new era of commercial prosperity for Ireland, on the strictest economical principles. And now people will tell you—and to my thinking they are not far wrong—that that Act was one of the greatest curses ever inflicted on Ireland. Certain I am that no Act ever produced, ever invited so many cases of oppression, cruelty, and wrong. Anything that savours of feudalism stinks in the nostrils of hon. Members opposite. The Act of 1860 abolished all feudal tenures, and now it is a byword and a reproach with the occupants of those Benches. Then came the Act of 1870, which was to be a panacea for all the woes of Ireland; and that Act is the very greatest of all modern legislative failures. All parties admit its failure, though they attribute it to different causes. The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) thinks the insertion of certain words in “another place,” was the “little rift within the lute” which spoilt the music. Another reason he gave was the very curious one, that the Act had not been properly accepted by the people of Ireland. That the Prime Minister himself confesses the Act of 1870 to be a failure is proved by the introduction of the present Bill. Yet we all remember the songs of triumph which heralded the Act of 1870. Who that heard those songs, who that worshipped at its cradle, ever expected to see it pushed from its place by a lustier heir with so little family resemblance in its features? Sir, these things should teach us moderation. They should teach us, if I may repeat words I shall not lightly forget, to be a little more modest and a little less arrogant. I do not believe that anyone will welcome this measure with the same confidence, the same arrogance of prediction that greeted the advent of its predecessors. We can do little more than hope and trust that it may be more fortunate than its predecessors were. Something more we may do. We can resolve that during its passage through this House no clause, no line, shall be the subject of Party controversy. And when it has passed it may be that the great Parties in the State may cease to make Ireland their battlefield. If they would only do that, if they would only cease to bid against each other for the support of this or that political faction in Ireland, I should not despair of my country. I have seen many agitations in Ireland in turn discredited, and many agitators whose names were, for awhile, on everyone’s lips, as the saviours of their country, pass away forgotten and unheeded; and all the time Ireland has increased in material prosperity, though there have been periods of gloom and depression.

[Sixth Night.]

And now, at this, the darkest hour that, perhaps, I ever remember, I will still venture to hope that the gathering gloom may herald approaching day; and I will still dare to trust in the abilities, and the virtues, and, for all that has passed, I will add, the good sense of my countrymen.

MR. LITTON said, he was pleased to see the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Macnaghten), the Conservative Representative of a Northern county, come forward and speak to the House in the tone which he had done. It was the first time, he believed, that a Conservative Member had come forward as the advocate of the Ulster Custom and the tenant farmer of Ireland. He thought that fact in itself might be taken to be a good omen; and he trusted that all hon. Members, whether English, Irish, or Scotch, would consider this measure free from Party views or a desire for mere Party triumph. The Bill was just and reasonable, and necessary for the welfare of the country. Its object was to do justice to that class of tenants who needed protection, and were placed in a position where they could not protect themselves. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir John Holker) had stated he did not address his observations to this side of the House, as Members were not open to conviction, and that the matter was a foregone conclusion. He (Mr. Litton), on the contrary, ventured to hope hon. Members were open to conviction, and with that hope he addressed the House. The Bill was complicated, no doubt; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson) did not do justice either to the Bill or himself when he spoke of it as being "confusing and confused;" and it was unbecoming of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir John Holker) to say that it was "designedly obscure." In saying that, the hon. and learned Gentleman had not done justice to himself. He (Mr. Litton) supported the Bill because he recognized that it embodied in a practical form the principle of the "three F's"—fixity of tenure, fair rent, and free sale—and if he did not recognize in it these principles he should feel called upon to oppose the second reading; but, finding that it did carry out these principles, he accepted the Bill as it stood as an honest effort on the part of the Prime Minister to settle that difficult question, and he heartily trusted that the right hon. Gentleman might have the satisfaction of seeing it pass into law before many months had elapsed. The tenants of Ireland had a right in justice and fair play to ask for the "three F's." He believed they ought not to be satisfied with less, and they had no right to ask for more. The idea of expropriating the landlords he, for one, looked upon as unreasonable and unjust; and he repudiated it just as strongly as he repudiated the idea of the right of the landlord to expropriate his tenant. The remarkable progress the opinion had made among all classes could only be accounted for by its being just and necessary. The claim of the tenant farmers of Ireland was shortly this. They contend that they and their forefathers had dwelt on the land; that the improvements which had been made on it had been effected by their labour and capital; and they said, in justice and equity, they should be allowed to continue undisturbed so long as they paid a fair rent. But the landlord might, if he pleased, exercise the power which the law gave him, and increase the rent under pain of eviction. When he called this "contract," it was not surprising that such a proceeding should be designated by the tenant as "extortion;" and the tenants said—"We have no power to resist; give us a tribunal to determine between us." A great deal had been said about the necessity of preserving freedom of contract; but the Reports of more than one of the Commissions showed that, notwithstanding the views held by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) on the subject, freedom of contract was a thing unknown in Ireland. In connection with the point, he would like to call attention to what was said in the Minority Report of the Richmond Commission—

"We are convinced that in ordinary times freedom of contract cannot be said in any real sense to exist between the majority of Irish occupying tenants and their landlords."

The Bessborough Commission also reported to the same effect—

"Not to come to terms with his landlord means for him to leave his home, to leave his employ, to forfeit the inheritance of his fathers, and, to some extent, the investment of his toil. The farmer bargains with his landlord under sentence of losing his living if the bargain goes off. 'You take my life when you do take the means by which I live.'"

The evidence taken amply supported the conclusions. He would only refer to one witness—the evidence of an Irish gentleman, Mr. Thomas Saunders—who was a magistrate and a landowner in the counties of Limerick and Cork, which was, in effect, that in any dispute as to the rent of a holding, he ended by having his own way, which was what he called freedom of contract. As matters now stood, the improvements made by a tenant on a holding on which his family had resided for generations might be confiscated owing to the imposition of an increased rent; and it was from such a state of things that the tenant asked to be relieved. As to the right of sale, it already existed, for by the English law a tenancy from year to year was as much assignable as any other estate. The right of sale was an incident of property, and all that was desired was that the landlord should be restrained from rendering that right nugatory. There was nothing startling or unreasonable, he contended, in the proposal as to free sale. The policy of the law might be illustrated by reference to the legislation of 30 years ago in relation to a form of tenure which was very prevalent in Ireland—leases for lives, renewable for ever; for the Courts held that clauses against alienation were inconsistent with the tenure, and should be omitted from the grant, although contracted for by the lease itself. The Land Act of 1870 plainly recognized that there was a property which the tenant could dispose of, when it provided that compensation should be given for disturbance. Prior to that Act there was no recognized right; because, as the law then stood, no matter at what expense an improvement might have been made, it was deemed the property of the landlord. The question of fixity of tenure ought not to alarm anyone; permission to enjoy the fruits of one's labour was the right of every man, and to deprive anyone of that right against his will, even with compensation, was to put upon him an injustice. Corporations and Railway Companies might, for special reasons, have the right of compulsory purchase; but it was unreasonable that landlords should have a right to disturb their tenants and force them to part with their property. It would just be as reasonable to give the tenants the right of compulsory sale over the property of the landlords. Sir Harcourt Johnstone, formerly a Member of that House, said, on the 30th of June last, in the debate upon the Fixity of Tenure Bill he (Mr. Litton) brought before the House—

"In the part of the country with which he was connected in England, there was practically fixity of tenure and fair rents, and the system was eminently successful. What was a success in one country surely would be so in the other."
—[3 Hansard, ccliii. 1205.]

Mr. Montgomery, who was well known to people connected with the North of Ireland as a landed proprietor, said—

"The more he considered this (the Land) Bill, the more he was inclined to think that, under the circumstances that were to be dealt with, it would hardly be possible to draw a better one."

The condition of Ireland seemed to him (Mr. Litton) to be due, in a great extent, to three causes, which had not been prominently brought forward. First, the extravagant ideas landlords in Ireland had of the rights of property, and probably also in England. They forgot that the law of England knew no such principle as the purchase of land in an absolute sense. It acknowledged the sale or purchase of an estate in land for life or in fee simple; and land must be taken subject to all its conditions. Another cause was the legal fiction by which all the expenditure was supposed to belong to the landlord; and, thirdly, another cause, probably the most immediate one, was the remorseless application of these legal rights. The landlords had the land on their side, but they had not the equity. If they forced the law, could they complain that the tenants pressed forward the equity? At present the law was enforced, while equity blushed at the wrong, but blushed in vain. These rights were applied until the landlords crushed all opposition to their will; they were at the root of much of the evil, and against them the Bill was directed; and if they took away those evils they would cut away the ground from the present agitation, and it would collapse. The Land Act was supposed to be sufficient to remedy the defects which notoriously existed; but, however well-intentioned, it was easy to show how that Act had failed, for it was proved by a Return that in 1879 the number of claims were 409, against 557 in 1878; while the amount of compensation awarded for the whole of Ireland in regard to the claims of tenants was only £12,654 in 1879, and in 1878 it was only £17,063. That was all that was paid in those years to tenants who were disturbed for the improvements they had made. How stood the number of evictions about the same time? In 1877 there were 1,060 decrees executed for non-payment of rent, and 420 on the title; and in 1880 they rose to 2,888, or nearly double. The hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham) had referred to the remarkable fact that there were more evictions in Ulster, comparatively, than in other parts of Ireland in recent years. The explanation was very simple. The Land League had not had such power in the North as it had in the South. Who could doubt that, if it had not been for the Land League, the evictions in the South would have increased as they had increased in Ulster? The hon. Member had spoken of the best manure for the land being to salt it with rent; but that idea was not confined to him, because he (Mr. Litton) found that the Drapers' Company, so long ago as 1817, declared that the rent of the landlord and the enjoyment of the occupier arose from the same cause—

That certainly was a comfortable theory for the occupier. With regard to the Bill before the House, he was not altogether in love with many of its clauses, still, as he read it, it would secure the objects in view. Its main object was to deal with the large class of tenants who were unprotected in Ireland. The Bill did not seek to disarrange the relations between landlords and tenants as they existed, unless the tenants were forced by the landlords' conduct to seek the protection of the Court. The object of the Bill was not to interfere with these relations when it could be avoided and fair contracts were subsisting. That was shown by the exemption of leases from the Act. When there was harmony between owners and tenants, and the relationship worked easily, the Bill would have no operation at all. Therefore, hon. Members who complained of the amount of litigation which was likely to accrue from the Bill should bear in mind that there need be no litigation except in those cases specially alluded to by the hon. and learned Member for Antrim (Mr. Macnaghten), where the relations between landlords and tenants were strained. Once the landlords adopted and carried out the principle of the “three F's” the Bill was not required. Therefore, in dealing with this matter, a just and fair landlord had nothing to fear, and in that case things would go on just as if the Bill had never passed. The Bill provided for fair rents and for fixity of tenure, and in all cases the right of sale. He would attempt to deal with the principal objections made to the Bill. First, there was the political economy argument. It was said that the Bill was a violation of the laws of political economy. He would not go into that argument, as it had been the subject of so much discussion. He noticed, however, as a curious circumstance, that many hon. Members whose views in regard to political economy were entitled to much respect, while quoting the same authority, Stuart Mill, in support of their arguments, had disagreed in its application to the subject before the House. But practical politics did not admit of the universal application of any abstract doctrines of political economy, and there could be no doubt that the rigid application of general rules must be regulated by the particular conditions of the case. He should not attach much importance to the divergency of views expressed by the hon. Members for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold), Cork County (Mr. Shaw), and Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers), except to say that when they came to deal with a case like this he would not take the view of any political philosopher who had elaborated his views in his study. They had here to deal with matters appealing to their common sense. Even Mr. Bonamy Price, notwithstanding the strong language which he used with regard to this question, had, he (Mr. Litton) thought, given up the contest, when he admitted that the landlords themselves had pressed their position too far, when they took advantage of it to enforce unjust demands upon the tenants. Thus his arguments were not applicable to the state of Ireland. It was said that free sale destroyed fair rent; but he thought that was a great exaggeration. He might say that Judge Longfield, one of the highest authorities on this subject, had declared this assertion to be an abuse of language. It occurred to him (Mr. Litton) that the way to look at the matter was this. A tenant, suppose, who had his rent revised, sold his holding, receiving from the incoming tenant £100. In one sense, that added £5 a-year to the rent the incoming tenant would have to pay; but the outgoing tenant had himself expended a like amount, by reason of which the rent had been reduced. The value due to his expenditure was that which he sold—he was equally out of his capital, as the purchaser would be out of his; consequently, incoming tenants did not pay more in the shape of rent than outgoing tenants. Another objection was that the Bill was a concession to Irish agitation. But he contended that it was a concession to justice, and he was sure the tenant farmers of Ulster would repudiate the notion that it tended to interfere with the just claims of the landlord. He (Mr. Litton) thought there was a general desire on the part of tenants to recognize the landlords' right to a fair rent, provided the landlords showed a disposition to treat them fairly as to their just claims. As regarded the fair rent clause, he thought he spoke the mind of a considerable number of the tenants of Ulster on the subject—that there was no objection to the clause so far as it dealt with holdings subject to the custom. He objected, however, to the introduction of the word “estimated,” which was too strong, too precise, and too mathematical a word. The word sought to indicate that the full amount of the value ought to be given, and he thought that word ought to be struck out. No tenant in Ulster desired to see the landlords' rent cut down to zero; and he, therefore, objected to the word “estimated.” There would be more difficulty in dealing with cases outside Ulster, because, in addition to what might have been paid for the acquisition of the holding, the element of the tenant's right or interest was two-fold—namely, the improvement which he had effected, and also the increased value to which the soil had been raised by the continued process of good tillage. He did not think either that the disturbance scale should be applied in fixing the rents. The scale of compensation was certainly an element of value when a man was about to sell, but it was not applicable to the case of a tenant who continued in his holding; it was to be given as compensation on account of his being turned out of his holding, and if applied as a test of a fair rent, it might happen that a tenant would receive the amount during the currency of his tenancy in the shape of reduction of rent, and receive it over again when the tenancy was put an end to by the landlord. In the Act of 1870 the scale of compensation was regulated by the rateable value; whereas, in the Bill before the House, compensation was calculated according to the rent. That made a most important difference, and operated against the considerate landlord and in favour of the rack-renting landlord. He believed that the amount of litigation arising from the Bill would be as large as was expected. In 1879 the number of cases was 409 all over the country, and in 1878, 557. They had in the Bill the valuable provision of an arbitration clause which he had no doubt would be largely availed of, as it gave the landlord and tenant an opportunity of settling their differences without appealing to the Court, and he saw no reason why the landlord and tenant should fall out. He objected, however, to the Bill not dealing with existing leases. There had been cases notoriously in the North of Ireland, and equally in the South, in which pressure had been put on the tenant to sign leases under threat of eviction, with a view to enable the landlord to get out of the liability of the Act of 1870. He contended it would be right and just on the part of the Government to afford relief to tenants placed in that position, who should satisfy the Court that they had been forced, either by the landlord or by the agent, to agree to these terms. Tenants of that class ought to be relieved and have the benefit of the fixing of a fair rent. But there was a class outside the ordinary lessee—a class still more important, for whom some provision ought to be made, and those were the tenants who held under leases as yearly tenants. It might surprise hon. Members to know that such things existed; but to convince the House that such was the case he produced a lease of this character. The object of this was to evade legislation in the interest of the tenant. There was also another matter which ought to have been dealt with in the Bill, and that was the property of the London Companies and other Corporations. The Government ought to have called attention to this matter; but it would be his duty, and that of his Friends, to introduce Amendments to compel those Companies to sell their properties in case the Land Commission called on them to do so; and, further, to provide that in the event of their sale the right of pre-emption should be given to every tenant on the estate. He also thought the Court of First Instance, as proposed to be constituted under the Bill, would not be acceptable to the country, and was not competent to ascertain what was a fair rent. In fact, he believed the County Court Judges in Ireland did not think themselves qualified to decide on the question of a fair rent. That being so, he would prefer to have associated with the Judge two practical persons, selected for their superior knowledge of the land, who should visit the holdings and determine with the Judge all matters of fact, but not of law. He would not have them permanent officials, but selected by the Land Commission from a panel appointed and removed at discretion, as they were required in any particular locality. He had no doubt the House would pass the second reading of the Bill; and he would put it to hon. Gentlemen coming from Ireland—especially the Home Rule Members—whether it would not be for the benefit of their country, and conducive to the success of the measure, not only here, but in “another place,” that they should recognize in it such an attempt to deal with the question as would justify them in giving their hearty support to the second reading. The question now was, would the House accept the second reading? He (Mr. Litton) heartily hoped it would, and, in conclusion, would quote the words of Edmund Burke—

“The question is, not whether you have a right to render your people miserable, but whether it is not your interest to make them happy. It is not what a lawyer tells me I may do; but what humanity, reason, and justice tells me I ought to do.”

MR. REDMOND said, it appeared to him that it was the duty of every Member of the House, but more especially of every Irish Member, to approach the discussion of that measure in a spirit of fairness and liberality. However much many of them might disapprove of portions of the Bill—however much many of them might believe that, viewed as a whole, it was an inadequate measure to settle the Irish Land Question, still none of them could shut their eyes to the fact that its introduction marked an enormous stride of public opinion upon this subject. Great principles which, in 1876, were denounced from almost every quarter of the House were now recognized as just; and although they believed that those principles were not effectively carried out by the clauses of the Bill, still it seemed to him that it would ill become them to approach its discussion in a spirit of carping criticism, or to withhold from it a full and fair and even generous consideration. But just as, in 1870, a few Irish Members boldly protested that the measure which was then introduced was an inadequate one—just as a few Irish Members then ran the risk of being misunderstood, and of having their motives misrepresented by assuming a seemingly hostile attitude, so, to-day, there were Irish Members upon those Benches who were determined at all hazards to do what they conceived to be their duty to their constituents by protesting that this measure, as it stood at present, could not afford a settlement of the Irish Land Question, and that, if carried into law in its present shape, it would prove absolutely injurious to a large number of the small and poorer tenants in the country. Although the portion of the Bill which dealt with the relations between landlord and tenant was absolutely essential to provide immediate relief, still it could only be regarded at best as a temporary arrangement. In his opinion, no regulation of the relations between landlord and tenant could settle the Irish Land Question. The most that could be claimed for it was that it might render the present system tolerable, while that system was being slowly, but surely, abolished by the other portions of the Bill. The Bill proposed, with certain modifications, and conditions, and restrictions, to establish the principles of fair rent, fixity of tenure, and free sale; but the carrying out of all these principles, and, in fact, the whole working of the Bill, was made to depend upon the Court. No more important function, no more difficult duty ever devolved upon any tribunal than that of fixing a fair rent. In his opinion, it was a duty which it was utterly impossible for any tribunal adequately to fulfil. But, at least, they had a right to expect that the tribunal which was to be invested with this novel and extraordinary power should be one which would command the respect and confidence of the people. What was the tribunal established by this Bill? No new one at all, but an old and dishonoured institution. The Civil Bill Court was tried, and had failed to work the Act of 1870. There was a clause in that Act providing that compensation might be given to tenants evicted for non-payment of rent, if the rent was proved to be exorbitant. During the whole of the operation of the Act there were only three cases in all Ireland in which such compensation had been awarded. It was idle to say this arose from rarity of exorbitant rents. It did not; it arose from the fact that the Court did not receive, and, as he believed, did not deserve to receive, the confidence of the people. He had three objections to the tribunal. In the first place, it seemed to him that the Civil Bill Court had already work enough to do. It had not the time at its disposal to deal with these cases—the thousands of cases which, notwithstanding what was stated by the hon. and learned Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton) must come before it in every part of Ireland, if the bulk of the tenants were to be benefited by this Act. Then, its processes were so expensive as to forbid poor men who required to be benefited from applying to it. The Court was also constituted in such a way that it was regarded, whether rightly or wrongly, with almost universal suspicion and mistrust in Ireland. What was wanted, in his (Mr. Redmond's) opinion, was a separate, distinct tribunal, which would be able to give all its time and attention to the cases arising out of the Bill, and which should also be cheap in its procedure and expeditious in its working. It should be constituted, not as to-day, by men drawn from one class of the community, who had been chosen for preferment, either in consequence of the social influence of landlords, or of political services rendered to some English Party, but composed of men drawn impartially from all classes of the community, men chosen solely in consequence of their fitness for the work, and who would command the respect and confidence of the people. That was his first general objection to the Bill as it now stood. His second objection was, that, if he read it right, the immediate result of its passing into law in its present shape would be that hundreds of thousands of small tenants throughout Ireland would be evicted from their homes. That seemed strange in a Bill which some of its supporters stated gave fixity of tenure; but the explanation was that there were 300,000 tenants in Ireland who were rented at less than £8 a-year, and the vast majority of these, in the South and West of Ireland, were at that moment hopelessly in arrears. Their rent had accumulated in disastrous seasons in consequence of the iniquitous rack rents which were exacted. These arrears it was impossible the tenants in question could pay. How would those men be treated by the Bill? Why, they would be compelled by the landlords to sell their tenant right. They would be forced on a depressed market, and the price offered for the tenant right, whether it was large or small, would go, every penny of it, in arrears due to the landlord. In such cases, the concession of freedom of sale was nothing but a mockery. If that took place, eviction with all its harshness remained; and he asked, in all fairness, would it be any consolation to those men, when they and their families were thrown out penniless and hopeless from their homes, to be told that, by a beneficent measure passed in that Parliament of England, the inestimable boon of freedom of sale had been conferred upon them? The Court was to decide what was to be a fair rent for the present, and for the future for 15 years. Assuredly, it would be equally well qualified to go back six years, and say what would have been a fair rent during that time. If that was done, those claims for arrears would be reduced to their just proportions; and then it would be the duty of the State to step in and compensate the landlords for their just losses. That might appear a startling proposal; but would it not be better for the State to spend some millions to enable the tenant farmers to reap the benefit of the Act, and to have a fair start, than to spend the money in keeping an army of 40,000 men in Ireland to enforce an unjust law and to assist in evicting the people from their homes? He knew not on what principle of justice leaseholders were to be exempted from the Bill. In many parts of Ireland leases had been forced upon the tenants to cheat them out of the benefits of the Act of 1870. The notorious "Leinster lease" robbed the tenants of the Duke of Leinster of the benefits of the Act of 1870; was it to be allowed to rob them of the benefits of the Act of 1881? He objected also to that part of the Bill which afforded increased facilities for emigration. If there was any reason for the proposal, it was that emigration had been too slow. His answer was that within the last 28 years over 2,500,000 men and women left the shores of Ireland; last year almost 100,000 emigrated, and of these 75 per cent were between the ages of 15 and 35. What nation on earth could stand such a drain as that? But why should they leave? While there were in Ireland thousands of fertile acres without a homestead, and thousands of acres of reclaimable land, it was cruel mockery to the Irish people to talk of increased facilities for emigration. He had said that the Bill recognized great principles. The greatest principle that it recognized was that landlordism in Ireland was an evil. True, compulsory expropriation was not to be found within the four corners of the Bill; but so desirable, nay, essential, did it appear to the Government to get rid of Irish landlords, that extraordinary facilities were to be afforded to induce them to sell. He welcomed with pleasure that portion of the Bill by which facilities were to be afforded for the creation of a peasant proprietary, though it appeared to him some of the provisions for that purpose were very inadequate and absurd. As far as he knew, there was no reason to suppose that it would be unsafe for the Government to advance the whole of the purchase money; and he could not understand with what object the Bill imposed restrictions that would be absolutely fatal to the proper working of the clauses. Three-fourths in number and value of the tenants would have to say that they were willing to buy their holdings before the Land Commission would be empowered to buy an estate from a landlord who desired to sell. That condition would, he feared, be seldom fulfilled; and it was, from every point of view, unnecessary. Still, notwithstanding these defects, he viewed this portion of the Bill with some hope. In a speech addressed to his constituents, the junior Member for Leeds (Mr. Herbert Gladstone) said that the Government would resist all Amendments emanating from the Land League Members. He very much regretted that determination; but the letter of the Prime Minister to the Irish Bishops, and the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland at Bradford, had convinced him that such was the intention of the Government. The hon. Member for Leeds also stated that the era of conciliation for Ireland had begun. He was fain to believe it; but what could Irishmen think when the Irish Executive put forth its powers against men of high and unimpeachable character, and the Forces of the Crown were employed to maintain unjust and iniquitous laws? Had the Prime Minister been present, he would have asked him to listen to the suggestions that would emanate from the Irish Representatives; and if he took that course he would, in truth, inaugurate an era of conciliation, and there would be some chance that the Land Law (Ireland) Bill would be formed into a wise, lasting, and beneficial measure of reform. But if the right hon. Gentleman allowed himself to be bound by the evil traditions of English Governments in the past, if he resisted and refused all concessions to Irish opinion, and, at the same time, insisted, under the malign influence of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in forcing on the Irish people a hateful reign of terror, then not only would the Bill inevitably fail, but a great opportunity would be lost, never to be regained by him, of doing justice to Ireland from that House, and putting an end to a record of misery and bloodshed which was a disgrace to the history of England, and was unparalleled in the history of the world.

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN: I am very glad, Sir, to be able to agree with the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Redmond) in that part of his speech in which he referred to a peasant proprietary; and I rejoiced to see that some of the leading Members of the Government who have taken part in this discussion—especially my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright), and my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India (the Marquess of Hartington) in his speech at Fishmonger's Hall—have put aside, to a secondary position, those complicated provisions which are intended to regulate the future relations of landlords and tenants, and raise, to the first place in importance among the Government proposals, those clauses which will lead to an increase in the number of the owners of land in Ireland. In doing so, the Government are faithfully adhering to the principles which have guided their Party in the great reforms of the last 50 years. We, Sir, have ever looked to the wide extension of rights and franchises among the great body of our fellow-countrymen as the surest bulwark of the Throne and the Constitution; and so, in like manner, if the fortress of property is ever to be attacked, I believe its strongest defence will be found, not in raising the walls or barring the gates, but in extending wide the outworks and strengthening the garrison, so as to enlist on the side of the defence, by the strongest motives of self-interest, the largest possible number of those who, if jealously excluded, might, in some future hour of difficulty or danger, throw the weight of numbers on the side of the attacking force. I shall, therefore, give my hearty support to any well-considered measure which, with a due regard to the rights of the present possessors, is calculated to promote a large increase in the number of the owners of land. So, also, as to emigration. No doubt, Sir, we should all prefer to keep our people at home if we could. Human life and human labour are two of the most precious forms of public wealth; and we cannot part with them, even to our own Colonies, without a pang. But when, as in this case, it has been shown that whole districts of the West of Ireland are so crowded and so poverty-stricken, that if you made the people a present of the fee-simple of their holdings to-morrow they could not subsist on them in comfort, I can conceive no wiser and no worthier form of help than to offer them the means of transport to a country where the ownership of rich and virgin land is to be had for the mere taking possession, and where their own labour and that of their families, which in the overcrowded market round their present homes is a mere drug, would command certain employment and ample reward. It is, therefore, with deep regret that I have seen the reception this proposal of the Government has met with from the Leaders of the Irish people. It is only one more instance of that unhappy spirit of distrust which does so much to frustrate our best-meant efforts in the cause of conciliation and peace. But if the Irish people still entertain any doubts as to the great price we are ready to pay for their good-will, I think this Bill should remove those doubts. I would ask them to consider what it costs to the English Government to propose, and to the English Parliament to entertain, such a measure as this. It has already cost the Prime Minister the sacrifice of one of his oldest and most honoured Colleagues. But before these debates are over I am afraid it will have cost him a great deal more. Do they think it can be pleasant for a statesman of his standing and reputation to sit there to be pelted with his own speeches? And yet I feel sure my right hon. Friend would himself be the first to admit that no fairer weapon—and certainly no more brilliant or effective one—can be used against him by his opponents. For my own part, I am very grateful to my noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) for giving us these speeches in so convenient a form. They have been very valuable to me, though perhaps I have used them not exactly for the purpose, or with precisely the result, which my noble Friend intended. I freely confess, Sir, that during the last four or five weeks I have often turned with repugnance from the study of the complicated clauses and questionable principles which this Bill contains; but I have always found the most effectual antidote to that repugnance in reading the speeches made by the Prime Minister in 1870. In those speeches I find he lays down, affirms, argues, and challenges confutation of those principles which I believe to be true, and which this Bill too often infringes. What inference am I to draw from that? Am I to conclude that my right hon. Friend has changed his mind? No, Sir; I would rather believe that he and many of his Colleagues have felt precisely that same repugnance to this Bill which I feel myself, and that they have seen

reason to overcome it. The Bill, we are told, violates the doctrine of Free Trade. Undoubtedly it does. Yet who supports it more zealously than the honoured champion of Free Trade, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. The Bill establishes new and dangerous principles of law. I fear that cannot be denied. Yet who is there in all England whom we on these Benches, and more especially those of us who are not quite so enlightened and advanced as some of our Colleagues, look up to as the safest and most trusted guardian of the law? Is it not the present Lord Chancellor? And yet this Bill has not scared the Lord Chancellor from the Woolsack. The Bill sets political economy at defiance. That certainly is my own opinion. Yet who introduces it? Is the Prime Minister some benevolent enthusiast, who treats the doctrines of Adam Smith and Malthus with contempt? Do we not know that for the lifetime of a whole generation of men, ever since the majority of the Members of the present House of Commons were boys at school, the Prime Minister has been not merely studying the laws of political economy, but applying them with unparalleled success to the most complicated problems of legislation and finance? But we are told all this is admitted. The Government know well enough what they are about; and here lies the gravamen of the charge—they err with their eyes open. Knowing the right course, they deliberately prefer the wrong, and that for Party purposes. I hardly know whether to treat that accusation as seriously intended or not. I believe it is made half in joke and half in anger; and that those who make it hardly expect us to take them at their word. Unjust as I believe it to be, its injustice is not half so flagrant as its absurdity. For what do the Government gain, in a Party sense, by this Bill? Has it conciliated the Representatives of Ireland? Not in the least. Is it, then, their own supporters who are so desperately enamoured of the Bill? I wish we could put that to the test. Allow me, only for a moment, to assume that the Prime Minister were now to get up in his place, and say—"We have discovered a plan for restoring peace and prosperity to Ireland without departing from any of the principles we laid down in 1870. The Duke of Argyll has resumed his place in the Government. I ask leave to withdraw this Bill in order to substitute for it one framed on very different principles." Is it not notorious that if the Prime Minister could make such an announcement as that, it would bring joy to the hearts of many of his steadiest supporters? Should we not go home with a sense of ease and relief to which many of us have been strangers ever since this Bill was introduced? No, Sir; the opponent of the Government must find some more plausible theory to account for this Bill than to say it has been introduced for Party purposes. If I had myself to offer a solution of the problem, it would be a very different one. I should say that the extent of the departure from the principles of 1870 was a measure of the sense the Government entertain of the imperious and paramount requirements of the great emergency with which they have to deal. The nature and extent of that emergency are patent to us all. The reasons which have induced the Government to adopt this particular mode of dealing with it have not yet been fully explained; and I, as a supporter of the Government, feel it my duty to vote in favour of the second reading of the Bill, in order that we may have the opportunity of hearing those reasons more fully explained. As regards those questionable provisions in the Bill with which we shall have to deal when we get into Committee, I shall endeavour to approach them in the spirit of that faith in my Leaders which may avail to remove mountains, though I confess myself quite unable to aspire to that still higher form of faith which seems to enable its possessors to shut their eyes to the fact that there are any mountains at all to be removed. Passing to the Bill itself, I shall be anxious to hear why the Government propose to apply the Bill to future tenancies at all. The Bill is commended to us as a measure of justice, to give legal protection to certain moral and equitable rights of Irish tenants arising from the past history of their tenure. But this can only apply to existing tenancies. Where there is no existing tenancy and no existing tenant, there can be no tenant right. To apply the Bill in those cases would attach a penalty, perhaps amounting to a prohibition, to the letting of any land now in the landlords' occupation. It would deprive the landlord of a valuable right, without conferring any corresponding benefit on anyone else. Indeed, it would injure the whole class of tenants by still further restricting the supply of land available for letting, when the reason for legislative interference arises from the fact that this supply is already far too small to meet the demand. I hope the Government will also explain why they propose to give the right of free sale to every tenant, quite irrespective of whether he has paid for it at his entry or not. The regulation of rents by a public tribunal is, no doubt, false in principle; but there are strong arguments of expediency to recommend it in Ireland; and no other plan has been suggested by which the evils of excessive competition for land can be controlled. But if competition is so dangerous a weapon that we are forced to violate our own principles in order to wrest it from the hands of the landlord, who is bound by the strongest inducements of self-interest to use it with moderation, on what possible ground, either of justice or expediency, can we intrust it to the tenant, who is under no such inducements to moderation at all? I have never yet heard a satisfactory answer to the objection that fair rents cannot co-exist with free sale—that the two are not merely antagonistic, but absolutely and essentially incompatible. And there is a further difficulty attaching to this question of free sale. It has been proved in evidence before us that while some landlords have admitted the right, others have paid large sums to keep it off their estates; and there are, again, others who, under the powers of the Land Act of 1870, have bought up the right and extinguished it at a large expense. How are you going to deal with these conflicting cases? It needs no argument to prove that, if you re-create a right which has just been bought up in reliance on the good faith of Parliament, you must give compensation. But this Bill contains not one word as to compensation; and yet I hold it to be absolutely impossible that the Government can intend to propose to us any measure that will in the slightest degree justify the strong language of my noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire. I cannot myself see how you will ever work this Bill without giving rise to just claims to compensation. When this question was raised early in the debate, my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland answered with his usual honesty and straightforwardness—"Why should we compensate the landlords when we do them no harm; when, indeed, we confer a benefit on them by the Bill?" When I read that, I thought my right hon. Friend had been profiting by the advice given by the Prime Minister to a candidate at an election during the Easter Recess, and that he was taking the bull by the horns with a vengeance. I have no doubt my right hon. Friend expressed his own sincere opinion; but I am afraid he will find it difficult to make good this point throughout the coming debates. He must remember that from the day this Bill passes, competition for the ownership of land in Ireland, as distinguished from the tenant right, is at an end. After passing this Bill, you cannot reasonably expect that another shilling of English money will in future seek investment in Irish land. There will remain only two purchasers—the occupying tenant and the Land Commission. The Land Commission certainly will not bid against the occupying tenant; and I think we may trust the Land League to take care that he is not embarrassed by any other competitor. This Bill will, therefore, virtually destroy and close the market. I quite admit that the operation of the Bill is so obscure that it would be very difficult to assess the amount of depreciation beforehand with any approach to accuracy; and the attempt to do so would lead to long and perhaps painful controversy, which, I hope, we shall be able to avoid. Fortunately, a proposal has been made which is not open to these objections. The proposal first appeared in the Report of the Bessborough Commission, inserted there by the O'Connor Don; and it has since been endorsed by Lord Lansdowne and Lord Dufferin, and other high authorities. I mean the proposal that this Bill should give to every owner of land in Ireland who considers he will be injured by it the option of making over his estate to the Land Commission at a fair price. The proposal is so reasonable, so moderate, and so obviously demanded by justice, that I hope the Government will see no difficulty in adopting it. And there is another argument which, with the zealous supporters of the Bill, may weigh almost as strongly in its favour as the argument of justice itself. Those of us who had the good fortune to hear the speech of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on Monday night must have been deeply impressed by his earnestness in supporting what he described as "the great object of this Bill." Speaking of the ownership of land, my right hon. Friend said—

"I believe now that if it were possible to make so great a change, if it were practicable, it would be of more advantage to Ireland and its population than all other measures that it is possible to conceive of or attempt if we were to transfer three-fourths of all the tenants of Ireland from tenants into actual owners of their land."

And, after illustrating his argument by reference to Russia and France, my right hon. Friend proceeded—

"And I venture to say . . . that there is nothing that Parliament can do, and scarcely anything that it can spend, that will not be amply compensated by a great and wide-spread liberality with regard to this particular part of the Land Question."

These, Sir, are very remarkable words indeed. Speaking with all the weight, and under all the responsibility, attaching to his great authority in the counsels of the Government, my right hon. Friend tells the House of Commons that to turn three-fourths of the tenants of Ireland into owners of their own land would be of more advantage than any other measure it is possible to conceive, and that the expense would be amply compensated by the result. This being the opinion of the Government, they must of necessity desire to give effect to it; and they can only do so in one way—by offering to the owners of land in Ireland every fair and reasonable inducement to sell their estates. I sincerely trust the Government will show they have the courage of their opinions, and themselves amend the Bill by inserting clauses giving to every landowner in Ireland whom this Bill affects the option of selling his estate to the Land Commission at a fair price. Justice and sound policy alike concur with the avowed opinions of the Government in recommending that Amendment. I believe it would greatly assist the passage of the Bill, and go far to insure its success when it has become law, because it would enable the Government to give large and immediate effect to that object they have so much at heart—the creation of a peasant proprietary.

Sir John Ramsden

SIR JOHN HAY said, he wished to make a few observations as to what the Bill would cost if it were passed. There were three divisions of the measure on which public money would be expended. There was, first—the question of expropriation, or the assisting of tenants to purchase the land of the landlords; then, the question of reclamation; and next, the question of emigration. These three heads of the Bill would appear to require a considerable expenditure of public money; and he would endeavour to indicate to the House what the amount of money was which the Exchequer might be called upon to pay. The other day he asked the Prime Minister a question with reference to the amount of the liability Government would incur under the Bill; but the right hon. Gentleman said he thought it would be better to answer that in Committee. He (Sir John Hay), however, thought it should be considered by the House before it reached that stage, and he trusted the House would agree with him in that opinion. With regard to the reclamation of land, those familiar with some parts of Scotland would know that what was grouse moor 30 years ago now carried corn and turnips; and he had had experience enough of that kind of reclamation to be able to say pretty accurately what it cost. There were 5,200,000 acres of land under tillage in Ireland. Over a very considerable area reclamation could not be undertaken for less than something like £17 an acre, exclusive of houses. The cost of improving the land and placing a habitation on it, if a cottage were to be built on each 20-acre lot—and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) had stated that 20-acre holdings were the smallest which could be profitably distributed among peasant proprietary—could not be put at less than £4 or £5 additional per acre; therefore, the reclamation of 3,000,000 acres would cost something like £22 or £23 per acre. The hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) had stated, in his able speech, that 3,000,000 acres was all the land available for profitable reclamation. That being so, the reclamation of 3,000,000 acres would cost at least £66,000,000 of public money. If the whole of the 8,000,000 acres of land which would then be brought under cultivation were to be appropriated, there would be room for

400,000 peasant proprietors, or, counting five persons to each family, for 2,000,000 persons. With regard to the question of expropriation of proprietors, the rents of Ireland at that moment amounted to £13,000,000 or something more, and, taking the price at which the land had been sold under the Church Estates Commissioners—namely, 22 years' purchase—the cost would amount to £286,000,000. The Treasury would be liable for, and would guarantee, three-fourths of this sum—namely, £210,000,000. If the 400,000 peasant proprietors, who represented, say, taking five as the number of the family, 2,000,000 persons, were the whole of the Irish people; and if we were likely to get rid of all the Irish difficulties by paying this money, no doubt the Representatives of England and Scotland might feel themselves justified in incurring that liability. But it did not seem to him that the question could be settled in such a manner, because the population of Ireland at the last Census was considerably over 5,000,000 persons. Of these, 68,000 were owners of land, and 6,000 were tenants of over £100 a-year rent. These persons, with their families, at five to a family, represented 350,000 persons. There were in the seven largest towns 650,000 persons not principally dependent on agriculture. If they added the 1,000,000 persons thus indicated to the 2,000,000 persons who represented the peasant proprietary to whom the whole land of Ireland under tillage or to be reclaimed was to be appropriated, there still remained more than 2,000,000 persons unprovided for. He spoke with some knowledge, having, like all Scotchmen, recognized the advantage of emigration. The hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw) said when Scotchmen left their native land they never went back again. But that was not the case, because, having represented an English constituency for 18 years, he (Sir John Hay) now represented a Scotch one. No doubt hon. Members had read the valuable and patriotic communication addressed by the Canadian Government to ours on the subject of emigration. In Manitoba alone there was room for 80,000,000 persons. There the wretched cottier, who passed his time between starvation and sedition, would become the honest and industrious possessor of 320 acres of fertile soil; and priest and people, either in village communities or in separate homesteads, would become an orderly, loyal, and happy community. It would be far better and more sensible to get rid of the surplus population by placing them on farms of considerable size in Canada, where they could live comfortably and be useful to the land of their adoption, as well as to the Empire, than adopting any of the other two courses that had been suggested. There was a small island in the Hebrides—North Uist—which had a population in 1847 of something like 6,000 persons. The advance of science had the effect of taking away the value of kelp for commercial purposes, and the consequence was that the people of the island lost their means of gaining a livelihood. Lord Macdonald agreed to remove from the island 3,000 persons at his own expense and send them to the Colonies; but, with the exception of about 600, they all desired to remain there. The result was that charitable persons in Scotland provided a considerable sum of money for the reclamation of the land on the island, and the land was reclaimed. But, after the experiment had been tried, it was found that the ground was so unfertile that it could not be profitably cultivated; and in the end the population was reduced to 1,600 or 1,800 persons, the rest being sent off to Canada, at the expense of Lord Macdonald, where they were a most contented and happy community, whilst those who remained were no longer an indigent community. He thought it would be well if the people of Ireland would profit by the experience of this island.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he had always held the opinion that the Irish Land Question was only a branch of the great Land Question of the United Kingdom. The question had become accentuated in Ireland from the peculiar circumstances of that country; but no settlement which was unjust and inequitable in itself could be a safe and permanent settlement. He maintained that the true test of any Land Bill brought before Parliament was whether it was just on the one hand to the tenant, and on the other to the landlord. No one in his sober senses could believe that by any action of the Legislature they could prevent the hiring and the letting of land, any more than they could prevent the hiring and letting of carriages or horses. They might, if they pleased, transfer the virtual ownership of the land from one class of persons to another; but all history taught them that amongst the class that was favoured by the legislation of the moment there would be the thrifty and the idle, and the fortunate and the unfortunate; and it was contrary to human experience to suppose that those persons who entered into the possession of land for the purpose of cultivating it would, when they became rich, not desire to give up their occupations to tenants. He looked upon all the proposals to do away with landlordism simply as attempts to delude the public, and especially the Irish public. Few who had thought out the question would deny that there was no such thing as absolute property in land vested in individuals. Land was invariably held on trust either expressed or implied. The whole land of this country was supposed to be vested in the Crown, and granted by the Crown to individuals for specific purposes. If it were true that the land was held upon trust, there was also something else that followed. In his opinion, the landlord and tenant were in all countries virtually, if not absolutely, co-partners. They might not have actually the same interest in the land; but so long as the relations between landlord and tenant existed they were really and truly partners. They made their own bargains; the landlord was the sleeping partner and the tenant was the working partner. But what followed from this? That the principle of arbitration, as in all partnerships, was the true principle on which to settle disputes between landlord and tenant. It seemed to be forgotten that the principle of arbitration, which he had frequently heard excite in the House the greatest astonishment and reprobation, was the very principle, not, however, extending to the question of rent, that was embodied in all Scotch leases. That was one cause why, in his opinion, the relations between landlord and tenant had been so little disturbed in Scotland. The primary principle of this Bill was to establish a Court of Arbitration, which could determine vexed questions between landlord and tenant. For years the tenants had been asking it in vain, because the relations between them and their landlords had not been the same as in the other parts of the Kingdom. The principal reason of this was the difference in religion. Scotch and English landlords were able to take the greatest interest in the spiritual and moral welfare of their tenants; but in Ireland that was impossible. Much of the land had been given to the landlords with a mission to propagate a religion hateful to the tenantry. A great gulf was thereby fixed between the landlord and tenant in the matter of religion, dating from the time of Elizabeth and Cromwell. No Irish landlord, however, could, in these days, venture to interfere with the religion of his tenant without the certainty of offending the religious feelings of the people. The consequence was that the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland were very different from those which prevailed in England and Scotland. Irish landlords were thus led to consider their tenants as so many machines for the production of rent. He did not deny that the great majority of the landlords in Ireland, grossly and wickedly as they had been calumniated, had performed their duty to their tenants; but the misfortune was that Irish landlords, as a body, had not those intimate social relations with their tenants which were characteristic of the English landlords. The management of Irish estates was committed to agents. They all knew that in an Irish novel the first picture presented was that of the heir of the estate going abroad, spending his money, and sending home to the agent to raise him more rent.

Well, the principle which had been so long demanded of a tribunal to stand between the landlord and tenant to settle the question of rent had at length been adopted by the Government. This object, good as it was, might be carried out so as to interfere unjustly with the landlord in two ways. First, pecuniarily, it might reduce his income in an arbitrary manner. One clause in this very Bill which had not yet been explained might, in the hands of an unjust Judge, confiscate a large portion of the property of the landlord. In the second place, it might injure the landlord in his feudal relations with his tenants. Now, until the passing of the Ballot Act the vote of the tenant was considered as much the absolute property of his landlord as the rent itself. When he was first returned to the House it was never expected that he should canvass a tenant, and the best gift that could be bequeathed to his successor by a previous Representative of a county constituency was the book which told what particular bailiff influenced such and such tenants on an estate. It was, at that time, not the custom for Parliamentary candidates to address the electors at all, except upon the hustings at the time of the elections; and such things as meetings during the Recess for the Member to give an account of his stewardship were never heard of. That was only 12 years ago. What a change had been brought about by recent legislation in the relative position of landlord and tenant! The ballot had absolutely annihilated all illegitimate power on the part of the landlords, and had thus deprived them of the last remains of their feudal privileges. He, therefore, specially valued in this Bill the establishment of a judicial tribunal between the landlord and the tenant, because, from the circumstances just mentioned, such a change would injure no one; but he hoped the Prime Minister, on the question of the tribunal, would adopt the recommendation of those who had observed the working of the Land Courts in Ireland. He was quite convinced that Courts with a County Court Judge as Chairman, being the sole arbitrator between landlord and tenant, would be productive of nothing but disaster. He did not impugn the perfect fairness and honour of County Court Judges. There were 32 of them, some of whom had the reputation for giving judgments in favour of landlords, and others in favour of tenants; but, however learned and meritorious they might be in reality, it would be most unwise in the State to place them in a position in which it might be supposed they would not be perfectly impartial in their judgments. He thought it would be useful to associate with them an arbitrator to advise and act with them. But the great complaint he made against the Bill, which he regarded, nevertheless, as a noble effort to settle a most intricate question, was that it was a Bill which would settle all questions by litigation, whereas the questions between landlord and tenant ought to be settled by courts of conciliation. If a certain number of perfectly impartial arbitrators who had a knowledge of the qualities of land were selected by the Government and associated with the County Court Judges in the investigation of these subjects, we should get a tribunal which would be fair to the landlord and to the tenant, and which would not involve the latter in the cost of litigation that was foreshadowed in this Bill. He should like to see the Land Commission appoint sub-Commissioners to visit the various districts. These sub-Commissioners would be able to settle half the disputes between landlord and tenant, by a simple hearing in an informal way, without expensive records and without any fee. With regard to the Land Commission, it had been rumoured that of the three members of whom it was to be composed one would be the excellent Nobleman who presided over the Irish Church Commission, while another would be a learned Judge who was a member of the same Commission. The Church Commissioners had been most successful in giving effect to the Bright Clauses of the Land Act, for out of 8,000 ecclesiastical holdings with which they had to deal they had sold nearly 6,000 to the tenants; and he believed the same Commissioners would be equally successful in administering the provisions of this Bill, whilst the experience of themselves and their staff would be most valuable as regards waste lands. He was aware the Prime Minister thought the undertaking of State works in the West of Ireland would be against all the principles of political economy. He deeply regretted that fact, which, indeed, was unmistakably written on the pages of this Bill, for his own experience of Ireland had convinced him that if we left that festering sore untouched, or left the execution of works to Joint Stock Companies, we should perpetuate the source of all the evils under which the people were labouring. Unless Parliament grappled with the industrial development of the country and the amelioration of the cottier tenants of the West of Ireland, no real good would be accomplished by any Land Bill.

He must refer to another question, which it was very painful for him to speak upon, but which, in the interests of truth, he ought not to pass by. The organization which had kept up the agitation on the Land Question during the last 12 months had presented itself in a Protean shape to that House. Hon.

[Sixth Night.]

Members had heard constant denials of the principles on which that organization was based. It was with feelings of amazement that he heard the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), when charged in that House by the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), deny that he had ever advocated the expropriation of landlords. Why, the fundamental principle of the Land League was not to evict tenants, but to evict landlords. He heard that statement to the First Commissioner of Works with the greatest astonishment, and he thereupon referred to the records of the Land League, and found there a series of resolutions which were passed on the 30th of April last year at a great conference in Dublin, at which the hon. Member for the City of Cork presided. The most important resolution was this—

“That, for the settlement of the Land Question, a department should be constituted which should be empowered to acquire the ownership of any estate upon tendering to the owner of the estate 20 years’ purchase at Griffith’s valuation; and, moreover, that any tenant tendering that amount should thereby become entitled to the ownership.”

Well, was not that expropriation? Then, why did the hon. Member for the City of Cork contradict the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. PARNELL: I did not.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: Am I to understand that the hon. Member denies that he did contradict?

MR. PARNELL: The statement of the First Commissioner of Works was that I had advocated, and that the Land League had advocated, the compulsory expropriation of all landlords. I had advised, and do still, the expropriation of landlords, but not of all landlords.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked whether the hon. Member or anyone else would say that the resolutions did not apply to all landlords? Not content with that, the hon. Member for Cork said, at the close of his address, that he had long advocated the proposal of fixity of tenure; but, he added, let them disguise it as they might, any compromise with the system of landlordism simply meant the prolongation of it. He would, therefore, throw overboard fixity of tenure, and he went on to ask those who had supported it how long they had been “fiddling” with it? The Irish people had been taught distinctly by the hon. Member and his allies that the only mode in which the Land Question could be satisfactorily settled was by getting rid of landlords—of all landlords, not merely of some. What assistance, he would ask, had hon. Members given towards the settlement of the Land Question? At a conference in Dublin, only the other day, a learned gentleman used expressions which made his blood turn cold. He said the bankruptcy of the greater part of the Irish landlords was inevitable if tenants would only persevere in withholding their rents, in contesting their claims, and preventing them from getting any money out of the land. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) contended that that was a most immoral and revolting sentiment. He knew at present landlords who were in far greater destitution than their tenants. [A laugh.] An hon. Member laughed; but he was not a landlord. Day after day there were instances of applications by Irish landlords for the means of obtaining a day’s bread, in consequence of their rents being withheld by their tenants. A friend of his had told him that he had met a landlord who, after consulting him as a doctor, told him he could not pay him his fee, as he was reduced to want through his rent being unjustly withheld from him. If a landlord who evicted a tenant because he could not pay was guilty of the most heinous crime, he knew no language that was too strong to condemn the conduct of those who had money in their pockets, but refused to pay their just debts. He, for one, would never do anything else than denounce the conduct of hon. Gentlemen opposite who had stimulated tenants in a course of dishonesty. The hon. Member for Limerick County (Mr. Synan) had joined the Party led by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and a short time ago his tenants asked him to concede what it was said they wanted—Griffith’s valuation. He consented at once; but his tenants would not pay; then he issued processes against three large tenants who could pay, but who dishonestly refused to pay by the advice of the Land League. For doing that he was denounced in very strong language by a reverend gentleman. The hon. Member only last week wrote a letter to the accuser, stating that he believed he made the accusation of harsh conduct on his part in profound ignorance of the facts, and explaining that he had laid out large sums of money on the tenants' farms, but could not get payment of his rents. He had never heard of a more temperate letter than that under the circumstances, nor of a letter showing more conclusively what were the real aims and objects of those who were directing that agitation. The case was so typical of what was going on, and so important, that he would trouble the House with reading the letter itself. It was dated last week, and addressed to the Rev. Eugene Sheehy—

"Rev. and Dear Sir,—I find, in the report of the Kilmallock meeting on Sunday last, 'that you charge me with causing writs to be served thickly on my tenants near Manister, and that the task was not unpleasant to me.' My opinion of you as an able, patriotic, and just clergyman is such that I believe you made this statement under a misapprehension and ignorance of the facts. I therefore feel it my duty, for your sake as well as my own defence, to put the facts before you. Last October, my agent asked whether I would grant the request of the tenants to pay Griffith's valuation, to which I at once consented. After five months the rent was not paid, and my agent had to select three of the principal tenants for proceedings to compel payment of what they themselves proposed. One of these tenants, three years ago, paid to another tenant £950 for the interest in his holding. A second held under a lease at £30 a farm of 60 acres, upon which I expended £700 since the lease was made, and for which I pay £37 10s. a-year drainage interest; so that I am actually a loser of £7 10s. a-year. The third has a farm of 50 acres under a lease, and upon this I have expended over £700 since the lease was made. Are the tenants, who refused to perform their own promise to pay Griffith's valuation, in the wrong? Or is my agent in the wrong for being obliged, unwillingly, after five months to take proceedings to compel them? I have no doubt of your answer, and remain, Rev. and Dear Sir, very faithfully yours,

It would be seen, therefore, that the League sought to induce persons, first of all, to ask for Griffith's valuation; and when that was given to refuse to pay any rent at all. It was the most dishonest, the most demoralizing, and the most un-Christian agitation that he had ever known. He had mentioned these things because he wanted to put the House in possession of the estimate which they ought to place on the abstention of hon. Members opposite from supporting the Bill. They knew very well that it was a just Bill in the main; that it offered to the tenants far more than the tenants had ever dreamt of obtaining; and if it were passed, and if it were amended, as he trusted it would be, it would for ever settle the Land Question. But when the Land Question was settled Othello's occupation would be gone. He had never spoken to an Irish farmer by himself without finding that all he asked was to have a fair rent, and not to be disturbed in his holding as long as he paid that rent. But the Irish farmers had been taught that to obtain that they must combine for ends that were immoral in themselves and demoralizing to the country. ["No!"] Did any hon. Gentleman say it was not immoral for the tenants to refuse to pay any rent, even when they could afford it, to landlords who were as virtuous as the tenants, and most of whom had always performed their duties? If a poor tenant could not pay, he said it was immoral for the landlord to turn him out of his holding, and he had last year advocated a measure which would have altogether prevented evictions for a year under a certain amount—£50—until the present Bill had passed. That measure was not accepted by the House, nor adopted by the Government. But the Compensation for Disturbance Bill was introduced by the Government, and thrown out by the House of Lords. What was the course of hon. Members opposite in regard to that Bill? The hon. Member for the City of Cork repeatedly stated that that Bill was not worth the paper on which it was written. [Mr. PARNELL: I never said anything of the sort.] The hon. Member repeatedly said the Bill was perfectly worthless, and he gave it no assistance. Did the hon. Member suppose that people had no memories? When the Bill was rejected by the House of Lords that was made the stalking-horse of that pestilent agitation. It would be the same thing with the present Bill. Some hon. Members opposite were too noble-minded to accept such tactics as that. The hon. Member and his Party, as they had been told, were to walk out of the House on the second reading. What was the object of that but to damage the measure in the House of Lords and get the House of Lords to repeat its action of last year? Hon. Gentlemen who usually acted with the hon. Member could swallow a good deal; but they could not swallow that, and they would vote for the Bill. If the Bill were thrown out by the machinations of the hon. Member the result would be that everything would be put on the House of Lords and on Parliament, and the country would be still more agitated next year, and life would be more unsafe than it was now. He knew what it was to live among an excited population in Ireland. Until lately his own people had treated him like a brother, and nothing but words of blessing had any member of his family received from them. But now that part of the country was stained by agrarian crime, and had been the scene of some of the foulest deeds. The truth was, the Celtic nature was something like the Hindoo nature. The mild and gentle Hindoo, who took care of children and performed domestic offices for the Europeans in India, when once excited at the time of the Mutiny, was guilty of the most dreadful atrocities. And so it was that the Celtic nature, affectionate, clinging, religious, was yet exceedingly excitable; and thus the more responsibility rested on those who, knowing those qualities, made use of their superior position, and of their education, and of the money which they wrung from the hard earnings of the poor, to excite them to do deeds which were foreign to their nature and dishonouring to the Irish character.

MR. PLUNKET said, he would not stand more than a short time between the House and the eloquent speech which they would, no doubt, soon hear from the hon. and learned Member for Meath (Mr. A. M. Sullivan). But, under all the circumstances of the case, representing as he did classes in Ireland who had not many to speak for them in that Assembly, he was sure the House would kindly indulge him for a brief space while he offered some observations in a spirit, he was sorry to say, less complimentary on the whole to the Bill under discussion than previous speeches which had been delivered that evening. The hon. Member for the County Cork (Mr. Shaw), in his conciliatory and discreet address, had invited all Irish Members, of whatever Party, to join with him in facilitating the passing of that measure, which seemed to him calculated to confer a great advantage on their common country, and to effect a final settlement. If he could join with the hon. Member in that opinion, he should indeed be prepared to make great efforts for so high a purpose; but, unfortunately, he could not agree with him. Nor was it easy for one placed as he was to even approach the treatment of this subject with perfect calmness. He could not forget what had happened during the last 12 months. He could not forget that little more than a year ago there was in Ireland comparative tranquillity, although that unhappy country, and the poor people there, were afflicted by severe distress. Twelve months had passed away; and now, in the midst of a good season, there was something, even at this day, approaching civil war in Ireland. Believing, as he did, that however excellent the intentions of the Government, it was to their conduct that must be attributed the excesses which had disgraced Ireland—to their weakness, to the faults of their Administration, that it was their “hit-him-and-hold-him” policy which had exasperated and excited the Irish people—believing all that, he said, when he was called upon calmly to discuss the Bill now offered to them for their acceptance, it was not an invitation easy to accept. Furthermore, he believed that there were within the Bill propositions and principles which were vicious in themselves, and disastrous in their consequences to those whom he was sent there to represent; and he was convinced that their ultimate results must prove injurious even to the tenantry themselves. It was presented to them in this guise — “Something must be done; will you accept the responsibility of rejecting this measure?” So that one felt it was almost equally dangerous to support the Bill or oppose it, to accept or reject it. Besides these difficulties, this measure was proposed at a time when whatever was done would confer the least advantages on the people, who were not in a frame of mind and temper to receive the Bill in that spirit in which, no doubt, it was brought forward by the Government. Nevertheless, he admitted the gravity of the crisis, and he should endeavour, as far as in him lay, to approach it in no partizan or factious spirit; it was, therefore, to him a great satisfaction that there was a very considerable portion of the Bill which he, for one, could heartily support. In the first place, as regarded the scheme for the creation of peasant proprietors. He had always been a supporter of that policy. He believed that it would give solidity and steadiness to society in Ireland

if there were an increase of yeoman farmers. There were, of course, considerable difficulties in the way. One great advantage which he had always seen in the proposal was that it would come into operation at the time when estates were about to be sold. He did not mean to say that this was an experiment likely to turn out well in every case. It was, however, just at the moment when properties were changing hands that the scheme, which was so honourably connected with the name of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in the Act of 1870, and which was now introduced somewhat altered into the present Bill, would come into operation; and he thought it was well worth while to run some risk to try such an experiment at such a time as that. He thought that advantages were now offered for doing so which certainly had not arisen before; for when an estate came into the market they might find a great many tenants who were solvent and capable in every way of becoming yeoman farmers, but they would find also a certain number of weaker brethren—tenants too poor to enable them to achieve that position. The latter class could not be and ought not to be converted into peasant proprietors. But under the Bill, as he understood it, the same Commissioners who were to have charge of this business of creating peasant proprietors were also to have under their charge opportunities for carrying out a great scheme of emigration. Now, if they could induce a certain number of families representing these very small holdings to emigrate, they would not only relieve the estate from overcrowding, but they would be able to add the farms of those who went to the holdings of those who remained, and thus enable the latter to become solvent yeoman farmers. He thought that would be a great advantage, and he rejoiced exceedingly to know that the opposition which had been raised against emigration seemed to be fading away. He fully respected the objections entertained by some to emigration under the old system, because if individuals went from Ireland to America they often got lost in the great cities, and it was natural that those charged with their morals at home felt strongly on this point. Also, no doubt, the circumstances under which that emigration was conducted were very painful in the mere process of transferring people from Ireland to America. But under this Bill he hoped it would be very different. They ought to be enabled to take with them into their new homes the habits and practices of their old homes. With respect to emigration, he agreed with what had fallen from his hon. Friend that it was the only means of dealing with that deep-seated evil which had been described by one of the witnesses examined by the Bessborough Commission as the "cancer of disaffection in Ireland." It was in those districts along the seaboard of the Atlantic where the people were crowded together in the most wretched circumstances of poverty and destitution that the agitation was first begun—rather more than a year ago—and there it grew and spread with the greatest vigour. He was sure that House was well acquainted with the descriptions given of the miserable state of the Irish people who were massed along the West, North-West, and South-West of Ireland. But, no matter how vividly those things were described, unless figures were given, Englishmen felt, he was afraid, a certain degree of suspicion with regard to the eloquent statements made by his countrymen, and, therefore, he had been at the pains of putting together a few figures which, he thought, would a little astonish the House. He would take the County Mayo, whose people he knew well. In ordinary times they were a light-hearted, easy-going people, and wonderfully patient considering their hard lot. He wished to compare for a few minutes the state of society in Mayo with the state of things in Armagh. He took these two counties, because in both there was an immense number of small holdings, the percentage in Armagh being even greater than that in Mayo. In the former the percentage was 67·8; in Mayo, 57·4. Yet in one county there was comparative prosperity, in the other great distress. He wished to call attention to this and other special circumstances, because the first idea people had was that if the Land Laws only were altered all would be well. But the House would now see that a mere change in the Land Laws would not have produced the comfort and contentment which were to be found in the one case and not in the other. In Armagh the percentage of waste land was 10·6, and in Mayo 46 of the whole land of the county. In Armagh the average valuation per acre was 26s. 9d.; in Mayo, 4s. 9d.; the percentage of families engaged in agricultural pursuits was, in Armagh, 55; in Mayo, 78. In Armagh the percentage of those who could neither read nor write was 30·4; in Mayo, 57·4. Not only that, but in Mayo there was a large proportion of migratory labourers who were in the habit of going across the Channel to seek work in England, and whose return empty-handed last autumn had added much to the discontent of their districts. If those people emigrated to America, and especially under the scheme of the Bill to Canada, they might exchange their miserable condition for one of happiness and prosperity. With the permission of the House, he would read a passage from a letter from Lord Dufferin, in which the noble Lord spoke of having seen—

“An immeasurable sea of corn, clothing with its golden expanse what two years before had been a desolate prairie—the home of the lynx and the jackal—simply through the exertions of a small Russian colony that had run up their shanties in that favoured land. In the neighbourhood,” his Lordship said, “was an Irish settlement, containing many descendants of the cottier peasantry, who had fled from the Famine of 1846, now converted into happy, loyal, and contented yeomen. Instinctively my mind reverted to the sights it had seen in Mayo, Connemara, and Galway in 1848. Strange to say, the appearance of the horizon was in each case identical. Its verge stood out against the setting sun like the teeth of a saw; but in Ireland this impression was produced by the gable ends of deserted cottages, in Manitoba by the long line of corn-stacks which sheltered every homestead.”

It would be a wrong and cruel thing to persuade people in such a condition to stay at home instead of emigrating, so as to realize for themselves the prosperity which he had described. Therefore, so far as that part of the proposal was concerned, he was able to give it his most entire sympathy. As to reclamation, he would be glad to see as much of it as was possible. His only fear was that it would be impossible to carry it out to any great extent with success. No doubt, there was plenty of waste land in the country; but a great deal of it was absolutely incapable of reclamation—large tracts of stony waste was impossible to cultivate as would be the pavement of London. But, as far as it was possible to reclaim those lands by any scheme, by all means let the Government encourage it. In the parts of the Bill of which he had been speaking, he had very little to find fault with. But, turning from those proposals which the Secretary for India had spoken of as the proposals which were intended to bring about the permanent amelioration of the country, to those which had been described as intended to bridge over the interval between the old state of the things and the new, he was sorry to say, that giving to those parts of the Bill the best attention he could, he found great difficulty in understanding them; but, as far as he did understand them, he considered that they contained principles which were vicious in their character, and would be fatal in their consequence. With the permission of the House, he would make a few observations upon them. His chief object was to fix the attention of the House upon one single clause—he might say a single line of the Bill. He alluded, of course, to the proposal for fixing fair rents, and what he wanted was to obtain, if possible, a clear statement of the meaning of that proposal. Had such a statement been forthcoming sooner much time would have been saved. Various views of the construction to be put upon the clause had been suggested, and it was impossible that all of them could be right. He hoped, therefore, that the difficulty would be clearly explained away before the end of that Sitting. The construction which he put upon the clause was the same as that propounded by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson). His right hon. and learned Colleague had attached a definite meaning to the clause, and challenged contradiction, and no contradiction had been offered. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. Law) dissented.] He was perfectly aware that the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had said that the proposal was not a proposal to reduce the existing rents by one-third. But that was not the meaning which his right hon. and learned Friend had attached to it. His right hon. and learned Friend's construction of the clause was that “the tenant would be at once credited as if he had paid a fine to the landlord for a diminution of the fair rent to the extent of one-third.” With regard to the question of fair rent, he would like to know how it was to be ascertained? He would pass by the proposed mode of ascertaining the rent on estates where the Ulster Custom, or similar usages, existed; though even in those cases he did not understand how the clause could be enforced without the tenant right, in many instances, eating up the rent altogether. He wished to draw particular attention to that which was provided in the case of estates on which there was no Ulster Custom. The clause said—

“The tenant's interest is to be estimated with reference to the scale of compensation for disturbance by this Act provided.”

The scale of compensation for disturbance was provided to compensate the loss sustained by a tenant who had actually been ejected capriciously from his holding. This Bill, however, said that that scale was to be applied for measuring the rent of a tenant who had not been evicted, was not about to be evicted, and who, once this Bill became law, could never be evicted. Surely there was no connection between two such cases. The only explanation that he could give of this position was by following up an illustration which was used by Lord Sherbrooke in the debate on the Land Bill of 1870. The noble Lord, who then sat in the House of Commons, compared this compensation for disturbance to damages in an action for breach of promise of marriage. Let them assume that by Act of Parliament it had been provided that in the case of a breach the damages should be assessed up to a third of the man's property; he then asked the House to imagine that by another Bill it should be proposed that, in the case of no breach being committed, but, on the contrary, at the moment when the marriage was about to be solemnized, the lady would have a right to demand that a third of her husband's property should be settled upon her. He could not anticipate the explanation that would be offered; but he thought he had a right seriously to ask how it was that the compensation for disturbance was taken as the measure of the tenant's right? In introducing the Bill, the Prime Minister said that what the tenant had a right to assign according to the present law was not worth giving or receiving; and then proceeded to recite the scale of compensation for disturbance, observing that under the Act of 1870 the tenant right had become something sensible. He wanted to know whether by the Act of 1870 the tenants acquired any right of which they could dispose by sale? No doubt, a right could be created by an Act of Parliament; but he could not admit that it existed at the present time, nor could it even in theory be supposed to exist unless there was admitted to be a joint property in the land enjoyed by both the landlord, who had bought or inherited the property, and the tenant who held the land by reason of the payment of rent. Surely a scale of compensation for the present landowners must be fixed if the matter was to be settled by Act of Parliament. No one would contend that the right existed before the Act of 1870, nor would anyone hold that the right was not carefully excluded from the clauses of that Bill. He repeated that he could not understand how a man could be enabled to transfer by sale any part of another man's property, that man being his landlord, unless it was done under an Act which gave tenants joint property with their landlords; and he could not take that as being in any way a part of the provisions of the Act of 1870. Mr. Butt, writing in his admirable treatise on this subject, said—

“These illustrations appear clearly to show that any principle of measurement which would directly or indirectly introduce into the estimate any consideration of the interest which the tenant had in his holding when served with notice to quit, would be opposed to the whole principle on which the Act is framed. This objection is fatal to any suggestion of measuring the compensation by any analogy or reference to the price which, before his eviction, he could have obtained for his tenant right or goodwill.”

So when Mr. Butt was framing clauses for his tenant right Bill, he said nothing about this supposed tenant right created by the clauses with respect to compensation for disturbance. In the Land Bills introduced in 1877 and 1878, Mr. Butt said a fair rent was—

“That which a solvent and responsible tenant could afford to pay fairly and without collusion for the premises, after deducting from such rent the addition to the letting value of the premises by any improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors, in respect of which the tenant on quitting his farm would be entitled to compensation for his improvements under the provisions of the Land Act.”

Another question which he would like to ask was this—Was it not necessary for the Court, if it was to have reference to the scale of compensation for disturbance at all, to have reference to the maximum of the scale? As far as he understood, the Court could regard nothing else. He could not understand on what consideration the Court could fix, so to speak, on any rung of the ladder of compensation but the highest. When an eviction had under the Act of 1870 actually taken place, all the circumstances which made up the loss could be realized by the Court; but this was a case in which there was no eviction. Well, then, was the maximum of the scale to be taken; and, if not, why not? What were to be the considerations for cutting down the maximum of the scale? The hon. and learned Member for Meath (Mr. Sullivan) had said in his pamphlet explaining the Bill that if a man had been a long time in a holding that would make a difference. That might be a good reason for giving him compensation for disturbance; but the landlord was not going to turn him out; if he went out it would be of his own free will. Suppose, in the illustration he had given before, the lady were to say, "I have so long kept company with this gentleman that my feelings are greatly lacerated, and I claim the highest damages to soothe my anguish." That would be all very well if the gentleman were leaving her; but, according to the plan of this Bill, it was the lady who was leaving him—and leaving the home of their married life all the poorer by taking this compensation away. But the proposal had been defended on a different ground. The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster), when speaking to his constituents at Bradford the night before, said that outside Ulster there was a tenant right which, though not acknowledged by law, had been acknowledged by custom, by traditional sentiment, and by good landlords. The impression in the mind of the Chief Secretary derived from the Report of the Bessborough Commission was that in certain parts of the country, and in certain circumstances, there was that traditional sentiment. But surely they were not going to base the settlement of the Land Question in Ireland on traditional sentiment. That would be rather a weak foundation. There was, he believed, in some islands in the Pacific Ocean a traditional sentiment in favour of cannibalism where the flesh hunger was very strong, but that was no reason for giving such a custom the force of law. The right hon. Gentleman said that good landlords allowed the custom. In certain cases, no doubt, landlords in Ireland kept their rents very low; but he by no means admitted that in anything like a majority of cases they admitted tenant right, even if they kept their rents considerably below the highest market price. And now it was proposed to place those men under an obligation to allow the tenant a share in their landlord's property equal to seven years' rent. Why should such an obligation be imposed? In the case of landlords who had always charged a low rent it might be asked why they had never charged more? The answer was that they wanted from their tenants gratitude for favours past, certainly—perhaps, too, for favours to come—because it was only by such means and such influence that the tenants could be induced to do what was best for themselves, as well as the interests of the landlords. Only by such pressure could subdivision and bad farming be prevented. For such and similar reasons they had often wiped off arrears of rent, rather than allow tenant right to grow on their property. And for mere commercial reasons, also, many landlords had kept their rents low, with the idea that after a long period of friendly relations with their tenantry, they might reach a better time when, as the country advanced, it would be possible to ask a full and fair rent for their land just as men did in England. He wanted to know if it was the intention of the Government to take advantage of these feelings of kindness and forbearance on the part of the landlord, in order to turn them into a saleable commodity, subtracting it from the saleable interest of the landlord? He would refer to one point more, and one only. He would ask where the idea of tenant right came from, and where it was germinated? As he understood it, it arose in this way. Many hon. Members would remember that when the Land Act of 1870 was passing through Parliament, many schemes were proposed which had for their object to apply the Ulster tenant right to the rest of Ireland. It was in an Amendment proposed by the late Sir John Gray that a suggestion first appeared which proposed that in parts of Ireland where there was no Ulster or corresponding custom, and where the tenant was not able to pay all the sum for his holding, he might pay a part of it, and add any such considerations as he could show in the way of improvements where executed by him, or which he undertook to execute. But there was at first no reference to any right arising out of the claim for compensation for disturbance under the 3rd clause of the Land Act. That was suggested to the authors of the Longfield scheme by the hon. and learned Member for Meath (Mr. Sullivan), and that was the germ of the idea which was now to be used for the purpose of creating a tenant right over a great part of Ireland where no such custom had hitherto prevailed. He must thank the House for patiently hearing his attempt to place the arguments against the Bill in a popular form; but he believed he had started objections which, if fully and fairly answered, would give more information to the House than they had at present. What was the difficulty which lay in the way of extending to other parts of Ireland the Ulster tenant right when it was attempted to introduce it as a rival plan to that of the Land Act of 1870? It was again and again suggested—indeed, it was on such an alternative scheme, if he remembered rightly, that the division on the second reading of the Land Bill was taken. The late Sir John Gray took a division, he believed, on that very point. But what was the difficulty which lay in the way of extending the Ulster tenant right to the rest of Ireland? Mr. Chichester Fortescue had said—

“In the next place, the Ulster tenants who possess these claims had actually paid sums of money for the enjoyment of their holdings on entering into possession. What I wish to suggest for consideration is whether it is possible, by the mere words of a statute, and by the fiat of Parliament, to create such a custom as this? For instance, you can give a tenant who has paid a large sum of money upon entering his holding a similar claim upon leaving it, and we do this whenever the case arises all over Ireland. But can you give a tenant who has paid nothing upon entering his holding the same claim as you give to a tenant who has paid a large sum of money?”

And the Prime Minister spoke to the same effect. The present measure purported to be founded upon the Ulster Custom; but the fact was that, unfortunately, the rest of Ireland was not so wealthy as Ulster, and there were a multitude of tenants who might not be able to give any valuable consideration for that joint share in the future partnership, which was the true character of the custom which the Bill was about to make. They had nothing to give. The Ulster tenant gave, or had given, money. The tenant in the South might give money, if he had it, or he might make it up by improvements which he had himself put on the land; but if he had neither money nor improvements, the difficulty arose—What was he to sell under the clause for free sale? The Prime Minister, in his opening statement, said that the assumption underlying all his argument was that the tenant should have something to sell. But what was it that the tenant had in all cases to sell? Of course, Parliament, if it liked, might take from the Irish landlords a certain proportion of the property which was theirs, and confer it on the tenants; but if they did that, the landlords must be compensated. That was quite clear. If that was to be the intention and principle of that Bill, let it be acknowledged openly and fairly; let it be done in such a way that the landlords might have an opportunity of submitting to that House and to the people of England their claims for compensation. He thanked the House exceedingly for their attention. He was afraid he had taken longer than he ought; but the Bill deserved, and would no doubt receive, full explanation on the points he had raised. If those points were clearly explained by the Government, he believed it would greatly facilitate the progress of the measure.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he was sorry if, just now, he appeared to stand between the House and the right hon. and learned Gentleman, who had contributed to the debate a speech marked by his usual ability and by more than his wonted moderation. He, however, was desirous of offering a few words, chiefly in reply to some observations of the hon. Member for Galway County (Mr. Mitchell Henry), who had now gone to seek that repose which many hon. Members were seeking during the earlier portion of his address. It was only when the hon. Gentleman turned from a really sensible and practical discussion of the Bill to an attack upon his fellow-countrymen that the House waked up; and of four hon. Gentleman who were slumbering on the Bench before him, only one—the hon. and learned Member for Donegal—remained impervious to that portion of the speech. It was very acceptable to many hon. Members to find the debate interrupted and precious time wasted by a swinging attack on the Land League and its Representatives in that House. But he should have expected that the hon. Member for Galway County (Mr. Mitchell Henry) would have remembered two things on that subject—first, that he was addressing an audience who, not from any wilful prejudice or love of injustice, but from very natural and easily-understood proclivities, would cheer to the echo any statement representing in the most damaging light the words and actions of his hon. Friends around him. Neither in this House nor out of it had he (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) ever attempted to justify all that had been said and done in the name of the Irish National Land League. He could not do it, any more than he could set himself to vindicate the action or the language of some men who seemed bereft almost of reason by wrong and outrage and despair. That agitation, which to many hon. Gentlemen representing English counties seemed so wicked and so censurable, he had never looked upon at all as an ordinary political movement. He regarded it rather as an angry, maddened uprising of the people, turning at last, after long years of bitter suffering and grievous wrong. His hon. Friend was too accurate a student of European history to deny this fact—that never in any country had a large population taken a course like that, although it might result in the most beneficent circumstances, without deplorable scenes, language to be reprobated, and actions to be regretted. He advised his hon. Friend to take a larger and a broader view of what was now passing in Ireland, and to hope with him (Mr. Sullivan)—while regarding unfavourably much that had passed in that country, but regarding it more as a matter of misfortune than of accusation against men who had at last taken into their own rude and rough and passionate hands the duty of setting themselves right. He knew his hon. Friend too well not to know that underneath his occasional ebullitions of warm temper there existed a kindly nature and a warm heart; and he would invite his hon. Friend to ask himself this question, Where would that people be to-day but for the Land League—where would the Land Question be in this House but for the action of the knot of men whom his hon. Friend condemned? He had the pleasure of supporting his hon. Friend in 1874, 1875, and 1876, in those debates when his hon. Friend propounded to deaf ears a more moderate proposition than the Bill now before the House; and he would only ask, if calm reason and fair argument could prevail with all this passion in Ireland, why did it not prevail at that period? But inasmuch as the course which they then took availed them nothing, could they wonder that the people of Ireland should at last have risen in the manner they had done, and brought the land agitation to the front of the British nation? However, he hoped that, notwithstanding the very provocative nature of the speech of his hon. Friend, that the debate would be conducted to its close without recriminations. Up to the present, beginning with the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson), the debate had been conducted with a moderation and fairness that never could have been apprehended, considering how combustible a subject they had had to discuss. When he recollected the passions inflamed in his own country, the deep pecuniary interests involved, not only in Ireland but here, and the natural prejudices of classes in this country who were unable to comprehend the question as it should be studied in Ireland, he confessed himself astonished at the spirit, the fair spirit on the whole, in which the debate had been conducted. He reminded the House that no one who had spoken upon this subject, either inside that House or out of it—although the Bill had been severely attacked from the side of the hon. Member for Galway County (Mr. Mitchell Henry), and from the side of the Opposition Bench—had attempted to say that nothing should be done in this matter. Let hon. Members realize the fact that the question had to do with the actual practical politics of the hour—with the circumstances around them—and that it had become a necessity for Her Majesty's Government to come forward with some proposition for settling the terrible problem that had so long decimated Ireland. There were three ways of solving it. First, there was the plan of freedom of contract, as it was called. Now, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) cheered that observation, and approved of freedom of contract—that was to say, that the landlord and tenant should be left face to face to make the best terms they could one with another, no law intervening. Another proposition was the compulsory expropriation of all landlords—sweeping landlordism away as an institution of the country. That, he said, was the demand of a large portion—of the immense majority—of the people of Ireland that day. Her Majesty's Government seemed to think it possible to find a middle course between these two, and brought forward a Bill which avoided compulsory expropriation, but did not subscribe to the doctrine of freedom of contract between landlord and tenant. As to freedom of contract, he could assure his hon. and learned Friend that his brother Conservatives from Ireland had long since given up all idea of establishing the latter, and that it was all too late for Conservative Gentlemen in that House to start that doctrine. Those hon. Gentlemen came there, microscope in hand, so to speak, and examined the provisions of this Bill from the standpoint of freedom of contract, and upon which theme they were ready to say many witty things. But there was no freedom of contract relating to land recognized by the statutes; and he repeated, they spoke too late, because, so long ago as 1845, Lord Stanley was the first in that House to make a proposition which had led on to the position in which they now stood with regard to the Irish Land Question. He asked those hon. Members who came forward with the freedom of contract proposition now to study what had been done in the Land Question since 1835, and a very few hours' study in the Library would show them that freedom of contract had gone beyond recall. In 1845, which was after the Devon Commission, Lord Stanley proposed for the first time in that House that a public functionary should intervene between the weak and the strong—between the landlord and tenant in Ireland—and his plan was that there should be a State Commissioner to judge of and to authorize improvements effected by the tenant, so that the tenant might be paid for the improvements effected on his farm, if evicted, and on the declaration of the Commissioner that those improvements had been wise and necessary. He asked would hon. Gentlemen accept that proposition now? Why, they all advocated it to-day; but when the proposition of Lord Stanley was made they opposed it in a body, the opposition being led by the Marquess of Clanricarde and Lord Londonderry. A Petition was signed against it as being Communistic and confiscatory by a long list of noble Lords, the Predecessors of those who last year threw out the Compensation for Disturbance Bill. He appealed to his hon. Friend to recollect that if the abolition of landlordism was asked for to-day, the blame lay with that class who resisted in former times every humble effort at reform, cried out "Communism!" when there was no Communism; and who now cried "Wolf, wolf!" when nobody would help them. Again, on the 11th June, 1846, Lord Lincoln, then Chief Secretary for Ireland, brought in an almost similar proposition to that of Lord Stanley. He would remind the occupants of the Front Opposition Bench that he was now quoting the acts of Conservative Statesmen, and that when they talked of objecting to the setting up of a tribunal between the landlord and the tenant, their own Party had given up the question. Lord Lincoln's proposition was that an assistant barrister should take the place of the State functionary. But the Bill was opposed in both Houses of Parliament by the Representatives of the Irish landlords, who were only too successful by means of the cry of Communism and confiscation in carrying with them the vast majority in that House against the demands of simple justice. Coming now to the proposition of the Government, he desired to say that he had never known a public measure of the same magnitude so completely mis-read and so largely misrepresented by two opposing classes. Anyone reading the letters of noble Lords and listening to the sincere speeches of his hon. Friends from Ireland might exclaim, with Pilate—"What is truth?" The main principle of the Bill—for they were really upon the question of the second reading and not in Committee—was that an equitable tribunal should be established in Ireland to stand between the weak and the strong; to do equity between landlord and tenant. And if the tribunal or tribunals were such as would command the confidence of the people of Ireland, instead of being as they were universally reprobated, he believed, in his soul, that this Bill, with the emendations it was likely to receive in Committee, would, in the hands of such tribunals, change the whole surface of Irish society. The practice with regard to the Government proposition was to treat what was possible under the Bill as actual occurrences. For instance, his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had told the House that because tenant right in Ulster was sometimes bought up to 28 years' purchase, 28 years' purchase would necessarily be allowed in estimating the value of the tenancy under this Bill. On the other hand, some of his hon. Friends opposite said that under it nothing was to be had except by means of a law-suit. Suppose the case of a Bill to confer trial by jury upon any country; would it not be a monstrous argument to urge against it, that a person might be charged by another, compelled to go into Court and stand his trial, and absolutely convicted by 12 men, although innocent of the charge? Any man who sought to have rights conferred upon him by law, must, of course, take his chance of having those legal rights contested. This system of treating possibilities as actualities had been carried to an unwarrantable extent in criticizing the Bill before the House. The junior Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) had reverted to one of the errors furnished by the speech of his Colleague. He had made a calculation to show that the landlords would be robbed. He (Mr. Sullivan) had seen something of this kind in the public Press; and hon. Members, he believed, had also heard something in that House of the millions of money which the Bill was to transfer from the pockets of the landlords to those of the tenants. One might say, with the character in The Vicar of Wakefield—"I think I have heard all that before." Ingenious calculations had been put forward to show that £120,000,000 were to be carried from the pockets of the Irish landlords to the pockets of the Irish tenants by the Irish Land Act of 1870. Now, he had asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland at the opening of the debate

if he could furnish a Return showing exactly what had been the actual facts, so that the House might contrast with them the calculations of noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen. The right hon. Gentleman was not able to furnish the Return; but, after many days' search, he (Mr. Sullivan) had obtained the figures. The calculation at the time of passing the Act of 1870 was that £120,000,000 would be transferred from the landlords to the tenants—£6,000,000 a-year—or a reduction in the value of landed property to the extent of one-third. Those calculations were made upon the assumption that, at a low average, every one of the 600,000 tenants in Ireland would obtain from the Court £100 for improvements, and £100 for disturbance. He asked if Irish landed property had come down in value after the passing of the Act of 1870? They had a Return for the years 1871, 1872, 1873, included in a Blue Book, without any totals, from which it was impossible to get any information; but he had obtained the totals for every county in Ireland of the number of cases in which claims had been made for improvements and disturbance, together with the amounts decreed during that period. There were, in all, 1,539 cases brought before the Land Courts; the total yearly average number was 513, and the average for every county was just 16 cases in the year. Now, the highest number of claims sent in was from the county of Ulster; the lowest from Kilkenny, which sent six; and the total amount which might have been awarded by the Land Court to the tenants was £461,149. According to the calculations of 1870, all that was possible or sure to be awarded. In the present case, also, with the senior Member for the University of Dublin, the maximum of possibility was to him the minimum of actuality. Well, the tenants might have claimed from the Land Courts under the Act of 1870, £461,149; but how much did they get?—£41,640. The tenants who came into the Land Court, instead of obtaining £200 each, obtained an average of only £27 5s. each. Therefore, he put it to the House, whether, in that respect, the Act had not been a mockery, a delusion, and a snare, because the average sum awarded had not even paid the law costs of the wretched tenants? He knew very well that not one of these cases could have been liti-

gated in the Court for £27 5s.—he knew that twice £27 5s. would not pay the wretched tenant's costs. The difference between the costs as taxed and paid must be taken into account in the average, and that £27 5s. sent every tenant out of Court bitterly bewailing the day he had trusted to it. So much for the dreadful calculation of the Front Opposition Bench. But they had treated the House to another—and he had heard it to-night—he referred to the famous conundrum of the Conservatives—"If the property is not to come out of the landlord's pocket, where is it to come from?" Clause 7 had been the chief bone of contention. The right hon. and learned Member who had just sat down (Mr. Plunket) had been as kind and complimentary to him (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) as he was usually genial and kind to them all, and had done him the honour to quote from a pamphlet he had published, giving what had seemed to him an analyzation of the proposals of the Bill, and to allude to what he had given as an example of the way Clause 7 would work. He would undertake to answer to the best of his ability, clearly, the points which the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his much respected Colleague (Mr. Gibson) had put forward on Clause 7. The hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw) said that under Clause 7 rents would be raised in Ireland. Now, whilst some rents would be cut down, any rent which was under a fair rent would be raised to a fair rent by Clause 7. Any rent which was a rent on which a tenant was charged for his own outlay or interest in the farm would be cut down. He would show how that would be done. Let them take the case of a farm let by a fair, kindly-disposed, live-and-let-live landlord for £100 a-year, yet which, by reason of the tenant's interest, would fetch in the public market, to-morrow, £150—and at a fair price, £150. There were numbers of such farmers in Ireland, for, thank God, there were some good landlords there, though they were, alas! too few. On this point he did not wish to be invidious; but he saw a noble Member of the Government on the Treasury Bench at this moment, on the Irish estates of whose father, he thought, he could find hundreds of tenants who held their farms at fair rents. Take such a case as that he was describing. Here was a farm let for £100, which, if bid for in the market to-morrow, would fetch £150—nay, £160. The Land Court, under Clause 7, must first estimate what was the fair letting value of this farm as it stood, adding together the two amounts—the amount of the landlord's fair interest in the farm, and the amount of the tenant's fair interest. The sum of these two amounts added together would be the fair rent of the farm to an outsider or an incoming tenant. From the sum of these two amounts they would simply take what belonged to the tenant and what belonged to the landlord. He would give an illustration, though he knew how weary the House would be, especially at this hour of the night (12.45 a.m.), of figures. A farm for which £150 would be given was let at £100. The Land Court would be entitled to say—"Under Clause 7, where there are unexhausted and permanent improvements of the value of £250 on a farm like this, the tenant, by reason of the land having been in the occupation of his ancestors and himself for 100 or 200 years, is entitled to another £250 as good will for the occupancy of the farm." That would make £500, and 5 per cent on that would come to £25, which, being deducted from the £150, would leave £125 as a fair rent for the occupying tenant, whereas £150 would be a fair rent for the incoming tenant, because he would have to pay both the interest of the landlord and the interest of the tenant. In this case the tenant would have his rent raised by £25 a-year under Clause 7, because the land was owned by a live-and-let-live landlord, who only asked a small rent. But then take the case—and there were, unfortunately, ten of them for one of those he had just quoted—where the landlord had screwed up the rent by racking and confiscatory additions, and the farm was let for £160. Everyone on the Front Opposition Bench knew that there were hundreds of such cases in Ireland—cases where the rents were over 60 per cent above Griffith's valuation—nay, was not the story common enough in every county in Ireland, "We are paying two Griffith's valuations?" Well, in the case of this rack-rented farm, the tribunal would say, as it said in the other case—"£150 would be a fair rent for even an incoming tenant to pay for this farm." The tenant had the

£25 interest, so they would say—"The rent of this farm shall be £125, in place of £160, to the remaining tenant." Thus it was that an over-rented—a dishonestly rented—farm would have its rental cut down by this equitable system; but every farm in Ireland which was held under what any equitable tribunal would declare to be an honest rent between man and man would be raised in its rental. He said to hon. Friends behind him who differed from him in regard to many parts of the Bill—he would implore them—never let it be said that the Irish tenant asked for a farthing more than justice, nor, not for any compromise, one penny less. A grievous error would be committed on the day when they allowed it to be supposed that the Irish tenant was not satisfied to allow an honest, equitable tribunal to determine whether his claim was fair or not. If hon. Members would not have that, what did they want? Why, they desired that the landlords should be allowed to charge a rent upon the tenants' own sweat, and upon their outlay on their farms. Look at the Blue Books bearing on this question; it was curious, but they would there find it on judicial authority related how this process had gone on in Ireland, how tenants had been charged rent for their own outlay on their own slavery. What could come of such a system as this but the thriftless, miserable, indolent, half-cultivation of Irish farms which rendered all Irish homesteads a mockery and a delusion to all good farmers? He would tell hon. Members that if they held homes like those of the unhappy Irish farmers, all spring and elasticity of nature would be destroyed in them, all hope of future prosperity, all incentive to future industry, would be taken from them, and they would go over their farms in the listless, broken-hearted, idle way that the humble tenants of Ireland did. And why? Because, as soon as they got their land into good cultivation—as soon as they had reclaimed their wild moor and bog-land—they would see the agent come down to "salt" it with rent, as they had heard the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) describe. The soil of Ireland had been sown with "salt" of this description, and they saw in the Ireland of to-day what fruit it had borne. Was it too late—was the Government too late with this, their last chance, of enabling the two classes, the tenants and the landlords, to live together in peace and friendliness? Were they, indeed, to be told that the hour had passed for compromise or reconciliation? He knew the tenants of Ireland said it was, and he indulged largely the feelings which had driven them to that ultimatum; but he appealed to-night, though with feeble voice, to the landlords of Ireland who had Representatives in the House. They were offered in this Bill one more chance, and he believed, in his soul, it would be the last. They were offered the choice between this measure and compulsory expropriation. A wiser measure was never devised than that which gave a chance of preserving Irish society as it existed at the present moment. He was not afraid to face the most severe measures for settling this matter, if they could be shown to be necessary. The saving of the people was with him supreme; but, until it was shown to be absolutely necessary to adopt severe measures, he would plead to the last hour for giving a chance to the landlords of Ireland to reconcile themselves with the people around them. He could not look forward with any feelings but those of sadness of heart to the pulling down, as he took it to be, of the social structure in their country which would be involved in the sudden compulsory expropriation of all landlords; but to that it must come, and to that the people were entitled to bring it, if measures of this kind met with unyielding resistance on the floor of the House of Commons from the Representatives of the Irish landlords. He would that anything that such an humble individual as himself could say could enlighten that class and the House generally as to the wealth of kindness, and affection, and trust, and confidence that they were spurning every day they kept themselves alienated from the people. There lived not on the earth a people more ready than the Irish—except in moments of maddened passion like the present, in which things were said and done that were to be regretted—to repay the kindness and confidence of the class above them, if that class would but be their protectors and their friends. He should watch the course taken by the Representatives of the Irish landlords on Monday night with the greatest anxiety. He did not agree with his hon. Friends who declared it to be their belief—although he did not quarrel with them for entertaining it—that the hour had struck for sweeping the landlord class, in its entirety, away; but if, on Monday night, this class made advances to the Irish people, even after all that had passed, after all these years of misfortune that the people had suffered, he did not see why they could not live in the future in peace and kindness together. If, however, they met this Bill in the spirit in which similar attempts had been met in the past—in the spirit in which the measure of 1870 was met—and if, the moment legislation took place, they set ingenious laws to work to see how they could filch from the tenantry the protection afforded them, the matter would not be settled, and the last chance of amicable settlement would be gone. For himself, he hoped his hon. Friends, who had been most kind to him in tolerating and taking in good part his difference of opinion with them in this matter, would allow him to say this—that if the measure were met by the Irish landlord class with a frank recognition of its necessity, and with a careful desire to work it in a friendly spirit—in a live-and-let-live spirit—and with an endeavour to import into it Amendments without which he believed in his soul it would be abortive, he knew of no measure in the whole of his experience, or in the whole of the records of the dismal history of their country, that would be more productive of beneficial results. He would not go into minute details, as he objected to make a Committee speech, having condemned it in others; but he would tell the Government, to-night, that unless they could deal with the question of the impending evictions, they would leave untouched a source of deplorable suffering and disaster. He spoke in no antagonism to the Bill. He was ready to give his heartiest efforts in support of the measure, even at the cost of temporary misunderstanding with his countrymen, if they got an undertaking from the Government that the necessary Amendments would be put into the Bill. The necessity of dealing with the impending evictions meant life or death. It was a question of the actual destruction of the homes of thousands of the peasantry, over whom there was now impending a fearful doom, if no protection was provided in the Bill because of the arrears that occurred during the two years of famine and exorbitant rents. The Bill, as it stood, would only enable the poor tenants to obtain sufficient money to pay the landlords the arrears of rent due, and would not extend protection to them—would not keep them in their humble homes. The only other suggestion he would venture to offer was with regard to the tribunal provided by the Bill. He would not say anything personally offensive, or reflecting on the County Court Judges; but he would say this—they were selected originally for such duties as the working of the Land Law, and the result was that the Bill of 1870, in spite of its good intentions, had led to nothing because of the tribunal that had to administer it; and he believed in his soul that if an angel came down from Heaven and drafted a Bill for the purpose of settling this difficult question and put it in the hands of the County Court Judges to administer it, it would become a failure and an abortion—a monument of Ministerial good intention and failure, like the Land Act of 1870. He had spoken in this debate under a deep and, he might sincerely say, a painful sense of the importance of the question. He believed on the Land Question he was the senior Member of the Irish Party in that House since the death of Mr. M'Carthy Downing—unless, indeed, it should be one of the Members for Waterford. He believed he was the only man in the Irish representation who belonged to the Tenant League of 1852, and he spoke of it with feelings of emotion, because he had been in all the struggles, and was acquainted with all the Bills and propositions which had been made on this difficult question. He admitted that some advance had been made since 1852. He conceded that, and would ask hon. Friends behind him to allow him to take this view, as one who had put some years of his life and of his effort into the settlement of this question of the protection of the Irish tenantry. He believed that if the Bill was amended in the way he had suggested, it would depend largely on the landed classes of Ireland whether it was a settlement of the question; and upon those classes he threw the responsibility. He believed the measure was destined to make a new Ireland across the Channel.

THE LATE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD, K.G.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

The Queen's Answer to the Address of Monday last reported by the Lord Steward, as follows :—

I HAVE received your Address praying that I will give directions that a monument be erected in the Collegiate Church of St. Peter, Westminster, to the memory of the late Right Hon. the Earl of Beaconsfield, K.G., with an inscription expressing the high sense entertained by the House of Lords of his rare and splendid gifts, and of his devoted labours in Parliament and in great offices of State, and assuring me that you will concur in giving effect to my directions; and I shall give directions in accordance with your Address."

STATE OF IRELAND—INTIMIDATION AND OUTRAGES.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON, in rising to call attention to the absence of any effectual check upon the continued intimidation of tenant farmers in Ireland, and to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether they were prepared to take any and what steps for the better protection of peaceably disposed subjects of Her Majesty? said, it was not his intention to invite any premature discussion on a measure which might hereafter be brought up for consideration in their Lordships' House. He would not allude to the unfortunate feeling which had existed for many months past between landlords and tenants in Ireland. That was sufficiently known; but, without mentioning names, he was about to bring under the notice of the House information on the subject of his Question which he had received from different localities in Ireland. Before doing so, he must direct attention to the fact that, for months past, there had grown up in Ireland a system of unwritten law, which was not the law of the land, but the dictates of which were more exactly carried out than were those of anything to be found on the Statute Book, and the agents of which were more vigilant and successful, because more active, than the legally constituted guardians of the public peace. The manner in which that agency was carried on was simple, but it was at the same time effectual. The Central Land League sent down word that in a particular locality a committee was to be formed. That committee was not representative, but was self-elected, and consisted of shopkeepers, a few farmers, a few men of no ostensible occupation, and sometimes one or two ministers of religion. This committee elected a president and promulgated their decrees, about which there was no secret whatever, and affected not only landowners but all classes of society. It was a mistake to suppose the Land Question was the only one with which these tribunals wished to deal. Their operations had a much wider ramification. No doubt, the primary object of the Land League committees was to prevent the farmers from paying a certain amount of rent, the proportion differing in different localities; and their next object was to prevent farms which became vacant from being taken up by either landlords or tenants for the purpose of cultivation. But they also prohibited the taking of grazing lands near the smaller country towns, and thereby injured the persons who would be occupiers even more than the owners, for the former could not get suitable grazing lands elsewhere. A short time ago an instance came under his observation in which an attempt was made to establish a butter farm, with the view of the production of better butter; but the tenant farmers were prevented from supplying cream to that farm. Then there was the case of a gentleman who commenced to thin his wood in order to sell fuel; but an edict at once went forth that no one should buy it of him, and as a consequence a large number of men who had been employed in cutting the wood were thrown out of employment. A small farmer who had been employed to sell the wood was warned that if he continued to do so his house would be burnt down. He need not say how stewards and bailiffs, as persons called on to protect their masters' property, were made victims to the discharge of their duty. Shopkeepers who ventured to sell goods to persons obnoxious to the committees were also placed under the ban of the organization. Artizans also suffered from it. At a meeting of the trades of Dublin, it was stated that such was the dearth of work last winter that there never had been so many artizans on the relief lists as during that season. To the labourers of Ireland the loss caused by the operations of the Land League might be put down, not at hundreds, but at hundreds of thousands of pounds. Medical practitioners had been threatened; and he heard of a case in which one of them was afraid to attend a patient to whom he had been called. A name had to be invented for one of the penalties imposed by the Land League, and it was now known as "Boycotting," which was sometimes carried to the extent of gross personal outrage. In the papers of that evening there was an account of an outrage in which one man was shot and another had his ears cut off. How were process-servers dealt with? At first, they were paid double fees for not serving the writs, and that was successful for some time; but when the process-servers had to proceed to make service, they were seized and perhaps thrown into a river. If after that they continued obstinate, they were in some instances subject to torture. Solicitors were deprived of their business if they did an act of professional duty of which the agitators did not approve; auctioneers were commanded not to sell; and so the game was carried on, one class of the community being persecuted after another, till no one knew how far he must consider himself denounced and what were the penalties which he might have to suffer. As to the unfortunate military and police called out to what was called protect the peace, they were stoned. Recently, a police barrack, in which some obnoxious person took refuge, was placed in a state of siege, and the siege was not raised until two companies of soldiers arrived at the spot. He had a letter from a competent authority, who said that in his part of the country every tenant farmer was at the mercy of any blackguard who might think fit to attack him. The writer said that civil war would be preferable to the existing state of things. That was strong language, but he believed it to be true. In no civilized country was it possible to find such a state of things, unless there was, as in the case of the Neapolitan Camorra, a secret sympathy between the outlaws and the higher classes of society. If it existed in America it would be put an end to in less than a month by the interposition of a Vigilance Committee; and he believed he was right in saying that some men applied to the Chief Secretary for power to enrol themselves in such a confederacy, but were dismissed with the assurance that such things were not lawful in this country. He wanted, then, to know what was going to be done? There were some things which he hoped would not be said in answer to him that evening. It would be no answer to say that the rejection by that House last Session of the Compensation for Disturbance Bill was the main cause of the existing state of things, because most of the cases to which he had referred occurred in districts which were not scheduled under that Bill. It would be no answer to say that Her Majesty's Government had introduced in "another place" a measure dealing with the land, because that Bill could not become law for two or three months in any case. Then he hoped it would not be said that Her Majesty's Government had done all they could have done for the repression of crime; because, if such a statement were made, he should be obliged to oppose to it a direct negative. He did not impute motives. It had been alleged that Her Majesty's Government had an arrière pensée which made them desire the agitation of the Land League as a means of advancing their own Bill. He did not believe that allegation; but it had been publicly made, and ought to be publicly denied by Her Majesty's Government. He believed that the errors of the Government were not of intention, but of judgment. When the Bill for the better protection of life and property was first announced there was an improvement, and it seemed as if happier days were about to arrive in Ireland; but the Land League soon noted the manner in which that Bill was put in force when it became law. The Government had, under that Act, been fiddling with the tail instead of striking at the head. The accounts of outrages which appeared in the public prints were no index to the entire number. He did not hesitate to say that three or four times the number of outrages in excess of those which met the public eye were actually committed. It had been stated in the public Press that a clergyman's house had been fired at; but the public had not been informed that on the same night the house of every farmer in the neighbourhood had been visited by men with blackened faces, who gave commands and warned the inmates that they must take the consequences if those injunctions were not obeyed. He had received an account of a man who was found on the ground with five men standing over him, and who was only saved by the interposition of the parish priest. There was an utter absence of power on the part of the constituted authority. To make the law respected the Government must enforce it; but they were not masters of the country. Those who got their behests carried out were the masters, and that was the point to which he wished more particularly to direct their Lordships' attention. It might be said that he ought to offer some suggestions. He would do so. He fully recognized the difficulties of the Government; but he thought that in some cases the police did not back up the magistrates, and in others the magistrates did not back up the police. Now, the stipendiary magistrates did not always reside in their own districts. He would suggest that they should do so, and as near the centres of their districts as possible. He would further suggest that the number of stipendiary magistrates should be increased ad hoc by investing special magistrates with the commission. There were numbers of half-pay officers who would be found ready to accept such temporary appointments. He would suggest that there should be a little more stimulus applied to the police in respect of arresting participators in riots, and a little more encouragement given to them when they made such arrests. He had been informed of an attack on a house next a police barrack made by persons whose faces were well known, and yet no arrest was made for that riot until several weeks after the occurrence. He assured their Lordships that he had not taken selected cases in the instances which he had mentioned to their Lordships; and when he made his appeal he did so to a Cabinet, two of whose Members had filled with credit to themselves and advantage to the country the Office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and three of whose Members had filled the post of Chief Secretary. Those Members of the Cabinet must know the danger of the combustion. He, therefore, appealed to the Government to see the law put in force, which they only could administer effectually, and break down the power of an organization which set at defiance the law, to protect persons from its crushing and grinding tyranny, and to put an end to a state of things which was intolerable, and to which, he feared, posterity would point as the shame and scandal of the age in which they lived.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY wished to know whether the Government would contradict the statement that had been recently made as to a compact or understanding between Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Parnell? It had been believed for some time before that statement was made that such was the case; and the Irish Executive had boasted that for the first time in the State trials the jury had not been packed, but one of the jurors had subscribed £10 to the Parnell Defence Fund, and, though this was known to the Law Officers of the Crown, he was not challenged. He also thought that Mr. John Bright, as a Member of the Government and a Quaker, and therefore specially pledged to secure peace amongst men, was in a large measure responsible for the existing state of affairs in having said and written things—as in his letter to Lord Carnarvon, in which he chucked at the fact that “many landlords were running for their lives”—which must have had the effect of leading the people of Ireland to suppose that the Government sympathized, not only with agitation, but with outrage? He thought the Government ought to give an explanation of that letter.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, he regarded the question before the House as one of deep importance. It was remarkable that on every other occasion when Parliament felt bound to pass an Act for the better protection of life and property in Ireland, that action was followed by a sensible and steady diminution of crime in that country; but the result of the passing of the recent Act of that kind had been exactly the contrary. The Returns presented to Parliament showed that in January last, before the passing of the Coercion Act, the reported number of outrages was 439; in February they had diminished to 170, and in March to 146; but they had risen in April, when the Act was in force, to 295, and there was no apparent diminution in their frequency at the present time. He quite agreed that after the passing of the Protection of Life and Property Bill, such a state of things was very significant and very alarming. It would be remembered that though the Government had announced remedial legislation, they declined to introduce it until the measure for the protection of life and property were disposed of. They did so on the very proper ground that Parliament should not legislate remedially under terrorism. The first effect of the Protection of Life and Property Act, however, as he had shown, vanished in less than three months, and the outrages increased by 100 per cent. Now, that was a fact to which the attention of the Government ought earnestly to be called. No doubt, his noble Friend (Viscount Midleton) had shown the immediate cause of the outrages in Ireland; but he would venture to point out another reason. The public were told by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant that the Act for the Better Protection of Life and Property was one to put down terrorism by terror. The right hon. Gentleman said it would put down by terror the village ruffians. He asked their Lordships whether effect had been given to that statement? He did not impute any unworthy motive to the Government. He thought their fault was an error of judgment—of kindness amounting to weakness. Their system was one of kicks and kisses. The coercion had been of so mild, so velvety a character, that it almost made agitators seek the shelter of prisons in which they were so well provided for. The first Return of arrests under the Act of 1879 was nine; the first under the Act of the present Session was 35; but more persons had been arrested since. Under the mild prison rules and regulations applied to the Land League prisoners, these persons were allowed to enjoy exercise together within the prison walls. Then they had six hours' communication at other times of the day. Looking at the character of those prisoners—and they must be of notorious bad character, or they would not have been arrested—it was a great mistake to put them together in one prison. They had all the comforts of a Fenian Club; and now that they had got their Chief (Mr. John Dillon) with them, it might be expected that they would hatch future conspiracies to the sore detriment and misfortune of the country. He must say that the adoption of such rules, relaxing prison discipline to such an extent as they had, was a great mistake on the part of the Government. The ramifications of this Land League conspiracy were almost universal; and who could doubt that there were out of prison persons just as guilty as those who were already in prison. Since the passing of the Act there had been a number of Land League meetings in various parts of the country. If it were necessary to strike terror into those people, why had not the Government at one stroke swept into prison a large number of the people who acted as organizers at these Land League assemblages as soon as they got the requisite information, which, as the Executive, they ought to have been in possession of? This pointed to an important consideration, with regard to the question of the supply of information—was it adequate, as obtained from the constabulary, and from the resident magistrates, to enable the Government to put the law into force? It had been whispered—he did not know with how much accuracy—that that supply was lamentably deficient, and that the deficiency was causing anxiety and surprise to the authorities in Dublin. During the time he was Viceroy the Land League had not reached the degree of importance to which it had since attained; but he believed the noble Viscount (Viscount Midleton) had, if anything, understated its danger; and he believed that nothing really effectual would have been accomplished till there was an Act passed against the existence of the Land League. He wished to ask, what had the Government done with regard to the Land League? He thought they were bound to give some explanations to their Lordships' House on that subject. It was true that some time ago the Government instituted a prosecution in a manner which was even high-handed. The police entered a room in Limerick, and arrested members of the Land League therein assembled. He believed the same thing was done at Tralee. Well, the men arrested at Limerick were conveyed to gaol, and the magistrates regarded the offence charged against them as so serious that they refused to admit them to bail, and subsequently their friends had to make an application for bail in a Superior Court. What had become of that prosecution? No doubt, such a prosecution must have a salutary effect. The audacity of the people who formed themselves into land tribunals was without bounds; and he knew a case in which men had been summoned to a Land League Court for attending a sale of cattle by auction, and not allowed to go until they had pledged themselves not to attend another under the circumstances. There was another point to which he would direct the attention of the Government. In the Coercion Bill powers were given to the Lord Lieutenant to put a stop to meetings at which inflammatory speeches were made that would necessarily, among a sensitive and excitable people, become incentives to outrage. Power was also given to suppress printed publications of a similar character and tendency. These were most salutary provisions, and he wished to know how they had been exercised? It was not only what was said at meetings, but what was published and circulated by pestilent publications, which influenced and demoralized the minds of the Irish people. One of the most licentious and infamous publications was named The Irish World, which was very largely circulated. It was printed in America, but a letter written in London formed part of its contents. He believed the circulation had enormously increased. It was circulated through the Post Office; and he wished to know whether the Government had taken, or intended to take, any steps, either in the way of applying to Parliament for power or otherwise to stop its circulation? He hoped the Government would not, in their reply, make light of this question. He had no doubt, if those who committed outrage were given to understand that persons who violated the law would have to undergo real punishment, and not spend their time in prison in a pleasant and luxurious manner, as was the case in many instances at present—if the law were administered without undue severity, but with perfect firmness, with a grasp of iron, and not with a glove of velvet, crime would diminish, and the people of Ireland would be contented and peaceful; and if further legislation was necessary, terrorism and violence would not be resorted to.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, that the statistics of outrages in Ireland showed that while in March last the number had been only 145, they had increased last month to 295. Crime, in fact, had doubled in one month. That being the case, it evidently became the duty of the Executive to find some means by which crime should be stayed.

EARL SPENCER said, he felt some difficulty in giving a precise answer to the Questions put by the noble Duke and the noble Lord. Those Questions could be answered by those who were directly connected with the administration of Ireland; but he was not directly responsible for the government of Ireland, and was thus in a position of some difficulty in meeting the particular cases to which his attention had been directed. He had no intention, in replying to the Question of the noble Viscount (Viscount Midleton) of alluding, as the noble Viscount seemed to suppose, to the Bill which was rejected by their Lordships last year—he meant the Compensation for Disturbance Bill. Nor would he allude to the effects of a remedial character likely to be produced by the Land Bill. The noble Viscount had advised him to repudiate certain statements which he had said were believed in certain quarters. He had always felt the greatest possible indignation whenever he had heard from any speaker, or seen stated in the public Press, that there were Members of the Government who wished the agitation in Ireland to continue, in order that they might be able to bring in a strong measure for the reform of the Irish Land Law. He always felt that no one would be worthy to sit in an English Government who could advocate such views, and he was glad that the noble Viscount had said he did not attribute them to Her Majesty's Government. The noble Viscount had referred to the effect of the Land League in Ireland, and he quite agreed that it had exercised the most pernicious and pervading influence in all the relations of life. It had not only affected landlords and tenants, but labourers and persons in every grade and condition of life. No one deplored or denounced more strongly than he did the immoral conduct of many of those who had spoken on behalf of the Land League. With regard to the position of Ireland at the present time, he did not propose to attempt to prove that the condition of that country was satisfactory. He felt that Ireland was in a most unfortunate and unsatisfactory condition; and not only he, but the other Members of the Government, felt very strongly with reference to the relapse of crime into which Ireland had fallen within the last six weeks. The Government thought that the measures which it was their painful duty to pass through Parliament would have been more effectual than they had been in restoring order. The only thing he had to point out as to the application of those measures was that within the last few weeks they had been going through a most trying time with regard to agrarian crime. There had been considerable abstention during the last two months on the part of the landlords from evictions for non-payment of rent; but that abstention having ceased, and a large increase of evictions having taken place, outrages had undoubtedly increased. He was not going to find fault with the conduct of the landlords. He was quite aware that many of them had been most patient and long-suffering with their tenants, and that they only did what they were obliged to do in carrying out these notices. But, at the same time, he felt bound to call attention to the fact, in order to show that at the present moment they were going through a period of greater difficulty than even that of December and January last, and that this might account, to some extent, for the large number of outrages that had latterly taken place. The fact had been referred to that when these measures were first passed there was a large diminution of crime in Ireland; but the fact was that the diminution of crime was apparent the moment the notice was given of the bringing in of those Acts. There was then a lull throughout the country. Unfortunately, however, it should be admitted that there had since been an increase of crime. The noble Viscount referred to what he thought the want of energy of the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary in enforcing the exceptional powers which the law put into their hands. It might appear that under the Protection of Person and Property Act almost anybody could be arrested whom the Lord Lieutenant thought fit to arrest. But that was not the case. The clauses of the Bill laid down very strictly the kind of persons who could be arrested, and those who thought that a great many more persons ought to have been arrested seemed to forget the stringency of the clauses of the Act. It was said that the Irish Government ought to have struck at the leaders of the movement, and not merely their dupes. No doubt, if the leaders could have been brought under the operation of the clauses in question, the Irish Government ought to have put the law in force against them. But the Irish Government had most carefully to consider all the cases brought before them, both of leaders and followers, and to act within the law. Very lately they did put the Act in force by arresting one of the leaders, Mr. Dillon. It was easy to say that more ought to have been arrested; but unless those who said so were in possession of the information belonging to the Executive, it was impossible to know whether the Government were guilty of the laxity of duty laid to their charge. He had to confess that he was disappointed, as was Her Majesty's Government, at the result of the operation of the Act. Lately, the Government had found it necessary to make many more arrests than they did in the first instance, and in the course of a few weeks he trusted they should have better results from the Act. The noble Duke

(the Duke of Marlborough) said that only 35 had been arrested until lately, when there were some more. He had before him the number of those arrests, and it amounted now to 72. The noble Viscount (Viscount Midleton) said that the Viceroy ought to have consulted the lords lieutenant of counties in order to know who should be arrested. Now, from the experience he had in putting into operation the Act of 1871, he could not conceive that the lords lieutenant of counties were the proper persons to consult in such a matter. The Viceroy required very particular knowledge before he could be satisfied that persons came under the Act. He was bound to inquire very minutely into all the facts connected with the case; and surely it was not the lords lieutenant of counties who could give him the necessary information. The Viceroy had to get evidence—not sufficient, indeed, for a Court of Law, but enough to satisfy him that a person was reasonably suspected and could be brought under the operation of the Act. The noble Viscount also stated that more outrages had been committed than were reported by the police. But his own experience was that the police were very vigilant in obtaining evidence of crime. It was not always necessary that the people on whom outrages had been committed should themselves give information; but in almost every case the police obtained information in the districts of the outrages which were committed, and reported them to the Government. Things must have changed very much since he knew Ireland if many of those outrages remained unreported. He was very glad to hear what the noble Viscount said about the merits of the Royal Irish Constabulary, to whom too much praise could not be given for their loyalty and devotion to duty. During the last winter they had a most trying ordeal to go through, and there was no ground whatever for saying that they had neglected their duty, and not given the Government the information which it required. The noble Viscount suggested that, as far as possible, every resident magistrate should reside in some town in the centre of his district. But there was great difficulty in Ireland, as the noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough) would bear him (Earl Spencer) out in saying, in finding proper houses for resident magistrates. The towns in Ireland were often very small, and houses suitable for resident magistrates were not always to be found within several miles of the centre of the district. But it had always been the endeavour of the Government to place the resident magistrate in the centre of his work wherever it was possible to do so. Then the noble Viscount had made a suggestion about sending additional magistrates into districts where outrages were committed. That was a very proper suggestion. In former cases it was usual to send magistrates of known experience and skill to aid those who, in ordinary times, would be quite sufficient for the duties. The noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough) had accused the Government of blowing hot and cold, and dealing alternately in kicks and kisses. But it should be remembered that when men were deprived of their liberty it could not be looked on as a pleasure to them. The noble Duke found fault with the prison rules in the case of those men, and attributed the lapse into crime which had occurred in Ireland partly to the lenient treatment given to the prisoners. He believed he could say that the rules in force with regard to the prisoners now in detention under the Lord Lieutenant's Warrant were the same as those which were in force when he was in Ireland in connection with prisoners in custody under the Act of 1871. He was not aware that any alteration had been made in the rules. At that time they had no reason to believe that the prisoners were treated in a lenient manner, and he was entitled to say that the operation of the Act was successful; nor was any charge made of its being carried out insufficiently. With regard to there being but one prison, he imagined it had been found desirable that prisoners of that kind should be confined in one prison; and that, he conceived, was the reason why the great body of the prisoners were confined in Dublin. But he believed that at the present moment, both in Galway and Limerick, there were some detained under the Lord Lieutenant's Warrant. He was unable to answer the noble Duke with respect to the prosecutions at Limerick and Tralee, because the noble Duke had given him no Notice of the Question. But he believed the reason why the prosecutions had not been carried to a conclusion was that the officers who conducted them thought that on public grounds the trials should be deferred. He understood the noble Duke to say that the Government had power under the Act to stop meetings at which inflammatory language was expected to be used; but he was not aware of any such exceptional and new power being sought for, and could not recollect any clause in the Bill by which it had been conferred. The meetings in question were always carefully watched by the Government; but when the noble Duke asked what course the Government intended to take with regard to them, and in reference also to the newspapers, he was quite unable to give a reply. If the Government contemplated moving in the matter, their objects would be defeated if they were to announce their intention in Parliament. For the same reason he was unable to answer the last part of the noble Viscount's Question. All he could say was that the Government were determined to do all in their power to enforce the law with energy and vigour, and that nothing would be left undone that might effect that object.

LORD INCHQUIN observed, that he did not intend to ask the noble Earl for information as to individual cases of outrage; but no one who read the daily papers could fail to notice the lamentable state into which the country had been allowed to drift. Day after day accounts were published of assaults on process-servers, and of every kind of outrage, nearly all of which crimes were apparently committed with impunity, in defiance of the very large military and police force now in Ireland, and in spite of the recently passed Coercion Bill. For such notorious facts an explanation was due to Parliament, and especially to the loyal residents in Ireland. In his opinion, the present state of that country might briefly be ascribed to the action of the Land League. There would be no peace in Ireland until that organization, or, rather, that illegal conspiracy, was suppressed. But what had been the course of the Government? They had allowed an agitation to continue, the results of which were altogether inconsistent with the institutions of civilized society. For six months the Land League had been permitted to work unchecked; and at last, instead of striking boldly at the ringleaders, the Government had arrested a few insignificant persons. True, Mr. Dillon had now been arrested, but not until he had several times used the strongest language. The so-called remedial legislation in which the Government were now engaged would not bring peace to Ireland. Its completeness was doubted by Irishmen themselves; indeed, Mr. Parnell and his followers cared nothing for it except as a means of further confiscating the property of the landlords. The Government, if they really intended to stop agrarian outrages, ought to ask Parliament for power to deal more effectually with the Land League.

EARL FORTESCUE said, he looked upon the condition of affairs in Ireland as most serious, and could not help thinking that the speech of the noble Earl would cause great disappointment to all Her Majesty's loyal subjects there. The Government had acted with great tardiness in regard to John Dillon; and even yet the Government, judging from the statement they had just heard from the Lord President of the Council, seemed to look upon the condition of affairs in Ireland with a certain complacency. His noble Friend's explanation of the increase of outrages seemed to him by no means the right one. They all remembered the fable. The splash made by the passing of the Protection of Person and Property Act had at first somewhat frightened the Land League; but they soon found that, up to a certain point, they had nothing to fear from the Irish Executive, and were now hopping upon King Log. If further illustration were wanted, the morning papers would supply a fresh instance of the helplessness of the Government in dealing with cases that required prompt and energetic action. It was stated as a piece of news that the Government were now buying horses and cars for the use of the police; but for many months past the police had been denied the use of conveyances, and it seemed extraordinary that the Executive now for the first time recognized that fact, and prepared to take this most obvious step. The difficulty of moving the police from place to place must of necessity tend to discourage the members of the severely tried Constabulary Force, while it correspondingly encouraged the disaffected: He mentioned this one illustration of that general want of firmness, energy, and resource in the Irish Executive which furnished, he believed, the true explanation of the recent increase of crime and outrage in Ireland, notwithstanding the passing of the stringent Act for the protection of life and property.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he had heard with great regret the speech of his noble Friend the Lord President of the Council, because he feared it would carry far and wide the impression that, whatever their intentions might be, Her Majesty's Government were singularly wanting in that energy and earnestness of purpose which could alone successfully meet the present difficulty with Ireland. It was surprising that the strongest and fittest adjective the noble Earl could find to describe the present state of Ireland was "unsatisfactory, disgraceful, perilous, and ruinous;" and he believed this intimation of irresolution and uncertainty of purpose on the part of the Government would only strengthen the present state of things. He had rarely heard in their Lordships' House a more lucid and temperate statement than that in which his noble Friend had brought this question before their Lordships' House; but the noble Earl had not given anything like a reply to the noble Viscount. He was sorry that the noble Earl should have rested part of his case upon the supposed increase of ejectments on the part of the landlords. He (the Earl of Carnarvon) thought that when the history of the present time was fairly reviewed men of all sides would acknowledge that the Irish landlords, as a class, had been singularly patient and forbearing.

EARL SPENCER explained, that he only mentioned that as a fact in the case. He had thrown no blame on the Irish landlords, and he had admitted they had been long-suffering.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, if the noble Earl did not impute blame, he had certainly dwelt upon it as a cause of the present state of things; and he thought that expression on his part would carry weight of a very undesirable kind in Ireland. He did not know that in the course of the present century Ireland had ever been in a more miserable state than it was at the present time; for, as was patent, outrages of almost every kind were being committed in every part of the country. It was all very well to say that the tenants had suffered heavily in some instances; but there were cases of quite as great hardship among the landlords, and there were many cases within his own knowledge, where rentals had come down from thousands a-year to a few pounds, and where men who were dependent upon rentals for their subsistence had been reduced to beggary. He must say that he had been astonished at the lenient terms of the Protection of Person and Property Act—a measure which hardly seemed to have been framed in order to strike terror into wrongdoers. Instead of arresting the prime movers in the disturbance, the Executive had confined their arrests mainly to inferior agents, and had put them under restraint in circumstances amounting almost to absolute luxury. But there were two facts daily growing in importance, and threatening to overshadow all other considerations, to which he earnestly prayed the attention of the Government before it was too late. First, there could be no doubt that the most staunch, loyal, and faithful body of men in Ireland were the Royal Irish Constabulary. On them depended whatever of peace and order remained in the country, and whatever of peace and order might be hereafter restored; but the Government was just now exposing that force to a pressure that flesh and blood could scarcely bear. And, secondly, he observed in the papers of that very day the account of an attack on the troops by an Irish mob. No blood had been shed, and the officers had succeeded in preventing any retaliatory act; but this marked a new point of departure. It was impossible that matters should remain here; they must either improve or grow much worse, impunity would beget fresh collisions; and he warned the Government to consider very carefully the course they pursued, for the country was within a measurable distance of trouble and bloodshed far greater than any she had yet passed through.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that the principal objection made by the noble Earl who had just sat down (the Earl of Carnarvon) to the speech of his (Lord Carlingford's) noble Friend the Lord President was an objection to the use of an adjective in describing the condition of Ireland as "unsatisfactory." The use of that epithet should not be the subject of grave accusation. He would admit, however, that it was not possible to address to the House a satisfactory speech on the condition of Ireland during the period through which the country was now passing; but he hoped that period would be only a limited and temporary one. He had listened to the speeches of noble Lords opposite, but had failed to gather from them any suggestion of a short cut out of the difficult and painful position in which some parts of Ireland were now placed, unless they accepted the ultima ratio of suppressing the Land League by Act of Parliament. He would express no opinion on that subject. But had those noble Lords considered how far the suppression of that body would have the effect desired? Had they considered the possibility that a course of that kind might have the effect of converting the Land League into a secret society corresponding with the Ribbon and other secret societies which were known in Ireland in times past. Had they also considered the time that would be sacrificed in the task of carrying such a Statute through "another place?" Without, in the least, complaining of the manner in which the subject had been introduced to the notice of their Lordships, he, nevertheless, thought that noble Lords opposite had not sufficiently weighed the difficulties which any Government in Ireland would have to encounter in dealing with the present widespread combination against the payment of rent. Those difficulties were, in fact, far greater than any which had arisen under the various other organizations which had from time to time held sway in the country. The more sanguinary and dangerous Ribbon organization was limited in its area and its numbers; and when certain of its leaders were arrested, as under the provisions of the Westmeath Act, its power was broken. The present agitation was more far-reaching in its effects. The "intimidation" of tenant farmers by violent, and sometimes sanguinary, means was not the only thing which had to be considered. He thought the word "demoralization" more applicable than "intimidation" to the present state of Irish tenants, for there was a general feeling among them which facilitated the promulgation of the doctrine—always an easy one to disseminate—that it was advisable and even heroic not to pay rent. It was that demoralization which had made the Land League successful; for it was no more difficult in Ireland than elsewhere to persuade men not to pay their debts. One great difficulty, which was known to all who were acquainted with the country, was that, from causes lying deep in its history, the peasants and tenants of Ireland were very much in the habit of following each other blindly in any cause, good or bad, which happened to come to the front. The phrase, "We cannot go against the people," was one familiar to everyone acquainted with Ireland; and it was from the sentiment so expressed—the dislike of people to disassociate themselves from their neighbours, and from the opinion of the neighbourhood—that the Land League derived much of its power. A sentiment of that kind could not be overcome by the mere action of the police, or by measures of repression; but he had a strong hope and belief that such sentiments could be dealt with and overcome by wise legislation. It was the opinion of those best acquainted with Ireland that the great body of the tenant farmers were not ready to become revolutionists even on the subject of land; and that they were not prepared to reject any reasonable measure for the improvement of their condition. At the same time, he fully admitted that the hopes entertained of a peaceful solution of the difficulty did not, in the smallest degree, exonerate the Government from the imperative duty of using all the powers, ordinary and extraordinary, now in their hands for the purpose of maintaining peace, of encountering and resisting intimidation, and of supporting all the fair rights of property.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM said, the present unsatisfactory state of things in Ireland was attributable, in a great measure, to the apathy and want of energy on the part of the Government in having unjustifiably allowed the Peace Preservation Acts to expire, and to their having failed, when the land agitation had developed itself, immediately to call Parliament together in the autumn, in order to take energetic measures for the vindication of the law. They had endeavoured to reverse the policy of their Predecessors, and had disregarded the warning voice of his late lamented Friend the Earl of Beaconsfield, allowing things to drift in Ireland until they got from bad to worse; and at length, when they did pass a Bill for the protection of life and property, the state of Ireland was such that, notwithstanding that remedial measures were introduced, they had been of little or no avail. Unless they acted with greater energy than they had hitherto done in dealing with the matter, it would end in the state of the country becoming worse than ever.

FRANCE AND TUNIS—CIRCULAR OF THE FRENCH MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

EARL DE LA WARR, in rising, according to Notice, to ask the Secretary of State at the head of the Foreign Office, If the recent Circular of M. St. Hilaire, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, explanatory of the objects of the French invasion of the Regency of Tunis, can be laid on the Table of the House? said, that although his noble Friend (Earl Granville) was not in the House, he would put the Question generally. In doing so, he would observe that the differences which had arisen between France and Tunis had come to a crisis which could not fail to awaken very grave considerations. The French expedition to Tunis was undertaken with the avowed object of putting a stop to the predatory incursions of some lawless tribes on the Frontier of Tunis and Algeria. It was not easy to ascertain to what extent these raids had been carried on, though they had, in former instances, not unfrequently been easily checked and repressed by the Bey. The French, however, seemed to have treated the matter as a serious one, and sent a force of 20,000 men in search, as alleged, of those lawless tribes. It would, perhaps, be difficult to say that the French were not justified in taking some steps to put a stop to annoyances which they might receive from lawless tribes on their Frontier. But, under pretext of this, a neighbouring and friendly country was invaded against the protest of the Sovereign, who had always been on friendly terms, and was still desirous of keeping up friendly intercourse with France; and the French troops, after occupying several places in the Regency of Tunis, advanced far into the interior of the country, and were now within a few miles of the capital. Simultaneously with this, a Circular was despatched by M. St. Hilaire to the French Representatives in foreign countries, in which it was announced that there must now be a "Treaty guaranteeing us both from the incursions from which our frontiers are perpetually suffering, and from the unfair dealings of which the Bardo (i.e., the Government of the Bey) has too often been the instrument and the centre."

He (Earl De La Warr) believed this to be a most unjust and unfounded accusation, and that it would be found that the Bey had always endeavoured to be on the most friendly terms with France. Judging from what followed in the document, a French Protectorate of Tunis was the ultimate object of the invasion of the country. M. St. Hilaire goes on to say that—

"Tunis is in general very fertile, as the prodigious wealth of ancient Carthage sufficiently shows. Under the protection of France all the natural gifts of that country can be developed afresh."

And here he might refer to what seemed to be a somewhat questionable sentence for the Foreign Minister of a great country to put into a Circular addressed to the foreign Representatives of that country in speaking of the Sovereign of a neighbouring State. M. St. Hilaire continued—

"It is very possible that the present Bey may soon learn to his cost, at the expense of his Throne or his freedom, perhaps of his life, what a tremendous mistake his ill-inspired advisers made him commit."

He need offer no comment upon those words. And now he would ask their Lordships to look at the present attitude assumed by France as compared with the avowed objects of the military invasion of the Regency of Tunis. Their Lordships had heard more than once from his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that France had no intention of conquest or annexation; that the French Government had authorized Lord Lyons to assure Her Majesty's Government that they had no intention of annexation or conquest; and the same assurances were given by Her Majesty's Government in "another place," where it was stated—

"The French Government informed Lord Lyons on the 9th instant that their military operations in Tunis will be confined to the neighbourhood of its frontier and the punishment of its lawless frontier tribes."

Such were among the repeated assurances of the French Government at the commencement of the campaign; and he (Earl De La Warr) asked how far they were consistent with the present operations of the French Army, which was now far distant from the Frontier, and within a few miles of the City of Tunis? He ventured to hope that the noble Earl would be able to assure their Lordships that some action would be taken by Her Majesty's Government, to show that this country was not indifferent to what was taking place, not only with regard to the injustice which was being done, but also in consideration of the interests of this country. He believed his noble Friend received yesterday a direct communication from the Bey of Tunis—a Copy of which had been sent to the other Powers—showing how that, relying on the assurances of France, he had offered no resistance, and appealing in the extreme urgency of the case to the British Government, as well as to the Governments of the other Powers. He would most earnestly press upon the attention of Her Majesty's Government whether some joint action with other Powers might not bring the question to a satisfactory issue.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that he rejoiced at the news of a Treaty having been signed at Tunis, and that further effusion of blood had been stopped, and the danger avoided of any military accidents such as might have induced the French to impose more onerous terms on the Government of Tunis than those they originally intended to impose, or had professed to intend to seek. No final Treaty could be entered into by the Bey of Tunis alone without ratification by the Sublime Porte. The noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville) would, therefore, have opportunities of watching over the negotiations and preventing the insertion into this Treaty of clauses which might clash with the independence of Tunis, or with the rights of other nations under Treaties with the Ottoman Porte. The qualities and past political services of his noble Friend, and, he might add, those of the hon. Baronet his Under Secretary (Sir Charles W. Dilke), gave him exceptional facilities for these negotiations.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, in reply, said, he could only repeat what his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had already stated—that he intended to lay on the Table of the House very shortly Papers on the subject, and that among them would be the document which the noble Earl opposite (Earl De La Warr) asked to have produced.

House adjourned at a quarter before Eight o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS—ACTION OF THE POLICE.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, to prevent the recurrence of such cases as that of Elizabeth Burley at Dover, the Police employed under the Contagious Diseases Acts will be instructed and cautioned that no authority is given to them by those Laws to stop, or question, or molest any woman, but only to proceed against those suspected of prostitution under a summons or order of justices of the peace?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I understand that the matter occurred in the sense of the hon. and learned Member's Question. It is altogether contrary to the duty of the police to molest any woman for the purpose of carrying out these Acts, or to do otherwise than obtain an order of the Justices, except, of course, in the case of voluntary submission. Directions to that effect have been given to the police, and will be enforced.

INDIA—THE SALT DUTY.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON asked the Secretary of State for India,

Whether, as it is desirable to encourage the freight of salt to India, he would urge upon the Government of India that English salt should not be placed at a disadvantage in India, by a higher rate of duty of £1 per ton than that levied on Sambhur Lake salt, and that the salt made in India should not be sold under the cost of production, plus the duty charged on English salt; and, whether he can lay upon the Table any correspondence on the subject?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I have been in correspondence with the Government of India on the subject of the hon. Member's Question, in consequence of a Memorial from the Salt Chamber of Commerce, and have ascertained that salt made in India is not sold under the cost of production. It is necessary, for financial reasons, to fix the Salt Tax in Bengal about £1 a-ton higher than in Upper India, and hence the English salt consumed in Bengal pays a higher rate of tax than the Sambhur salt of Upper India. But the Indian salt made in or imported into Bengal and the English salt imported into Bengal pay the same rate of tax. Under those circumstances, I do not consider it necessary to lay the Correspondence which has been communicated to the Salt Chamber of Commerce on the Table of the House.

LAW AND JUSTICE—ASSIZES.

MR. HICKS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, having regard to the small number of criminal cases tried at the autumn assizes 1879 and winter assizes 1880, as shown in the Return presented to the House on the 24th day of March, he intends to bring forward any measure to reduce the number of assizes, and thus save a great waste of judicial power, and relieve all classes of jurors and others from unnecessary expense, trouble, and loss of time?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman opposite, my Predecessor in Office, for reasons which I entirely approve, established, I think with great advantage, quarterly gaol deliveries, in order that no man who might be innocent should be left untried in prison for more than three months. That is a principle from which I have no disposition to depart. I am, however, quite aware of the inconvenience which is caused in some cases both to the Judges and to others who have to attend those Assizes, and I have been in communication with the Lord Chancellor and the Attorney General on the subject, and I hope that some more convenient system may be devised by which all prisoners may be brought to trial speedily and our gaol system consolidated.

PERU—MASSACRE OF CHINESE.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has received any information from Her Majesty's Minister in Peru, concerning the massacres of Chinese, referred to in a letter published in the "Times" on April 27th; and, whether any steps are being taken to protect the lives of subjects of Her Majesty in the present disturbed state of that Country?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, Mr. St. John has reported to Her Majesty's Government that the Chinese shopkeepers of Lima were attacked by a cowardly Peruvian mob the night before the entry of the Chilean Forces, and that 70 or 80 of them were killed. Seven hundred persons were compelled to seek refuge in the British Legation, where the British Admiral and his Staff and five blue-jackets also were. At daylight the Foreign Representatives called out the Foreign Urban Guard, and the riots were quelled by them. Her Majesty's Government are informed that Chinese have been killed up the country; but Her Majesty's officers will, of course, continue to do all in their power to prevent these massacres and protect the lives of British subjects.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND) — DELIVERY OF LETTERS AT BONNYBEG, CO. LIMERICK.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Postmaster General, If the Post Office authorities in Dublin have as yet been able to come to any decision as to whether the alteration in the route of the letter carrier from Drumsna to Bonnybeg, county Leitrim, as suggested in a Question in the Orders of the Day of the 4th April 1881, can be carried out without any disadvantage to the public service?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, that he had inquired into the matter referred to in the Question; but he found that the alteration suggested by the hon. and gallant Member could not be made, as it would operate unfairly towards a larger number of people in the district than those whom it would benefit.

SOUTH AFRICA — THE TRANSVAAL
TIES.

MR. S. LEIGHTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the unprecedented proportion of killed to wounded amongst Her Majesty's troops during the Transvaal campaign was caused by the use of explosive bullets by the Boers, or by the slaughter of the wounded, or whether there are any other causes to account for it; and, when he will be able to inform the House of the losses among the troops from sickness since the commencement of the campaign?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that the number of deaths by sickness in the recent campaign in the Transvaal is reported to be 25. We have not as yet any reports of the cases of sickness which have not proved fatal; and no accurate information can be expected until the medical monthly Returns have been received. None have reached us for any month of the year 1881. As to the first part of the Question, there is no evidence to show that the proportion of killed to wounded is due either to the use of explosive bullets or to the slaughter of the wounded. In one case it was reported that a bullet was heard to explode after it had passed through the body of an officer who was wounded; but I can find no other reference to any suspicion that these bullets were used. As to any slaughter of the wounded, the reports, on the contrary, describe their treatment as considerate and humane. The high proportion of deaths may be simply due to the very accurate shooting of expert riflemen at short distances.

In reply to Lord EUSTACE CECIL,

MR. CHILDERS said, it was reported that a bullet had passed through the leg of a wounded officer and exploded in the air; but he doubted very much whether the rumour was well founded.

CRIME (SCOTLAND)—THE GLENLUCE MURDER.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the Lord Advocate, If any further inquiry in the Glenluce murder case is contemplated by the Government, in order, if possible, that the guilty person or persons may be brought to justice, or, at least, that the person or persons against whom local suspicion attaches may, if possible, be exonerated?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. M'LAREN): Sir, I can assure my hon. Friend that the Glenluce murder case has within the last few weeks occupied much of the time and attention of the local authorities and of the Crown counsel in Edinburgh under my direction, and a very full and careful inquiry has been instituted with reference to the persons to whom suspicion is directed. As regards the girl Anderson, who was suspected, she has been examined in Edinburgh, in presence of the Crown agent and two of the Crown counsel, who have separately written to me that they are perfectly satisfied as to her candour and innocence. As to the other parties referred to in the Question, after reading the depositions, I see no ground for a criminal prosecution against any of them. I must now express the hope that, after the very careful inquiry made, the people of Wigtownshire will let this matter rest, with the assurance that everything will be done that is possible on the part of the Prosecution Department to discover the guilty party and bring him to justice.

LILLY DALE COLLIERY (STAFFORD-SHIRE).

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the statements that the mine was carried on without a certified manager, and was on fire for a considerable time, made before the coroner's jury on 5th instant, in respect to the management of the Lilly Dale Colliery, Bucknall, North Stafford, where at least seven persons have lost their lives, a report of which appeared in the "Staffordshire Daily Sentinel" on the 6th instant; whether it be correct that the owner was mulcted in fines and costs to the extent of £30 some little time ago; and, further, will he direct some one to attend the inquest, which opens again on 24th instant, to watch the proceedings on behalf of the Home Office, to see that a searching investigation is made into the whole circumstances in connection with the explosion, and the management of the colliery without a certified manager?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, it was a fact that this mine was carried on without a certified manager. Only 12 men were usually employed, and in those circumstances the mining engineer was allowed to manage the mine himself. It was true that the owner was fined £30 for negligence. The Inspector's Report was so clear that he did not think it would be necessary for anybody to attend the inquest on behalf of the Home Office, except an experienced Inspector.

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPH CLERKS.

MR. MACLIVER asked the Postmaster General, If his attention has been called to the meetings of telegraph clerks held on Saturday last in various towns in the United Kingdom, and that at these meetings Resolutions were passed expressing surprise at the delay which has taken place in the settlement of the questions in dispute; and, whether he can fix a time when he will be able to make a statement with regard to the position of the telegraph clerks?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, I have observed the reports of the meetings to which the hon. Member refers. In reply to the latter part of his Question, I can only repeat that the fullest possible attention has been and is being given to the subject to which it refers, and that immediately a decision is arrived at I will take the earliest opportunity of making it known.

TUNIS—THE ENFIDA CASE.

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been directed to M. St. Hilaire's Circular in the French Yellow Book, which has just been published, in which he mentions the Enfida case as one of the motives of the Expedition by the French Army and Navy to Tunis; whether Her Majesty's Government will take steps to prevent the claims of a British subject being endangered by the French occupation of Tunisian territory, and to insure the question being impartially tried by the local courts, in accordance with the decision arrived at by the Law

Officers of the Crown; and, when Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table the Papers referring to this case, as promised before Easter; and if it will include the Law Officers' Report?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the Circular of M. Barthélemy St. Hilaire has been received in the French Yellow Book on Tunisian affairs, and contains a reference to the Enfida case. With regard to the second portion of my hon. Friend's Question, I think that I shall do best in asking him to await the publication of the Papers which will be laid on the Table next week, and which will clearly show the attitude of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the Enfida question. My hon. Friend must be aware that the Reports of the Law Officers are confidential documents which are never made public.

TUNIS—SUZERAINTY OF THE PORTE.

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government did not recognize the Firman of 1871, in which the relations between the Porte and Tunis as "an integral part of the Ottoman Empire" were fully set forth; and, if he will lay upon the Table the Despatch congratulating the Bey of Tunis on the conclusion of the Convention between Khriedine Pasha and the Porte?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the Firman of 1871 was virtually recognized by Her Majesty's Government, who considered Tunis to be under the suzerainty of the Porte. The French Government, as my hon. Friend is aware, and as I have already stated in this House, have since 1838 held a contrary view. No despatch of the nature referred to by my hon. Friend exists.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY—THE PROPOSED EXTENSION.

MR. COOPE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government is prepared to carry out the further extension of the buildings of the National Gallery, for which plans were prepared some years since by Mr. Barry, so as to provide sufficient space not only for those paintings already in the possession of the Nation, but also for such additions as may be made from time to time by gift or bequest?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, by the request of my right hon. Friend I will answer the Question. No application has been received from the Trustees of the National Gallery for a further space. There is, therefore, no present intention on the part of the Government to propose a further extension of the buildings of the National Gallery.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL —DISTRICT REGISTRARS (IRELAND).

MR. P. MARTIN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government had been called to the fact that, under the 34th section of the Inland Revenue Bill, the five District Registrars for Kilkenny, Tuam, Ballina, Cavan, and Mullingar, would be deprived of a large proportion of the fees by which they are at present paid; and, whether it is the intention of the Government, in case the Clause shall pass in its present form, to place those officers on fixed salaries equivalent to their present official incomes; and, is it not the fact that, with the exception of those five officers, all other District Registrars, both in Ireland and England, are now paid by salaries in lieu of fees?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, our attention has already been called to the fact brought forward by the hon. and learned Member, and I have to state there is no intention that the interests of any individual officer should be prejudiced by the operation of the clause in question. The best way of meeting the case of these five gentlemen is now receiving the consideration of the Treasury. The hon. and learned Member is correct in saying that all other district registrars in Ireland and England are now paid by salary.

RAILWAYS (INDIA)—THE PORTUGUESE TERRITORY.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether a line constructed entirely in British territory from the harbour of Kurwar to Hubli, the centre of the Dhurwar cotton districts, which a Committee appointed by the Government of Bombay recommended after long investigation, would not better secure the interests of the southern Mahratta Country than a line running to the same point, partly through foreign dominions from the Portuguese part of Mumozou?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, this is almost a repetition of the Question recently put by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), and I can only return a similar answer to that which I then gave—namely, that under all the circumstances of the case it was considered desirable to enter into the arrangement by which a line is to be taken from Marmagoa through Portuguese territory to Hubli, and that there is no reason to suppose that the interests of the Southern Mahratta Country would be better secured by the alternative line from Karwar to Hubli.

EVICTIONS (IRELAND).

MR. DALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the Resolutions passed by the Dean and Clergy of Listowel, in conference assembled, on Wednesday the 4th instant:—

“Resolved (1). That this conference expresses its unqualified condemnation of the practice resorted to on several estates within the deanery of issuing writs from the superior courts for the recovery of rents which are notoriously excessive and exorbitant, thus involving the unfortunate tenants in heavy and to many of them ruinous costs;

“Resolved (2). That the evictions which have lately taken place in the district call for the reprobation of every humane and right minded man; that one of the evictions on the property of Mr. Gunn Mahony, an absentee, was invested with all those characteristics which entitle it to be described as an act of barbarous inhumanity, the father of a large family having been flung on the roadside in an apparently dying state, without a home, and without any shelter whatever;

“Resolved (3). That profound tranquillity, perfect order, and peace have up to this prevailed over and represent the normal condition of North Kerry; but that this conference cannot contemplate without horror what may be the result should the extermination of a law-abiding and industrious people continue and the execution of the writs referred to with their revolting concomitants be persevered in;”

and, whether, if on inquiry he ascertains the statements above mentioned to be correct, and that what is true of the district referred to is equally true of many other districts in Ireland, he will feel it his duty to advise Her Majesty's Government to immediately pass a Bill for the temporary suspension of evictions pending the passing of the Land Law (Ireland) Bill through the Houses of Parliament?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I cannot answer this Question to-day. I hoped to get information of this particular case, but I have not yet received it, though it may be received in a few days. But I may say that I could not answer the last part of the Question. I do not think that any Member of the Government ought to be asked what is the course he will take in consultation with his Colleagues on public matters. Of course, the hon. Member may ask a Member in charge of a Bill what course he intends to take; but it is not a usual thing to ask a Member of the Government what advice he will give.

ARREST OF JAMES LALOR.

MR. LALOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true, as stated in the "Standard" newspaper of the 11th instant, that James Lalor, of Raheen, in the Queen's County, has been arrested under the provisions of the Peace Preservation Act (Ireland); and, if so, on what reasonable suspicion; and, if he is aware that James Lalor and his family had been evicted from his holding only a few days previously, after he had sown his land under crops?

MR. FITZPATRICK: Before, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman answers this Question I beg to ask him whether it is not a fact that James Lalor owed two and a-half years' rent, and was always an unsatisfactory tenant; and whether the following statement relating to the holding of James Lalor is correct, as stated in The Leinster Express of May 7, that James Lalor

"Held 16 Irish acres at £18 15s. a-year, and sublet 7½ of them—5 to one party and 2½ to another—for which he obtained a rent of £22 10s?"

By this means this rack-rented tenant obtained £3 15s. a-year more for 7½ acres than he was asked to pay by Dr. Jacob for 16 acres. And, further, whether, excellent landlord that he is, Mr. Lalor, in sub-letting the farm, required two years' rent in advance, or a sum of £44?

MR. LALOR asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he was aware that the land for which that man had received the money at conacre was manured land?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, it is true that James Lalor has been arrested under the provisions of the Protection Act. The ground is reasonable suspicion of arson. It is also true that he was evicted from his holding a short time before, and I am told that his land was sown under crops. As to the Question of the hon. Gentleman opposite, the only information I have is that he was not considered an industrious tenant. I have seen the statement with regard to the sub-letting, and I have no reason to suppose that it is not true. With respect to the Question of manuring, I really cannot answer it. It is true that a year and a-half's rent was owing.

MR. LALOR wished to call the attention of the House to that matter. ["Order!"] He would conclude with a Motion.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has put his Question and has received an answer. If he desires to put any further Question arising out of the answer he is in Order in so doing.

MR. LALOR begged to say that he intended to conclude with a Motion. ["Oh!"] He lived within about half a mile of where that poor man had been evicted, and he understood the whole case. During the last 12 months he had four different ejectments served upon him. Two of these, he believed, were from the Superior Courts in Dublin, while the case could have been tried in the County Court or district where he resided. There had, no doubt, been a burning in the neighbourhood where that man had been evicted; but it was generally understood in the neighbourhood that it had occurred through the carelessness and insobriety of the owners of the place themselves, and there was not the slightest suspicion that it had been caused by Lalor. There was damage done by the fire to the extent of some £70 or £80; but the owner of the place claimed compensation to the extent of £300. He would remind the Chief Secretary that the person who got Lalor arrested and the county proclaimed was the person who had a direct interest in keeping the man in prison. Lalor had his crop sown, and there was an abundant crop in the ground to enable him to pay at the next harvest if he had been allowed to reside on the farm; but the fact of his being kept in prison would disable him from doing so, and there was reason to believe that that was the motive for putting him in gaol. It was most objectionable that the Queen's County should have been proclaimed, as it was one of the most peaceful districts in the Kingdom. It was believed that this had been done, not to put down outrages, but to enable the landlords to eject their tenantry and collect their rents. He begged to move the adjournment of the House.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR, in seconding the Motion, said, that James Lalor had the misfortune to be the tenant of a man who, besides being a landlord, was a magistrate of well-known proclivities. It was a matter of perfect notoriety that that landlord would crush and ruin that man if he possibly could. He understood that this magistrate had on four successive occasions taken proceedings against tenants, and having lost his case he entertained vindictive feelings towards them. Queen's County was conspicuous in Ireland for its freedom from everything like crime and outrage; and it was a matter of common report that that particular landlord had been peculiarly instrumental in causing that county to be proclaimed. They had a right, therefore, to ask the Government for some declaration of the grounds on which Queen's County had been proclaimed. He challenged the Chief Secretary to deny that during a large portion of last year the police were not required at all in Queen's County. In the month of April he believed that in that county there was only one offence of a serious agrarian kind, and another of a very mild description.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Lalor.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I would only state that James Lalor was not arrested, nor was Queen's County proclaimed, on account of the representation of the landlord to whom hon. Members had alluded. Having had no reason to expect that the question of the proclamation of Queen's County would come up this evening, I can only now say that I have a very different opinion on the subject from that of the hon. Member; but if the Question is repeated on Monday or Tuesday I will give an answer as to the grounds on which the county was proclaimed.

MR. BIGGAR said, that the right hon. Gentleman had a very good memory for some things and a very bad one on others, as suited his convenience. He could tell that Lalor had sub-let part of his lands for more rent than he paid the head landlord for the whole holding; but he could not tell whether it had been so sub-let as conacre and as manured land. In those cases between landlord and tenant the right hon. Gentleman was always inclined to take the side of the strong party against the weak, and no reply that he gave to those Questions was entitled to much consideration from the Irish Members. There had been only one or two slight outrages in the Queen's County recently, and these did not at all justify the proclamation.

MR. HEALY said, he was glad his hon. Friend had moved the adjournment of the House, and he thought the Irish Party ought to come down and move the adjournment of the House on every occasion of this kind. He thought the Irish Party were to blame for not having acted with sufficient firmness in this direction. He thought the adjournment of the House ought to be moved on Government nights as well as on other nights to raise the question of these proclamations and arrests. It was only by action in the House of Commons that they could retaliate on the Government. They had been told that Dr. Jacob had not moved in the matter of the proclamation of the Queen's County; but if Dr. Jacob had any dirty work to do he would get someone else to do it. It would be easy for him or his agents to prime the Government with information which they might use as a means of getting the county proclaimed; and he ventured to say that what information they possessed came from such statements. Owing to the state of the Grand Jury Laws in Ireland, when a man's house or haystack was burned accidentally, he had the temptation to plead that it was malicious; and then, with the present cry about agrarian outrages, if he presented for £200 or £300, the Grand Jurors, who were landlords, were only too happy to mulct the district where the act was committed. He had known cases of this kind where, in place of punishing the really guilty parties—namely, the landlords, the unfortunate tenants were punished.

MR. LEAMY stated that very few of the tenant farmers of Ireland insured their stocks. If, unfortunately, a burning took place, and if there was no evidence as to how it occurred, the first thing that a farmer did was to rush off to the police barracks and give the requisite notices in order to apply for compensation. There was the strongest possible temptation for a farmer who had not insured to prove that the burning was malicious, because that was the only way of securing compensation. Now, he understood that a burning had recently taken place where this man had been arrested; and he thought they had a right to know on what grounds the man was arrested, and whether the burning for which he was arrested was the one in connection with which there was a claim before the Presentment Sessions for compensation.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY wished to enter his protest against the calumnies which had been heaped upon the farmers of Ireland by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. The hon. Member had stated in his place in the House of Commons that it was a usual thing for Irish farmers, whenever a fire occurred on their premises, to go off to the police and make false oaths and statements. ["Oh!"]

MR. LEAMY denied that he had made any such charge. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Galway County (Mr. Mitchell Henry) is in possession of the House, and he is entitled to proceed to the end of his address; if at the end of it the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Leamy) desires to make any explanation, no doubt the House will afford him an opportunity.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he must protest against the statement of the hon. Member, for it was one of the greatest calumnies ever uttered. He knew as a fact that the farmers of Ireland were not guilty of this conduct; and he never would be a party to branding poor people as perjurers and perpetrators of crime, even when the accusation came from that side of the House, which assumed to be guardians and champions of the tenant farmers.

MR. LEAMY said, he had not attempted to brand the farmers of Ireland as perjurers, or in any way to reflect upon their characters. What he did say was, that an Irish farmer did not, as a rule, insure his stock, and that, when any of his stock was burned, there was the strongest temptation, in cases where there was no evidence as to how the fire occurred, to endeavour to prove that it was malicious, as it was the only way in which he could get compensation in the present state of the law.

MR. DAWSON said, the perception of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), in mistaking the remarks of his hon. Friend (Mr. Leamy), must not be very keen. The Irish farmers would be well able to judge between the two hon. Members, and decide who was most likely to brand the Irish character. His hon. Friend (Mr. Leamy) had merely stated what the history of Ireland had proved to be a fact. The temptation was so strong in these matters that the wonder was that there were not many more compelled to make claims for compensation; and what his hon. Friend contended was that that temptation ought to be removed out of their way by an alteration of the law. He was not uttering a calumny against his fellow-countrymen, but rather wishing to deprive them of this temptation.

PARLIAMENTARY OATH (MR. BRADLAUGH).

NOTICE OF MOTION (SIR WILFRID LAWSON).

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he rose to make an appeal to his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson); and, in doing so, with a view to expedite Business which was set down for that evening, he should be under the necessity of following the example of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Lalor), and would conclude with a Motion. His hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle had given Notice of a Resolution which he now saw on the Paper. When the Speaker was asked whether that Notice would have precedence over all others as a question of Privilege, he stated that this question could not be put in its present form, but that, in order to have precedence, it would be necessary that the hon. Baronet should specifically move a Resolution rescinding one on the subject of Mr. Bradlaugh which was passed some time ago by the House. The view held on that side of the House was that the Resolution was illegal in the sense that it was contrary to the statutory law and the statutory rights of Mr. Bradlaugh. Into that he did not wish to enter. As a matter of fact, his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle would not be able to put this Resolution in its present form before the House; he would be obliged to move a Resolution rescinding the previous Resolution; and he confessed that he did not for himself think that the bringing of such a Resolution before the House would in any way tend towards Mr. Bradlaugh taking his seat there. Since the Resolution of last month had been carried the Government had asked leave to bring in a Bill to enable Mr. Bradlaugh to affirm instead of taking the Oath. [Ironical cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite thought it very funny when he mentioned Mr. Bradlaugh; but they knew very well that, although the Bill was a general one, it was specifically stated that it was brought in in order to meet a particular difficulty. [Renewed cheers.] He was astonished hon. Members should cheer that statement. It was well known that that was the reason why it was brought forward at the present moment. Objection was taken, when leave was asked to bring in the Bill, to a Morning Sitting being taken; and hon. Gentlemen stated that they were prepared to sit up all night in order to prevent it. ["No!"] It was within the recollection of the House that hon. Members declared that they would contest the matter during the whole night. ["No, no!"] They thought it more simple to pass the night objecting to a Morning Sitting than to sit the next morning for three or four hours. However, it appeared very evident that the Morning Sitting would be of very little use, because they would then have been favoured with very valuable observations from several Gentlemen, and at 7 o'clock have been very much in the same position, so far as that Bill was concerned. Hon. Gentlemen opposite bore him out that they intended to use the Forms of the House to prevent that Bill being brought in. Under these circumstances, he would ask the Prime Minister what he intended to do with regard to the Parliamentary Oaths Act. He need not say in consequence of Mr. Bradlaugh only, because it concerned the constituency which he (Mr. Labouchere) had the honour to represent. That constituency was naturally anxious that it should have full representation in that House. Mr. Bradlaugh himself was naturally anxious that he should not sit at the further side of that door for ever like a Peri at the gates of Paradise.

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out that I understood the hon. Member to rise to make an appeal to the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle; but no question has been put to the hon. Baronet. No doubt the hon. Member is entitled to make any remarks necessary to make his question plain to the House, but he is going beyond that concession.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, of course he should follow that direction. He was arriving at his Question to his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle, and was trying to clear the ground, and to explain to him what the position was before the Question was put. As he had said, the constituency of Northampton felt deeply grateful to the First Lord of the Treasury and to his Colleagues for what they had done, for the efforts they had made to secure to that constituency their Constitutional rights. At the same time, that constituency, he was happy to say, was a thoroughly Radical constituency, and did not wish to impede the progress of the Land Bill. He would, therefore, venture, in order to clear the matter for the hon. Member for Carlisle, to ask the Prime Minister to be good enough to tell the House, if possible, what course the Government intended to pursue. His constituents were quite willing to wait patiently. But he would venture to ask the Government when the Oaths Bill would be brought in. He would venture to suggest that it should not be brought in until the Land Bill passed. He presumed that after the second reading they would soon be in Committee. He hoped the Bill would be passed in a reasonable time. The Parliamentary Oaths Bill was a Government Bill, and he hoped that the influence of the hon. Member for Carlisle with the Prime Minister would give some expectation that the Bill would soon be submitted to the House, when the House might decide whether to accept or reject it. If he might be allowed to make a suggestion to hon. Members opposite—["No, no!"]

Mr. Labouchere

—he would ask to be allowed to say this. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were not actuated by any personal feeling against Mr. Bradlaugh—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman may make suggestions to the House; but he may not address any particular Members of the House.

COLONEL MAKINS: I rise to Order. The hon. Member for Northampton, at the commencement of his remarks, stated that he would conclude with a Motion. If he does so, I presume he will be in Order? I wish to ask if that is not the case?

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he did not wish to detain the House; but he appealed to the hon. Member for Carlisle and to hon. Gentlemen opposite whether they were actuated by any personal or malevolent feelings towards Mr. Bradlaugh. ["No, no!"] He asked them not to say "No, no!" in a hurry, but to think over the matter; and it was possible that if he was to bring in an Indemnity Bill for Mr. Bradlaugh, and considering that Mr. Bradlaugh was a poor man, as everybody knew—[Cries of "Question!" and "Order!"]*—*and had incurred considerable expense—[Renewed cries of "Order!"]—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is quite out of Order.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then he would ask his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle to withdraw his Motion, and formally begged to move the adjournment of the House.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, he begged to second that Motion, as that was the most orderly course to pursue, and would enable him to state the position in which he and the House stood with regard to the Motion. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman would make a statement adverse to the Bill of the hon. Member for Northampton. With that he had nothing to do. He merely wished to explain why he gave Notice of what he intended to do. The Speaker had read a letter from Mr. Bradlaugh at 12 o'clock on Wednesday, when there was hardly anybody in the House. He asked the Speaker whether the question of Privilege might be brought forward at half-past 4 o'clock, and the Speaker had said that it might. But he thought it better not to do so at once, but to give one or two days' Notice. He waited all that afternoon and found that nobody else took the matter up, and then on the Wednesday he gave Notice of the Motion which stood in his name in the Order Book. Now, that letter of Mr. Bradlaugh was a very important one. There was an important statement in it that the House had done something in absolute defiance of the statute—had, by actual physical force, prevented him from doing the duty imposed upon him by the express words of the statute. Mr. Bradlaugh had requested that the letter should be communicated to the House, and the Speaker had done so. When such a letter came from a Gentleman representing a large constituency, it ought to be dealt with in the House in some way or other. It was a grave charge, a serious charge, and he hoped the House would discuss it in a spirit totally free from bias. There was a real and grave Constitutional question—

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Baronet that it is not regular on a Motion for the Adjournment of the House to discuss a Motion which is on the Paper.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, that the last thing he wished to do was to run counter to the Rules of the House; but he understood that this was a question of Privilege.

MR. SPEAKER: It is not.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, that being the case, he would simply state what he intended to do. He had intended to move a Resolution declaring the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) illegal, because he believed it was illegal; but the Speaker had stated that the most regular course would be to move the rescission of that Resolution. He should have been very glad to have done that that evening; but he thought it would not be quite courteous either to friends or foes to bring that Motion on without due Notice; and it would be very like taking the House by surprise. [Cries of "No, no!" and "Go on!"] Some Members said "No, no!" but that was his humble opinion. But he would tell the House what he would do. He proposed, on some day of which he would give due Notice, to move his Resolution as a matter of Privilege. ["No, no!"] Mr. Speaker had told him that he was in Order. ["No, no!"] Very well, if that was not so, the Speaker could swear him. But he should not move the Resolution if hon. Members opposite would allow the Bill if the Attorney General is ready in for discussion without having recourse to obstructive tactics.

Motion made and Question proposed: "That the House do now adjourn." —
Mr. LAWSON.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he thought that the House must have been greatly misled by those proceedings. The House perhaps without knowing it had been a witness of a most carefully concerted and well-planned conspiracy. The House must bear in mind that Mr. Bradlaugh and his colleagues in all these affairs acted under the inspiration of the Prime Minister and his colleagues. "Conspiracy of Ministers." And the course of events—"Conspiracy of Ministers."—had been extremely well arranged with Mr. Bradlaugh after his expulsion from the House. "Conspiracy of Ministers."

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he rose to Order. He did not know whether he really heard the noble Lord correctly in imputing to the Prime Minister that he had inspired an hon. Member in a disorderly course which had resulted in his expulsion. He would ask whether it was in Order to impute to a Member of that House that he had inspired conduct which had brought down the censure of the House?

MR. GLADSTONE: I venture, Sir, to enlarge the appeal of the hon. and learned Member for Meath. I having stated in my place within no great number of days that I had no communication whatever with Mr. Bradlaugh, I beg to put it to you, Sir, respectfully, but very directly, whether the noble Lord is in Order in stating, in direct contradiction to my assertion, that Mr. Bradlaugh has taken all his steps in this matter under the direct inspiration of the Prime Minister and his Colleagues?

MR. SPEAKER: I am bound to say that, owing to the noise which prevailed at the time the noble Lord was speaking, the words spoken by him did not reach my ear. If the words imputed to him by the hon. and learned Member for Meath (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) were correctly imputed to him, they were quite out of Order.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that after the statement of the Prime Minister he begged to withdraw immediately the statement he made. When he made it, he was bound to say he was perfectly in ignorance of the inspiration the Prime Minister made the other day. He did not recollect it at all. But certainly he never intended to insinuate for a moment that the Prime Minister had any relation with Mr. Bradlaugh in his disorderly proceedings. All he wanted to say was this—that the whole matter pursued by Mr. Bradlaugh had been in a sense always in full the secret of the Government. That was a Parliamentary statement. What had occurred? Mr. Bradlaugh had written a letter to the Speaker after his removal from the House, and the Speaker, in the exercise of his discretion, communicated that letter to the House. He was bound to say there did not appear to him to be anything in that letter which necessitated so formal a communication. It only contained, in a more elaborate and enlarged form, what Mr. Bradlaugh stated at that Table. No doubt Mr. Bradlaugh took that course after consultation with his friends who were friends of great skill and experience, and with the view of raising a discussion. What took place? The hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) immediately said he would call the attention of the House to that letter, and he gave Notice on the same day of a Motion declaring that the Resolution of April 26 was illegal. He would explain to the Prime Minister why he (Lord Randolph Churchill) thought this step was not taken without consultation with some Member of the Government, if not with the Prime Minister. When the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) asked the Prime Minister yesterday what course he proposed to adopt with regard to the Oaths Bill, the Prime Minister said it would be impossible to state that until the House decided upon the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, showing perfectly clearly what it was open to anyone to infer. [Cries of "No, no!"]

MR. NEWDEGATE begged the noble Lord's pardon. What the Prime Minister did say in answer to his Question was that he could not reply to the Question because he did not know what would be done with the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, it was the celebrated difference between tweedledum and tweedledee. There was not the smallest difference whatever. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire put the Question, what course the Government was going to take with the Oaths Bill, and the Prime Minister replied that he could not state until the House had decided upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Carlisle. It was perfectly open to the House to infer that the Motion of the hon. Member for Carlisle was brought forward with the assent of the Government and would receive the Government's support. ["Oh!"] That was the opinion largely shared by hon. Members on this side of the House—that, until the House decided upon that Motion, the Government would not proceed with the Oaths Bill. What had taken place since? It had been ascertained by sources of information open to the Government that if the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle brought forward that Motion, it would be rejected by a large majority, who would not declare their former action to have been arbitrary and illegal; upon which the hon. Member for Northampton—and he asked the House particularly to mark this—got up, and, though doubly interested in getting Mr. Bradlaugh into this House, he appealed to the hon. Member for Carlisle not to bring forward that Resolution, because the Government would not support it, and the Government would not support it because the House was going to reject it. And he wished to point out to the House further, to show how completely the hon. Member for Northampton was in accord with the Government, that he asked the House to postpone legislation in regard to the Oath until the Irish Land Bill should have passed the House—somewhere about July 30 or August 15. The whole transaction, as he had said, was a carefully got-up burlesque. A fly was thrown over the House to ascertain whether, by hook or by crook, Mr. Bradlaugh could be brought into the House. The hon. Member for Carlisle had only for the moment withdrawn his Motion, and now arose the question of procedure. The hon. Member for Carlisle said he would hold his Resolution in terrorem over the House, so that if the House would not agree to any measure initiated or devised by him, he would bring forward his Motion on any day he thought expedient. Mr. Speaker ruled yesterday that the Motion was of a privileged character. In his (Lord Randolph Churchill's) part of the House they did not understand that ruling, for when the Prime Minister last year brought forward a Resolution of an identical character, asking the House to rescind a Resolution of precisely the same kind as this one, Mr. Speaker ruled that it did not partake of a privileged character. They were unable to see the difference between the Motion of the hon. Member for Carlisle and the Motion of the Prime Minister last Session. There could be no doubt whatever that the essence of Privilege was the immediate character of the Question or Motion. The reason of the Privilege was that the nature of the subject was so urgent that it could not wait, and that all other Business must give way before it. The Speaker would, he hoped, rule that if this Motion was not proceeded with at once, it entirely and utterly lost its privilege. That was a point on which he particularly desired a ruling, so that this Motion might not be held over them in terrorem by the hon. Member for Carlisle. He also hoped the Prime Minister would answer the Question put to him by the hon. Member for Northampton, and state the course he proposed to take with the Oaths Bill—whether he intended to put it off till the Greek Kalends, or to take it immediately. There was no use keeping the House in the dark on a subject which, as the hon. Member for Northampton said, involved a great Constitutional question. The hon. Member also asked what would be the fate of any Bill of Indemnity he might bring in? Speaking only for himself, he would be glad to see him introduce the Bill, and would be ready to support him, for there was no doubt the action Mr. Bradlaugh took was entirely owing to the remarkably imprudent advice given by the Law Officers of the Crown; and, Mr. Bradlaugh having acted upon it, the Government must pass a Bill of Indemnity, or put down a Vote for him on the Estimates. No one on the Opposition side of the House would object to such a Bill. Turning to another point, he wished to draw attention to the Resolution under which Mr. Bradlaugh was allowed by the House to affirm. At the instigation of the First Lord of the Treasury, that Resolution had been placed among the Standing Orders of the House. Now, the Courts of Law had declared that Affirmation by Mr. Bradlaugh was illegal; and therefore he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman would move a Resolution proposing that the Motion permitting Mr. Bradlaugh to affirm be expunged from the Records of the House? A Standing Order which invited Members to take action which had been declared illegal, and which subjected them to the heaviest penalties, was a disgrace and discredit to the House of Commons. The First Lord of the Treasury, having compelled the House to place the Standing Order on its Books, was the proper person to move that it be removed.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I shall begin by answering the Question which the noble Lord last put to me, because in his speech he has raised so many points, especially respecting the engagements of the Government, that I am unwilling to delay answering them while they are in my recollection, as otherwise I might forget them. He asks me whether I will move to rescind a very discreditable Resolution, which he says I induced the House to pass. I am not aware of any discreditable Resolution taken by the House at my instigation last year, and I am not aware that it is in my power to compel the House to remove a Resolution from its Records. As regards the Resolution, I have not made any examination of it lately, and therefore if I give a reply now it is subject to correction; but according to my recollection the Resolution simply disclaims a dictum which this House does not possess. [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: The Resolution allows anyone to affirm.] It disclaims any jurisdiction as to whether certain persons are entitled to affirm or not. If you deem that to be a very discreditable Resolution, I am not at present advised, but, subject to consideration and further examination of it, I have no intention of the kind referred to by the noble Lord. The noble Lord, after he had withdrawn one disorderly affirmation under the authority of the Chair, proceeded to other affirmations very much in his own manner. It seems to me that the noble

Lord hazards affirmations upon speculation. Sometimes they refer to what he supposes has been done by individual Members of the Government outside the House; sometimes to what he supposes has been done inside the House itself; and he makes them upon the chance of getting contradicted or not, as the case may be. Well, the noble Lord went stumbling on until he made three assertions about the Government, for not one of which is there the slightest foundation. He says, in the first place, that the Government assented to the proceedings of Mr. Bradlaugh. The Government has assented to no proceedings of Mr. Bradlaugh. ["Oh!"] It is not to assent to the proceedings of any man when you affirm that, in your opinion, the cognizance of that proceeding is beyond your competence and jurisdiction. Our doctrine has been all along that it belongs to others to assent to or dissent from, to authorize or condemn, the proceedings of Mr. Bradlaugh. I hold that that is not a distinction between tweedledum and tweedledee. It is a very broad distinction palpable to the common sense of anyone. But the noble Lord went on to say that we were now acting in concert with my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). That, again, is totally inaccurate. The Order of the Day which was under our charge was postponed before my hon. Friend had made public intimation on the subject of his intention to proceed with a Resolution in this House, and the two matters were totally disconnected. Then the noble Lord says that I stated that it was totally impossible for me to say anything upon the subject of the proposed Oaths Bill until the House should have disposed of the Motion of the hon. Baronet. I said nothing about it being totally impossible. What I said was that, as the Order of the Day stood for next Tuesday, and the Motion of the hon. Baronet for to-day, it appeared to me that it would be convenient that I should watch the fate of that Motion before making any declaration of intentions. The noble Lord also said that we are in concert with the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) in regard to the course which he has taken to-day; but that happens, also, to be totally inaccurate and unfounded. The hon. Member for Northampton courteously made a communication last night to my noble Friend near me (Lord Richard Grosvenor), which was communicated to me a few hours ago. That communication did not at all invite my noble Friend to enter into negotiations with the hon. Member, but announced that the hon. Member intended to-day to make an appeal to the hon. Member for Carlisle. Therefore, Sir, we have no more to do with the proceedings of the hon. Member for Northampton than with the proceedings of the hon. Member for Carlisle. I am bound to say that the Notice of the hon. Member for Northampton did not make any reference and did not include any matter in which I am concerned. It was a Notice that he would make an appeal to the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle; but instead of, or rather in addition to, that, the hon. Member made an appeal to myself. Well, I am about to answer that appeal, which I consider a perfectly legitimate appeal. In order to explain that which I am about to say as to what we propose to do I had better, I think, refer in very few words to that which we have done. When the great difficulty arose, and those scenes, painful to us all, occurred in connection with Mr. Bradlaugh, a question was raised whether that difficulty might not be got rid of on the principle, which has been repeatedly pointed out as the only true basis of dealing with the question—namely, a general measure which would dispose, not only of this particular case, but of all cases that could ever come within a similar category as to the option between taking the Oath and making a Declaration. However, in the state of the Business of the House, and with the sense which I have entertained all along, and which, if possible, increases from day to day, of the paramount importance of the Irish Land Bill, I was not disposed to charge myself or the Government with any new engagement of a serious character—I mean of a character likely to make any sensible demands upon our time. But on communication in various quarters we did certainly receive the impression that a proposal of the nature which has since been indicated by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General was a proposal likely to be opposed by a section of Members of the House, some of whom I see opposite, and who very frankly gave Notice of their intention to that effect;

but that, notwithstanding, the proposal was likely to receive a very large and general assent. [Mr. WARTON: No!] We had that impression, and thought it was correct. I had no doubt that those Members to whom I have referred would have stated their objections in a manly and outspoken way, and that when they found they were not largely supported they would have given way to the general sense and opinion of the House. It was with that expectation that my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General made known to the House his intention to submit a proposal for legislating on the subject; but I am bound to say that we learnt by degrees that our impression did not correspond with the facts. In the first place, we found that hon. Gentlemen opposite were disposed to resist almost en bloc the granting of a Morning Sitting for the purpose of ascertaining the judgment of the House; but I am bound to say—and it would not be candid or ingenuous if we did not admit it—that when we tried that case on a second occasion we were made aware that, while Gentlemen opposite were disposed to assume a large and active share in resistance to a Morning Sitting—which we understood to be resistance to the principle of the Bill—there were many hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House who showed their reluctance, by their absence from the division, to take any part in the matter. That being so, it became clear to me that the subject would require further consideration; and consequently I have arrived at the conclusion that it is our duty to adjourn the further consideration of our course in this matter until we have absolutely, or in substance, disposed of the Irish Land Bill. As far, therefore, as we are concerned, that Order practically will be no more heard of until we have reached that point in our Parliamentary progress.

MR. NEWDEGATE begged to apologize to the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) for having interrupted him while speaking; but he had felt it due to the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, and the House itself, to correct the erroneous impression entertained by the noble Lord as to the nature of the reply to the Question which he (Mr. Newdegate) had addressed to the right hon. Gentleman. He now wished to call attention to this—that the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) seemed to think that he was entitled to keep the question of Privilege as long as he liked in his pocket. This appeared to him (Mr. Newdegate) to be quite contrary to the clear understanding upon which questions of Privilege were raised in the House. He would, therefore, suggest to the hon. Baronet that if he meant to raise the question of Privilege, it would not be respectful to the House if he did not, within the next two or three days, move in the matter. Every question of Privilege took precedence of all other Orders, all other Business in that House; and the House had a right to know when its regular Business was to be thus interfered with and to be superseded. He hoped, therefore, that the hon. Baronet would understand that promptitude in Motions of Privilege was essential. He (Mr. Newdegate) had, during his long experience, known many questions of Privilege raised in the House, and had never known them allowed to stand over more than a day or two. He was afraid that the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had given too accurate a description of the manner in which the question of the alteration of the Oath taken by Members was to be dealt with by the Government. The question was not a small one. A question which affected the constitution of the House was of far greater importance than any Irish question. It was a matter of Imperial importance; and he thought the House had a right to complain of the statement made by the Prime Minister when he told them that he would virtually act upon the advice of his substitute, the hon. Member for Northampton—and who seemed to expect to be his successor—that he should press the Irish Land Bill forward, and, when the House became thin and weak at the end of the Session, then proceed with the Oaths Bill, as the hon. Member for Northampton had informed them, de die in diem. This suggestion—that Her Majesty's Ministers should take advantage of the House—would not, he hoped, be accepted by the Government. Throughout the country this question as to the Parliamentary Oath was regarded as one of the greatest importance. He received letters on the question day by day; some of them expressing a hope that he would vote in favour of a measure to admit the elected Member for Northampton to a seat in the House, some accompanied by threats. But the vast majority of the communications he received deprecated, in terms which did high honour to the writers, the proposal to introduce a Bill for the admission to a seat in that House of a person who was not allowed to take an oath in a Court of Law, and whom the Courts of Law had decided to be unfit to pronounce the solemn affirmation which, by law, was in some cases substituted for the oath. The feeling of the country was opposed to any such proceeding; and, while he hoped the House would insist that the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle should not continue to trifle with the question of Privilege, he desired to say, on behalf of the great majority of those from whom he had received communications on the subject, that they would regard it as a grave departure from his duty by the Prime Minister if he attempted, by deferring the question and taking advantage of the weakness of the House late in the Session, to pass a measure which they firmly believed would powerfully affect and would essentially damage the constitution of the House of Commons.

COLONEL MAKINS said, that yesterday the Speaker had intimated his opinion that the word "illegal" had better be expunged from the Resolution, because the word might be misconstrued to mean a want of respect to the House. The hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle had not, however, withdrawn the word, and it had even been repeated by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. If the former Resolution of the House were illegal, there must be a remedy, and if there were no remedy there could be no illegality. It was not only disrespectful to the House to use such a term as "illegal," but it was an absolute absurdity to put such a Resolution as that of the hon. Member for Carlisle on the Order Book of the House.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, he had heard with no satisfaction that the hon. Member for Carlisle did not intend to proceed with his Motion, for the discussion of which he had come prepared.

The sitting Member for Northampton asserted that that borough was at present inadequately represented; but he did himself injustice in that assertion, for no borough could be more efficiently represented, according to the views of the majority, than that which he represented. It was now evident that the Government Bill was to be introduced, not to deal with the subject of the Parliamentary Oath generally, but specially with the object of relieving and with introducing into that House the unqualified Member for Northampton. He denied that there was any foundation for the insinuation which had been brought against the Members of the Opposition, that they were actuated in this matter by feelings of malevolence towards Mr. Bradlaugh. What they were actuated by was a desire to prevent the House being implicated in a great insult offered to Almighty God. Judging from what he had heard from hon. Members on both sides of the House, the Prime Minister and the Attorney General would, if they attempted to force this Bill through the House and went to a division, be very much surprised to see the defections in the ranks of their supporters. This question was of a very much larger character than those who sat upon the Treasury Bench appeared to think, and he was perfectly satisfied that if time were given for the object of the measure to be fully understood throughout the country, such a feeling would be excited against it that the Prime Minister would be only too glad to wash his hands of it altogether, and to go on with the Public Business of the House.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he would not have taken part in this discussion had it not been for an observation which had just fallen from the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman was in such a hurry the other day to introduce this Bill, that he was desirous of putting the House to very considerable inconvenience to carry out that object, and it was only in consequence of the feeling manifested on the part of a large number of hon. Members on both sides of the House that he withdrew his demand for a Morning Sitting on Tuesday for the purpose of bringing in this Bill for the relief of the junior Member for Northampton. But although the right hon. Gentleman had been in such a hurry to bring in this Bill at that time, he now appeared to be desirous of putting off its introduction to the Greek Kalends. The right hon. Gentleman, not, perhaps, exactly by design, but at all events by the result of his action, now left the House at the mercy of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, who said in substance that he would not bring on his Motion then, but would flutter with it over the House during the whole of the Session, ready to swoop down on some private Members' night, and to bring it forward as a question of Privilege in the hope of snatching a division on it. In these circumstances, he desired to put a Question of Order to the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair. Last year, when the Prime Minister brought forward his rescinding Motion, the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair ruled that it could not be brought forward as a question of Privilege. Mr. Bradlaugh having written a letter a few days since to the Speaker, the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair ruled that the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle in reference to it was one of Privilege, which would take precedence of other Business. Doubtless the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair had some good reason for this apparent divergence in his ruling. It was laid down in the work which he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) made his principal study, Sir Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, that a question of Privilege was treated as urgent because it was necessary that it should be decided at once. He could understand the right hon. Gentleman's ruling yesterday, because Mr. Bradlaugh's interests, which were paramount with the Government, required that the matter should be treated as one of urgency. But in that case surely the question should have been brought forward and decided at once. He could not understand, however, a question of Privilege being allowed to hang over the House week after week, like the sword of Damocles, to be brought on at any unguarded moment. He, therefore, begged to ask the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair to give a decision on the point, because although it might be very convenient to the Government to postpone the introduction of this Bill to some indefinite date, and to the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle to have his little flutter, such a course would not tend either to the convenience or the dignity of the House.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Portsmouth, who spoke last, has referred to the valuable work of Sir Erskine May in connection with this matter, and I cannot do better than read the paragraph bearing on this question. It is as follows:—

“In order to enable a question of Privilege to be discussed it must refer to some matter that has recently arisen which directly concerns the Privileges of the House, and calls for its present interposition.”

When I communicated to the House on Wednesday last that I had received a letter from Mr. Bradlaugh, the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle asked me whether a Motion founded on that letter would take precedence as a matter of Privilege. Founding myself on the passage I have just read, I had no hesitation in telling the hon. Baronet that such a Motion properly framed and founded on that letter would have precedence. The question then arose whether the matter could be treated as a question of Privilege on a future day, and I stated that it appeared to me if it were put off for the convenience of the House the hon. Baronet would not forfeit his claim by so doing. The hon. Member for Portsmouth draws my attention to what occurred last year. I then stated from the Chair, in reference to the Motion of the First Lord of the Treasury as to the case of Mr. Bradlaugh, that it was not a case of Privilege and could not have precedence. That case and the case now under the consideration of the House are very different. In the first place, the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman referred to other Members as well as to the case of Mr. Bradlaugh. That case had been before two Select Committees, and also in various forms before the House for some months, and it could not be said to be a Motion of that character which required the instant interposition of the House, or that it was of such a kind that it was entitled to have precedence as a question of Privilege.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I interpose reluctantly in this debate; but it is really important that we should know what we have to expect. The proceedings of the House with regard to Mr. Bradlaugh are perfectly well known to everybody, and they have taken this form—the House has refused to allow Mr. Bradlaugh to go through the form of taking the Oath, and he having refused to accept the decision of the House as legally binding and having resisted the authority of yourself, Sir, the House has come to a Resolution by which Mr. Bradlaugh is excluded from its precincts until he shall engage not to disturb the order of the House. So far, therefore, we stand upon a footing which enables us to carry on our Business properly. I say nothing with regard to the proposal which the Government have made to introduce a Bill to deal with the question of the Parliamentary Oath further than this, that I entirely protest against the doctrine laid down very boldly, distinctly, and repeatedly by the hon. Member for Northampton that the Bill is one for the relief of Mr. Bradlaugh personally. That was a very distinct statement made by the hon. Member. If that is the light in which the Bill is to be viewed, I venture to say that the objections to it will become infinitely more serious than those which would, in any circumstances, be taken to it as a proposal to alter the Oath. That, however, is a question which we now understand the Government are not prepared to press forward at the present time, although they give us notice that they will take it up by-and-bye, when they shall have got through certain other Business. We desire to know what in the meantime is to be our modus vivendi with regard to the interruption of our Business, not by Mr. Bradlaugh himself, but by his Colleague and his Friends, who may from time to time bring forward Motions on which the Resolution of the 26th of April may be discussed over and over again? We must clearly have some understanding on this subject. The hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle stated that his course with respect to his Motion must depend upon the course which the Government might take with regard to the Parliamentary Oath.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: What I meant to say was that my bringing forward of the rescinding Resolution would depend on the amount of obstruction given to the Attorney General's Bill.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I am more puzzled than ever. The Irish Land Bill is nothing to it. Are we or are we not to be subject to continual

Sir H. Drummond Wolff

Motions as to the illegality, or the supposed illegality, of the Resolution of the House; and is the power of making Motions on the subject to be a continuous power? Is it a power that will continue for an indefinite series of weeks or months? If there is an immediate necessity of dealing with the question, no doubt we ought to proceed to consider it. I can quite understand that it might be so held—that the letter of Mr. Bradlaugh raised a question which seemed to touch the Privileges of the House, and it might be a very proper and necessary thing to take notice of it. But if it is a matter for weeks, possibly even for a longer time, I think that seems to have disposed of any claim of precedence which could possibly be made by the hon. Gentleman. This is a question which, whatever we may say of the views taken on one side or the other, deeply interests us, and deeply interests the country. It would be scandalous if a sudden decision were taken on a question of this sort without a full and proper opportunity for considering it. I cannot for a moment believe that the hon. Baronet would wish to obtain a decision in that way; but what we want to know is whether the hon. Baronet will give a distinct assurance that, under the circumstances as they stand, it is not his intention—or if it is his intention we should be glad to know whether it would be with your sanction, Sir, that such a step should be taken—to bring forward his Motion and to claim precedence?

MR. WHITBREAD said, that Mr. Speaker had ruled that it was perfectly competent for the hon. Baronet, or for any other hon. Member, to have brought this question forward upon the reading of Mr. Bradlaugh's letter as a question of Privilege, and that he did not forfeit that right by postponing it for a reasonable time and for the convenience of the House; but he submitted that it would be a straining of that power beyond what was right and proper for the hon. Baronet to say he would bring forward his Motion at some indefinite and distant day when it might suit his convenience. The hon. Baronet further weakened his case by attempting to couple with it a sort of condition that his bringing it forward would depend very much upon the conduct of the Opposition. He (Mr. Whitbread) was of opinion that the hon. Baronet had, by the course he had taken, really forfeited his right to bring his Motion forward on some future day.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, he understood from what had passed from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) that it would be a very abnormal course if he followed out what he suggested in his former speech. He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) wished to take that course, because he thought it better that full Notice should be given of the rescinding of a Resolution. He believed he did not withdraw the Motion. Therefore, in that case, it dropped, and he should not be able to take that course. But, as Notice was given that night that he should call attention to Mr. Bradlaugh's letter, he should like to ask whether, after what had taken place, he should be allowed then that evening—[Cries of "No, no!" and "Yes!"]
—whether he should then be allowed to move on the letter these words—

"That the Resolution of April 26, 1881, forbidding Mr. Bradlaugh to take the Oath, be rescinded as subversive of the rights of the whole body of electors?"

MR. SPEAKER: The course proposed to be taken by the hon. Baronet must be subject to the usual Rules in regard to alterations of Notices of Motion that have been placed before the House. Now, it appears to me that there is one expression which I caught from the hon. Baronet which certainly imports into the Resolution new matter. Thus he speaks of the proceedings of this House as subversive—perhaps the hon. Baronet will read it again.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, the Motion he read was an exact copy of a Motion passed in 1781, with the exception of the word "subversive," which he substituted for the word "expunged." It was as follows:—

"That the Resolution of April 26, 1881, forbidding Mr. Bradlaugh to take the Oath, be rescinded as subversive of the rights of the whole body of electors."

MR. SPEAKER: The point I have to consider is this, whether the Resolution in its altered form imports new matter not contained in the original Resolution; and in the original Resolution there was no expression whatever with regard to the rights of electors. I think if the hon. Baronet was to—if he will allow me to say so—terminate the Resolution at the word "rescinded," he would be quite in Order.

MR. LEWIS said, he should like to call attention to the position which the House was then in. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the House that the Motion now before it is one for adjournment.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, he had supposed that this Motion for rescinding the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, arising, as it did, upon the letter which had been received from Mr. Bradlaugh, would be considered a question of Privilege, and that he should have the opportunity of proceeding with it after the Motion for the adjournment of the House had been disposed of.

MR. SPEAKER: I am of opinion that if the hon. Baronet put his Motion in a regular form, he will be entitled to bring it on as a question of Privilege.

MR. LEWIS said, he wished to draw attention to the serious position in which they were now involved by the most extraordinary proceedings of that evening. After the speech of the Prime Minister, quite 50 Members disappeared from the Conservative Benches in consequence of the statement, most distinctly made by the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, that it was not his intention to proceed with his Motion that night. Under these circumstances, he hoped a mine would not be sprung on absent Members. It would be foreign to the spirit of the House, and opposed to all gentlemanly feeling, to discuss the Motion then; although to do so might possibly be only of a piece with the whole of that wretched affair. On Wednesday afternoon, after a long debate, the hon. Member for Northampton, who was sitting on the opposite side of the House, got up and said distinctly that he understood it to be the general feeling of the House that some measure should be introduced for the purpose of getting rid of the difficulty. Other Members got up and repudiated that suggestion. The noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) distinctly declined to promise on his own part, or on the part of those who sat near him, support to any such measure. He (Mr. Lewis) ventured to get up, and, amid cheers, declined to have anything to do with that Bill, but claimed to be at liberty to oppose it at every stage. On the present occasion they were told that, after all, this question was to be introduced as a question of Privilege. He trusted the hon. Member for Carlisle would at once see the impropriety of proceeding in the way he had suggested. He desired to draw the Speaker's attention to a matter which appeared to have escaped his recollection, although it had been referred to by one or two Members. It was, whether, if the hon. Baronet did not proceed with his Motion for a week, a fortnight, or three weeks hence, it would still be competent for him to claim Privilege for it?

MR. SPEAKER: I thought I had made it plain that the hon. Baronet could not postpone indefinitely a Motion founded on the letter of Mr. Bradlaugh, and still claim precedence for it as a matter of Privilege.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, in answer to an appeal from the hon. Member for Northampton, had distinctly intimated to the House that he would withdraw his Motion. He, therefore, wished to ask the Speaker whether it was competent for the hon. Baronet first to give Notice of withdrawing a Motion, and then capriciously to declare his intention of bringing that Motion on at a later hour of the night, especially when a number of Members had left the House in consequence of his intimation that it would be withdrawn?

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, he was anxious to put a stop to that controversy. He withdrew his Motion at the beginning of the evening on the understanding, as he then thought, that he should be able to bring it on in a few days' or a week's time. In the course of the discussion it appeared that he could not do so, and then it occurred to him that he might not get another chance, and that it would be better that he should that night make the Motion, the terms of which he had read to the House. But it was stated that hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House had gone away not expecting the Motion to come on; and, therefore, although Members on his side might be ready to discuss the question, he did not think it would be fair to proceed with it that night, as that course might be held to be a surprise. Whether he should be able to bring the question on another night was another matter.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, the Bill of the Government had been described as a Bill for the relief of Mr. Bradlaugh—[Cries of "Order!"]—but it was not specially for that Gentleman's relief. [Renewed cries of "Order!"] He asked leave to withdraw the Motion for adjournment.

MR. BIGGAR said, that before the discussion closed he wanted to say that the wasting of time on a question of this sort came with a very bad grace from the Government. They had arrested his friend John Dillon at a period when a subject in which he was deeply interested was being discussed in this House, and they had thus partially disfranchised Tipperary. There was nothing of remarkable interest for the borough of Northampton coming on, so far as they knew, during the present Session; and he would therefore suggest that the question of the disfranchisement of that constituency should be allowed to stand over until next Session.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY remarked, that many Gentlemen on that (the Ministerial) side did not view the Bill of the Government as a Bill for the relief of Mr. Bradlaugh, but as a Bill for the relief of the House of Commons from the difficulty in which it had placed itself. He believed that Mr. Bradlaugh was legally entitled to take his seat, and that the House had placed an illegal impediment in the way of his doing so. The House of Commons had before then committed itself in an unguarded moment, and been afterwards obliged to eat its words. He believed that the same thing was likely to happen again, and that, unless some means were found for getting out of the difficulty, the House would appear in a humiliating position before the country.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Lord KENSINGTON) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as followeth:—

I have received your Address praying that I will give directions that a Monument be erected in the Collegiate Church of Saint Peter, Westminster, to the Memory of the late Right Honble. Earl of Beaconsfield, K.G., with an Inscription expressive of the high sense entertained by the House of Commons of his rare and splendid gifts, and of his devoted labours in Parliament and in great Offices of State; and assuring Me that you will make good the expenses attending the same.

And I shall give directions in accordance with your Address.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE AND COMMERCE.—RESOLUTION.

SIR MASSEY LOPES, in rising, pursuant to Notice, to move—

"That it is desirable that the functions of the Executive Government which especially relate to Agriculture and Commerce should, as far as possible, be administered by a distinct department, and be presided over by a responsible Minister of the Crown," said, that he could claim no novelty for the subject-matter of the Resolution which he was about to submit to the consideration of the House. The subject had been frequently discussed before both in that House and also outside its walls. The two Chambers which represented respectively the interests of Agriculture and of Commerce had urged upon successive Governments the necessity of appointing a Minister with a distinct Department, whose special business it would be to watch over the combined interests of Agriculture and Commerce. Joint deputations from those Institutions had repeatedly gone to the Government and endorsed and advocated that policy; and during the last Parliament a Resolution very similar to the one which he had now the honour to submit to the House was proposed by Mr. Sampson Lloyd, the late Member for Plymouth, in a most able and exhaustive speech. That Motion was supported by hon. Members on both sides of the House, and carried by a considerable majority. But the matter had dropped, and nothing further had been done. On that occasion, there was no difference of opinion with reference to the main issue—namely, the appointment of a special Minister;

but some exception was taken with regard to the latter part of the Resolution, which made it imperatively necessary that the Minister who presided over the combined interests of Agriculture and Commerce should be a Cabinet Minister. He (Sir Massey Lopes) did not intend to attach that condition to the present Resolution, not because he did not think it necessary that a Minister presiding over the combined interests of Agriculture and Commerce should be a Minister of the first rank, but because he felt that if those combined interests were to be represented by a Minister with a separate Department, the position of that Minister must necessarily be paramount. That would follow as a necessary and natural consequence, as a simple and certain corollary. It was quite right that a Prime Minister should be able to exercise some discretion in the selection of his Cabinet; but no Prime Minister, be he ever so popular or powerful, would be able to resist public opinion; and though it might be invidious to particularize, all must admit that the combined interests of Agriculture and Commerce would have far higher claims to be represented in a Cabinet than many of those Offices which had hitherto enjoyed, or even now enjoyed, that distinction. This was no Party question. It was a question of policy rather than of Party, and one in which both sides and all sections of the House took an interest. The days were, happily, past when the interests of Agriculture and Commerce were supposed to be antagonistic. Their interests were so interwoven and dependent one upon another, that they both considered that there would be a mutual advantage in one Department representing their interests. There was no feeling of jealousy or rivalry between Agriculture and Commerce, and the same Minister could supervise both interests. In pressing this Motion, it was hardly necessary to dwell upon the magnitude of the interests of Agriculture and Commerce, or to attempt to show that these combined interests were of sufficient importance to justify this special consideration. These two industries were the bases of our power as a nation; they were the source and foundation of all our national wealth; the welfare and prosperity of all classes were dependent upon them, and there was scarcely a person in the Kingdom who was not directly or indirectly maintained and supported by them. If they were to leave out of consideration the bare naked land, and to estimate the amount of capital invested in agriculture, they would have some idea of the magnitude of the interests involved. It was calculated that the amount of capital which had been invested in agriculture by the owners was £400,000,000. This might be called the fixed capital. Then there was the occupiers' capital, which was the movable capital, and that had been put at £380,000,000; so that they had the total of £780,000,000 invested by owners and occupiers, not taking into consideration the value of the bare naked land. On the authority of Mr. Caird, the average annual value of agricultural produce was £300,000,000. He need hardly say the last four or five years would hardly come up to the average. These Islands produced more produce for their extent and area of their cultivated land than any other country on the globe. England was admitted to be the greatest commercial country in the world. With reference to its commerce, it was easy to calculate the amount of capital, because they had the figures of the Board of Trade. The amount of the exports and imports for the last year amounted to £686,000,000. This total was made up of imports, £410,000,000; exports of British and Irish produce, £223,000,000; and the remaining £53,000,000 represented goods, Colonial and Foreign, imported into this country and exported again from it. These figures would give some idea of the magnitude of the interests involved. He would endeavour to advance a few reasons why they should have a distinct Department for Commerce and Agriculture, presided over by a responsible Minister in this country. There was a strong feeling abroad that the existing machinery of the Executive Government for these objects was incomplete, inadequate, and inefficient. There was a general impression that many functions which the State ought to exercise with regard to Agriculture and Commerce were either inefficiently performed or altogether neglected; that these interests were too important to be dealt with by subordinate Departments; that they suffered from inadequate representation; that there was no special or individual responsibility; that as commercial and agricultural interests had, by means of Chambers, for years past organized themselves and adopted representative institutions, that there should also be a separate Department of the Government to which they might communicate their wants and wishes, and that, by this means, a more ready intercourse and interchange of opinion might be effected, which would be conducive to the interests of all concerned; that if such a Department had existed, it would have been able to have given valuable assistance to the Royal Commission now sitting, by collecting and forwarding evidence and giving its opinion respecting the causes of the present depression. Why was England the only important country that had not a responsible Minister and a distinct Department to supervise these two important interests? Other countries had adopted the system which he advocated; it had been found satisfactory and successful; and he was at a loss to know why they should be the only country in the world to neglect taking this prudent step. France, Austria, Germany, Belgium, Italy, Holland, almost every civilized State, and even Japan, had a Minister whose duty it was to attend to these great Departments; and the United States, our chief competitor in all agricultural produce, had a separate Department for Agriculture. His hon. Friend the Member for Mid Somerset (Mr. R. H. Paget) had asked a Question with regard to certain interesting documents relating to Agriculture in the United States; and some of those Papers were now in the Library, and they were most interesting. This Department in the United States superintended everything connected with Agriculture; it diffused the most useful information respecting seeds, plants, and manures; it reported annually to Congress, not only with reference to its own agriculture, but of that of all other foreign countries. Surely we, who are suffering so severely from this competition, needed equal facilities and opportunities. There was plenty of information to be got; but in this country it was no one's business to procure it. The Reports sent home by our Consuls were seldom tabulated or utilized. Had responsibility attached to one Department, greater attention would have been paid to our foreign Tariffs; our Commercial Treaties would have been more carefully considered;

our Colonies would not have established hostile Tariffs against the Mother Country; we should have made more favourable terms for our manufactures when we repealed the Sugar Duties in 1864. But these would not have been all the advantages. We would not have had the Bankruptcy Laws, which were a scandal to this country, so long unsettled. Because no one Department was individually responsible for these matters our national interests had severely suffered; nay, more, they had been seriously imperilled. He wished to say something as to the anomalies of the present system. Those anomalies were palpable and patent to all. The various duties of the different Departments connected with Agriculture and Commerce were absurdly incongruous. Their affairs were distributed over so many Departments of the Government—which had no relation with one another—that it was impossible to get information without great inconvenience and loss of time. For instance, if one wanted to get any information about the Diseases of Cattle, he was referred to the Minister who looked after Art and Science, Education, and Religion; if one wished to hear something about Agricultural Statistics or Corn Returns, he was referred to the Minister whose main duty it was to look after Railways and Ships; while the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Dodson), to whom they looked for information with regard to Public Highways, Roads, and Bridges, had for his main duty to look after Paupers. The result was that they never knew from what Member of the Government agricultural legislation was to come. The Agricultural Holdings Act was introduced in the last Government by his late lamented Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Hunt). But the greatest anomaly of all was the Board of Trade. The Board of Trade was a mythical body. It contained no Department of Trade at all. It was no Board. It never met as a Board. He believed the Lord Chancellor was a member of the Board, and also the Speaker; but he would not venture to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he ever attended the Board. He contended that the designation was obsolete, and that it ought to be abolished. The Board of Trade, as it at present existed, had neither the necessary organization, nor did it possess the requisite power, to carry out its important functions. In the Board of Trade they had no Commercial Department to look after the Indian or Colonial Trade, or Commercial Treaties, or their Tariffs at home or abroad. If any illustrious foreigner were to ask any Member of the House the simple question, What Department of the Government in this country directed our commercial policy; or what provision was made with respect to our agricultural interests? he thought there would be considerable difficulty in giving any satisfactory response. The answer might be, "No one;" or "the Executive;" or "the Government generally," or, perhaps, "the Cabinet." If the latter were the correct answer, it might be thought to be another illustration of the truth of the old adage, that what was "everybody's business was nobody's." If the responsibility was distributed among the 12 or 14 Gentlemen who generally composed a Cabinet, each of whom had specific duties in his own Department, and more than sufficient to monopolize his entire time and attention, it would only be natural that they would postpone and neglect the consideration of those duties for which they were not individually responsible, and that, at all events, they would be inefficiently discharged. But he might be told that it was easy to criticize. What remedy did he suggest? It was not his duty to propose a remedy for an acknowledged grievance. His only object was to persuade the Government that the difficulty of arranging those matters was not insuperable; and if he ventured to suggest what duties might be transferred to a new Department, it must be understood that he was not attempting to lay down any hard-and-fast line, or desiring to dictate to those in authority. To carry out his object, he did not consider it would be necessary to re-organize all the other Departments, or to re-adjust their duties. It would not even be necessary to create a new Department; but it would be absolutely necessary that all the functions relating to Agriculture and Commerce, which at present were so irregularly and unsystematically administered, should be concentrated in one and the same Department. It was not necessary to create new work, but only to redistribute existing work. They wanted one Minister with two separate or dis-tingent Departments, each Department possessing separate and permanent official Staffs; one Department dealing exclusively with agricultural subjects, the other with commercial matters; and under the Minister he would like to see a Parliamentary Secretary attached to each Department. The Agricultural Department might include—(1.) Supervision of traffic, transit, and diseases of Stock, now under the Privy Council Office; (2.) the duties now discharged by the Copyhold Tithe and Inclosure Commissioners, and also agricultural legislation, now under the Home Office; (3.) the classification and circulation of all information received from Consular Agents, as well as the collection, tabulation, and publication of Agricultural Statistics and Corn Returns, now under the Board of Trade; and (4.) the administration of roads, highways, and bridges, now under the Local Government Board, might properly be transferred to this Department. All these Departments were at present heavily weighted; and their duties would be somewhat diminished, with benefit to themselves and with great advantage to the public. His hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) would be more competent, as President of the Chambers of Commerce, to define the duties which should be transferred to the Commercial Department; but all would agree that they should include Tariff regulations at home and abroad, Treaties of Commerce, factory labour, &c. These new Departments should not be overburdened at first; they should grow gradually, and work should be transferred to them tentatively and by degrees. It had been said that at present the different Commercial and Agricultural Societies furnished more information of statistical and other kinds to the Board of Trade than the latter did to them. The Royal Agricultural Society had been of great use in that respect. Questions were often submitted by the Board of Trade to Agricultural Societies. He thought in those matters reciprocity should be established. There was only one industry in the country which was to any considerable extent supported by the Government, and that was mining. We wanted, in short, all matters connected with these two interests concentrated into one Department, where all legislative and administrative questions

connected with them would be dealt with. We wanted one recognized authority, who would institute inquiries and initiate measures calculated to promote their welfare. We wanted to fix and concentrate responsibility. If the functions of the Executive Government were collected into one group, instead of being scattered over so many Departments, they could be more easily and efficiently managed. At present, there was no system or symmetry. There was a total absence of homogeneous classification. The affairs of Agriculture and Commerce were divided between the Home Office, Foreign Office, Board of Trade, Privy Council Office, and Local Government Board. We had separate Departments for Foreign, Colonial, and Indian affairs, for our Army and Navy; why should not the same care and distinction be given to these two important industries? It might, no doubt, be said that our Agriculture and Commerce had prospered without the interference of Government agency; but never, in recent times, had there been so great an agricultural depression as existed now. He did not think that the mere recurrence of bad seasons was a sufficient explanation of that depression. Foreign competition, which every year was becoming more keen and severe, and of which they could scarcely predicate the extent or result, was, no doubt, the chief cause of our suffering. All classes interested in the land were looking forward to the future with intense anxiety, and with no very sanguine expectations. Few farmers had made any profits the last four or five years; too many had been living on their capital, which was well nigh exhausted; and, to the great majority, another bad season would bring absolute ruin. In every county they heard of farms untenanted, but, what was worse, uncultivated, of insolvent tenants, and reduced landlords, and on many estates reduced rents barely paid the interests of mortgages and of charges settled upon them. Nor were the accounts received of the state of trade at all more encouraging. The Board of Trade Returns for the month of April showed a deficit of £1,500,000 of exports of British and Irish produce and manufactures, compared with the corresponding period of last year; and the Returns for the last four months were equally discouraging, showing a deficit of £500,000. It was found that our exports steadily diminished, and our imports increased. He did not feel so sanguine as some did with reference to any general revival of trade. He would ask what manufacturing industry was at present prospering? Was it the woollen trade of Bradford, where thousands of work-people were weekly leaving these shores to seek their fortunes elsewhere? Was it the sugar, or the silk trade? Was it the cotton trade? If the production had not diminished, one thing was certain, that the profits were considerably less. Formerly, English Commerce had a monopoly; it was without a rival. Now, owing to Free Trade, and facilities of intercourse by sea and by land, foreign competition was pressing hard on home producers in their home markets. He did not wish to substitute State protection for private energy and enterprise; but he was of opinion that every reasonable facility and opportunity must be given, every impediment must be removed, if they were to hold their own in the unequal race in which Agriculture and Commerce were now embarked. He hoped that he should not receive from the Government the usual stereotyped answer, or a mere vague assurance that the question should be carefully considered. It had been taken up by the majority of the Chambers of Commerce throughout the country, and "carefully considered" by successive Governments for the last 20 years; and in 1879 a majority of that House declared in favour of the principles which he attempted to advocate; and outside those walls this proposal had the sanction of public opinion. In 1869, the then President of the Board of Trade (Mr. John Bright) said that he would strongly recommend a consideration of the question now before the House by the separate Departments, and he promised some reforms. Nothing, however, had been done, though 12 years had elapsed. In the absence, therefore, of a very clear and sufficient statement from the First Lord of the Treasury, he should consider it his duty to divide the House at the conclusion of the debate. It was no good to attempt to patch up the present system. That had been tried in 1864, and had failed. They could not afford to wait any longer. Foreign politics had necessarily of late years monopolized their time and attention. It was now time to look at home, and after their own interests. Those important industries, Agriculture, Trade, and Commerce — the source of all our national greatness—were unanimously of opinion that by such means only as he had attempted to indicate could a satisfactory consideration of their interests be secured, and they asked the Government, the Executive of the British House of Commons and of the country, to grant them a boon which they confidently believe would not only tend to further their interests, but also tend to promote the welfare and prosperity of all classes in the United Kingdom. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. MONK said, he had much pleasure in seconding the Resolution. He should, however, have preferred a Resolution stating the expediency of giving Cabinet rank to a Minister of Agriculture and Commerce. His hon. Friend (Sir Massy Lopes) had referred to the sanction given by the late House of Commons to a similar proposal in 1879, which was brought forward by Mr. Sampson Lloyd, and adopted after a long discussion. It had become his (Mr. Monk's) duty in February last to transmit to the Prime Minister a Memorial from the Association of Chambers of Commerce in favour of the appointment of a Minister of Commerce and Agriculture. At the same time, he pointed out to the Prime Minister that the Resolution of 1879 had remained for nearly two years unchallenged in the Journals of the House, and reminded him that it had been supported by the right hon. Gentleman the present Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster), by the right hon. Gentleman the present Vice President of the Privy Council (Mr. Mundella), and by the hon. and learned Gentleman the present Solicitor General (Sir Farrer Herschell), while no single Member of the present Government voted against it. The hon. Member for South Devon had made out an excellent case in favour of entrusting agricultural interests to a separate Department of the State. He pointed out the strong objections that existed to the interests of Agriculture being confided to three or four separate Departments. If that were so with regard to Agriculture, how much more was it the case with regard to the commercial interests of the country? The Board of Trade, the Foreign Office, the Colonial Office, and, he believed, the Lord Chancellor, with the Law Officers of the Crown, shared the cares and responsibilities of watching over the interests of Trade and Commerce in this country. The services of so many Departments being called in, the results were not likely to be satisfactory. His hon. Friend had shown that this was not the case in other countries. In France, Germany, Austria, Italy, and Belgium, the interests of Commerce and Agriculture were considered of sufficient importance to be confided to a special Department of the State. Some years ago—in 1864—the relations between the Board of Trade and the Foreign Office with reference to Commercial Treaties were considered by a Committee presided over by his (Mr. Monk's) right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster); and in consequence of their Report a Commercial Department was established in the Foreign Office. To some extent that had proved an improvement. No one, he was sure, whose duties had brought him into contact with the Under Secretary of State (Sir Charles W. Dilke) could fail to give him credit for zeal, courtesy, and singular ability. The same might be said of Mr. Kennedy, at the Foreign Office. But, in spite of all that, the arrangement had not proved quite successful. If he (Mr. Monk) were asked why, he should say there was too much mystery about the Foreign Office. A diplomatic atmosphere pervaded it which commercial men found absolutely chilling. They had an instinctive dread of the Foreign Office, and preferred resorting for counsel to the Board of Trade; but the duties of that Department had been so largely increased by recent legislation in reference to Merchant Shipping, Railways, and other matters, that it would be impossible to convert it into a Ministry of Commerce and Agriculture. There was ample room for a new Department. If he might be allowed to throw out a hint, he would venture to suggest that the noble Lord, so long and honourably connected with the Board of Trade, who had recently received the appointment of Lord Privy Seal (Lord Carlingford), must feel a thirst for work, and feel humiliated by occupying a sinecure Office, or, at all events, at the prospect of doing the work of odd man in the Cabinet. In conclusion, he would remind the Prime Minister that legislation was hanging fire, that the Bankruptcy Bill had made no progress, that the Law of Partnership required consolidation and amendment, that the Patent Laws required revision, while Bills of Sale were a scandal and a disgrace under the present law; and last—not least—the question of a new Anglo-French Commercial Treaty must be decided within a very few weeks. Under these circumstances, he expressed a hope that the Prime Minister would give his sanction to a Motion which had received the support of a Member of the Cabinet and of other Members of the Government.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is desirable that the functions of the Executive Government which especially relate to Agriculture and Commerce should, as far as possible, be administered by a distinct department, and be presided over by a responsible Minister of the Crown,"—(Sir Massey Lopes),

—instead thereof.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, when I heard the proposal of the hon. Member opposite (Sir Massey Lopes) described to me at the outset in general terms, I was afraid it was of a character similar to that of 1879, which undoubtedly it would have been my duty to resist. I could not, in any circumstances, consent to any Parliamentary Resolution going to determine by a vote of this House who should be, under all circumstances, constituent Members of the Cabinet. I shall not trouble the House with my reasons; but they are grave and serious. However, I am perfectly satisfied with the manner in which the hon. Member opposite has framed the Resolution and stated his case. What the hon. Member states is—"I am satisfied that there will be such a development of these functions, if you will only allow it, that the importance of the Minister will bring about a state of public opinion which will involve a sure corollary that the man who has such functions to discharge must be a Member of the Cabinet." Upon that footing I am perfectly ready to leave the matter. I am not so sanguine as the

hon. Member may be as to the very rapid and early accumulation of those functions; but it is a perfectly fair statement. Then, again, the hon. Gentleman has very judiciously said that this is to be a union, "as far as possible," of the functions relating to Commerce and to Agriculture by a distinct Department under a responsible Minister of the Crown. I think that we have advanced a little further in this direction—a little further than the hon. Gentleman is, perhaps, aware of. There is certainly nothing unreasonable in the general proposition that those functions of Trade and Commerce should be associated together in the same Department. To that general proposition, qualified as it is by the practical consideration involved in the words "as far as possible," we are ready to assent. Let me, in passing, express regret that the hon. Gentleman should, as is not unnatural for him to do, have imported into this discussion references to the present state of Agriculture, which I agree with him in deploring. I am only sorry for it on this ground, that I fear lest it should lead to expectations in connection with his Motion, which expectations, if they presume that any great and rapid improvement will be brought about by any administrative change we could make, would be soon turned to bitter disappointment. I do not know whether the hon. Member is quite accurate in all his references to foreign countries. I am informed, for example, that there is nothing in the United States like a Minister of Agriculture, and that the Agricultural Bureau is simply statistical. I am also informed that they have no legislation whatever in the United States, even upon such important subjects as the contagious diseases of animals. Passing from that subject, I cannot quite admit that there has been a want of attention to the subject of foreign Tariffs owing to the want of a formal recognition of a Minister of Agriculture and Commerce. It was my fate to be Vice President, and afterwards President, of the Board of Trade during a period when this country was endeavouring to enter into foreign Tariff Treaties, and I say without hesitation that the machinery of the Government was perfectly adequate for the purpose. The failure of our attempts was undoubtedly on account of the difficulties inherent in the case, and was by no means due to any unfortunate dualism between the Board of Trade and the Foreign Office. We did after that conclude a great Commercial Treaty, which for the last 20 years has produced enormous benefits. But that was not done either by the Foreign Department or by the Board of Trade. It was done entirely as a matter of revenue by communications between the Treasury and Mr. Cobden, who was residing and practically representing this country in Paris. As at present advised, I am not aware whether any advantage with regard to the negotiation of Commercial Treaties would be gained by a change of arrangement, seeing that additional expenses have been incurred in the Foreign Office, and an additional establishment has been created in deference to the wishes of the commercial classes of this country. Quite apart from the subject of Tariff Treaties in this country, we have had in existence for nearly 60 years Reciprocity Treaties on the basis of equal dues and equal facilities, and Treaties on very sound principles thus have been made without any sort of conflict between the Foreign Department and the Board of Trade. I will explain to the hon. Member what I mean by acceding to this Motion. I understand myself to accede to this proposition—that a Department of State shall be created to take up and meet any demand which may arise in connection with Commerce or Agriculture; and of course we must look, in the first instance, to those demands which are proximate and within reach, and which mainly have been mentioned by the hon. Member. The office is hardly, at the present moment, to be made a question of title. The hon. Member has animadverted on the constitution of the Board of Trade as it now stands; but he has failed to do full justice to it, for he omitted to name one most distinguished and eminent member of the Board. He omitted to inform us that the first name upon the list of members of the Board is the name of the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury. I myself have a double interest in the Board, for I am not only one member of it, but two—as First Lord of the Treasury and as Chancellor of the Exchequer. There was a Board before, and it was Mr. Burke who abolished it, it is supposed, about the year 1780, because, as he described it, there were eight Members receiving £1,000 a-year for doing very little, in order that they might, when superannuated, receive £2,000 a-year for doing less. I do not wish to commit myself to the question of Board or no Board; but I am bound to admit that, with due consideration, the question may fairly be raised whether a change may not be made in the title of the Board now so well filled by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Chamberlain), because they are—

“Lords of the Committee of Privy Council appointed by Her Majesty for the consideration of all matters relating to Trade and Foreign Plantations.”

Now, in the word “Plantations” there is a smack of agriculture; but it is “Foreign Plantations.” The title, I admit, is very incongruous, and there may be a fair and reasonable question whether there may not be a change in the title. I am not prepared to announce what the title should be; but I think there should be a change of title, with the view of making it what I have now described—namely, that there should be a responsible Department, of which it should be the duty to take up all functions connected with this subject as far as possible. At the same time, it is not always easy to say to what particular Departments certain subjects should belong; and, in order to see how far that is possible, let us take some of the questions that have been raised. There are many subjects and classes of subjects that have relation to more than one Department. For instance, it has been suggested that factory labour ought to go to the Board of Trade. I remember having a discussion on that subject with the late Sir James Graham, the very first Administrator of his day—a man having one of the most active, rapid, and comprehensive judgments on any administrative question it has ever been my good fortune to know; and it was after full consideration and advice that factory labour was attached to the Home Office. I am not prepared to say that ought to be reversed. Then, with regard to Copyholds, the superintendence of the Home Office over Copyholds is a superintendence involving minute interference—whether it ought to be treated as a matter of Commerce and Agriculture I may decline to give an opinion. With regard to Highways little difficulty will arise. I do not know whether the hon.

Mr. Gladstone

Member himself has considered the question. If he has, I admit much weight is due to his opinion; but its connection with Local Taxation and Government I cannot put out of consideration; and on the question of transferring it there may be a good deal of doubt. Then the hon. Member said, with a good deal of force, that all agricultural statistics and all returns as to the sale of corn, which are records of actual transactions and the point on which certain local operations turn, are proper questions for the Board of Trade. But they are already under the Board of Trade, and no doubt they support the hon. Gentleman in the principle of his Motion that the functions may be united. Several other subjects were mentioned by the hon. Member—I do not wish to make any invidious comments where all are united. We have put the President of the Board of Trade in the Cabinet; and not only so, but we have made some practical progress towards the object of the hon. Gentleman—namely, bringing comprehensively into his hands the management of all the great subjects in which the commercial class are interested. There are three of these to which we can point during the short time we have been in Office. There is the Patent Law, the Law of Partnership, and the Law of Bankruptcy—a good earnest, I submit, of the disposition in which we are desirous of approaching this question. There remains only one important question mentioned by the hon. Member on which I ought to say one word, and that is the contagious diseases of animals. That was a very fair case for him to raise, for I think some consideration should be given to the anomalous method in which those diseases are at present dealt with. He objected very much to the answer he might receive from the Treasury Bench; but it is one thing to give a promise of careful consideration as a method of getting rid of a Motion, and the consideration required as to the best method of applying it; and I am bound to say that something may be said for the way in which this subject is now administered, when you have at the head of the Council Office almost always a Nobleman or country gentleman, not only of capacity, but of influence, conversant with subjects of agriculture. I might mention such men as Earl Spencer, the Duke of Richmond, Lord Ripon, and the Duke of Marlborough. There must be great advantage in an arrangement of that kind; but, notwithstanding, I could not give into the opinion that the present arrangement should be maintained. It is hardly right to expect that a Gentleman widely acquainted with agricultural life should be Vice President of the Council, and have charge of educational matters. Therefore, I think there is very much to be said, and, indeed, a general leaning in the minds of those Members of the Government who have considered the subject is, that the administration of the Contagious Diseases of Animals Act should be attached to the Department which is specially charged with the affairs of Agriculture and Commerce. I think I have now gone through the main points connected with the case. There is nothing against which the Government and the House ought to be so much on their guard as the re-organization of a Department; and nothing, I am sure, could be more unwise, as connected with our responsibilities with the public funds, than to set out with purposely instituting an extensive series of offices, each with salaries attached; but we undertake to fulfil the pledge that means shall not be wanting for assuming, and adequately discharging, such functions as have been described when they come into view. The Board of Trade has been re-organized over and over again; but what does it mean? It means the superannuation of a great number of public officers, and the institution of a great number of new public officers, who are probably again, after the lapse of a decorous number of years, to be again superannuated. We ought to adapt our machinery to the work to be done, and not set up a new machine, before we know that it will have work to do or not. That is the spirit in which we are prepared to accept this Motion; and if we do not act upon it to the satisfaction of the hon. Member, he will, no doubt, be prepared to call us by-and-bye to account, and if we cannot tell a reasonable story, we shall, no doubt, receive an adequate measure of animadversion.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, he had heard with the greatest satisfaction the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. There were some points, however, on which he wished to receive further information. The first related to agricultural statistics; and in reference to it the Statistical Department of the Board of Trade was one to which great attention should be paid. To be of any real, practical value, the information should be fresh, for stale statistics, like stale fish, were of no use whatever. The American Commissioner of Agriculture produced annually the most valuable Reports—nay, produced Reports month by month. He (Mr. R. H. Paget) had been the means of procuring, through the courtesy of the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir Charles W. Dilke), those annual and monthly Reports for the Library of the House. In America they were not satisfied with leaving industry entirely unaided, nor ashamed to go out of their way to procure information about crops, cultivation, machinery, manures, and other things connected with agriculture, and place that information at the service of agriculturists. The Commissioner of Agriculture stated that, by obtaining all the necessary information, he hoped to enable even new industries to be successfully prosecuted, and he pointed to the action of England in the cultivation of tea in Assam, which, he said, in spite of repeated difficulties and disappointments, had proved a success, and that the success was largely due to the expenditure of State funds. The American Agricultural Department had large funds at their disposal, and employed them in procuring useful statistics, which they put forth for the public benefit. He wanted to ask, would there be placed at the disposal of the new Department a sum of money to do what was so ably done in the United States? If he desired to obtain agricultural statistics now, he had to go up and down, through half-a-dozen Departments. He was sorry the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was not in his place, that he might thank him for having so courteously placed at his disposal most useful information from the United States. The great point was that everything connected with agriculture should be focussed and brought together into one Department. At present agricultural information was scattered in Reports from India and in the Statistical Abstracts of the Foreign Office, and of the Board of Trade. But they wanted something more than to have this information all in one place; it ought to be digested and printed at the expense of the State, so as to be easily available for those outside. In America, the state of agriculture was carefully watched by the authorities, who were at the utmost pains to circulate information among the farmers. For instance, certain failures in the grass lands having been reported, the Department issued for the benefit of the farmers an illustrated series of specimens of different grasses, explaining their relative value and determining the best kind to grow and the best way of growing it. That was what he hoped might be done in England by an Agricultural Department. It ought, however, to be something more than a Department; to use the Prime Minister's words, "to meet any demands which may arise in regard to agriculture," it ought to have the power of obtaining information, and of spending money in circulating it. He urged that when the Department was created the two interests of Agriculture and Commerce should be kept separate, presided over, perhaps, by a single Minister, but with an Under Secretary of State responsible for each separate branch. He thought the demand was not unreasonable, considering the great importance of Agriculture, and the fact that, with a dwindling trade, its importance was gradually increasing.

MR. SLAGG said, in rising to say a few words, he must express his satisfaction at the prospect that the commercial community were to obtain more attention in future; for it had often struck him as being surprising that, considering the vast importance of our commercial relations, so little attention had been paid by the Legislature to the question now raised. It had been the opinion of a large portion of the community for many years that a separate Department should be instituted for commercial affairs, and that the Minister should have a seat in the Cabinet. He must say, however, that he felt the difficulty of establishing a new Department. With reference to that question, our commercial information was now collected from a large number of Government Departments which had little connection with each other and very little sympathy, and in many instances were at variance with each other. It was therefore impossible that these numerous Departments could work together harmoniously as they were constituted at present. Looking at the number of Offices with which the commercial interests were at present placed, he found that the India Office controlled the trading relations of that country, the Colonial Office undertook to supervise the commercial affairs of the Colonies, the Board of Trade undertook an endless variety of commercial functions, and the Privy Council was charged with many peculiar duties connected with the trade of the country, besides that of Education, while the Foreign Office undertook matters connected with the negotiation of Treaties. Some time ago the formation of a Commercial Department at the Foreign Office led them to hope that better attention would be given to these affairs. But he was very sorry to say that though it was directed by gentlemen of high ability, it was still very far short of that efficiency which they had a right to expect. His (Mr. Slagg's) idea was that before they established a separate Bureau, they should try to develop the existing Offices by making them so strong in the discharge of their duties that in course of time, when they could walk alone, the information they supplied might be concentrated. But before that was done there must be a very great increase in their efficiency. The misfortune was that in Government Offices commerce was looked upon as a somewhat ignoble career for gentlemen who wished for promotion; and the reason of that was that, to some extent, commercial affairs were not regarded as comparable in importance with such matters as the Eastern Question, and no encouragement was given for the pursuit of matters connected with commerce. Any plan that would produce such an encouragement would, he considered, be of much value to the country. He hoped in filling up the important office it would not be conferred upon a mere official of the Government. He hoped he would at least be thoroughly conversant with commercial affairs. He was sure it would not benefit the agricultural or commercial community to have a Minister appointed simply on Party grounds. The Prime Minister had told them that he thought one Minister would be competent to attend both to Agriculture and Commerce; but what a new Minister could do for Agriculture except in the matter of statistics he was somewhat at a loss to see. It was true that such statistics were of great interest and value; but it had been suggested that the duty of a Minister of Agriculture was to do something for the protection of agricultural produce. If that was to be his duty, he (Mr. Slagg) was quite unable to assent to it. If a new Minister for Agriculture and Commerce were appointed, he trusted he would be a man conversant with business, and not a mere official. He was heartily pleased that so much attention had been given to the subject to-night. It was certain that the interests of Trade and Commerce had suffered seriously from official neglect; and, after what had fallen from the Treasury Bench, he looked forward to the introduction by the Government of some practical scheme for placing those interests as regarded our relations with foreign countries on a more satisfactory footing in relation to their administration than they occupied at the present time.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY said, that, in connection with the subject, he deeply regretted the absence from the House of Mr. Sampson Lloyd, who in times past had so ably advocated the establishment of a Ministry of Agriculture and Commerce; but they had reason, he thought, to congratulate themselves on the great progress which their ideas had made of recent years. The agricultural and commercial depression from which the country had suffered had disabused people of the notion that they could do everything for themselves, in the same way as our recent military reverses had taught us that an Englishman was no longer a match for three foreigners. It was felt that this country was engaged in a competition so severe with other countries that they could not afford to lose a single point of advantage. So far as regarded the agriculturists, they had a right to ask the Government that they should have the best and fullest information upon the agriculture of foreign countries laid before them, such as that referred to as furnished by the American Bureau. He considered that the way in which the debate had been carried on, and the tone in which the Prime Minister had met the Motion, were matters of great encouragement; and he contended that the appointment of a Minister of Agriculture and Commerce would be of great benefit to both Departments. At the same time, he did not anticipate that the establishment of the proposed new Department would induce people engaged in business pursuits to lean too much upon the Government, or that it would discourage the spirit of self-reliance which of necessity would always be the main-spring of our agricultural and commercial industry.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, nothing delighted him more than the evident anxiety of hon. Gentlemen who directly represented the agricultural interest that the agricultural concerns of this country, and particularly questions dealing with the import of cattle, should be placed under the power of a Minister who was intimately connected with the trade of the country. Though those functions could not, perhaps, be in better hands than they were at present, still there would be obvious advantage in matters connected with the food supply of the country being in the hands of a Minister who was better acquainted than it was possible probably for any Lord President of the Council to be acquainted with the demands of the great commercial population in regard to the food supply. Greatly as he sympathized with the object of the Resolution, and agreeing with much of the speech of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Massey Lopes), he failed, to some extent, to concur with him, because of the precise terms in which the Resolution was expressed. He sympathized very much with the remarks of the Prime Minister, who, in the fulness of an unrivalled experience, showed them some of the difficulties connected with this very important subject. The hon. Baronet opposite spoke of the different arrangements that obtained in the Governments of Continental Europe. The difference of those arrangements was due to the fact that their Foreign Offices were still less concerned than our own with the commercial interests of the country, and that was, in his opinion, a disadvantage. His hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg), who spoke with an experience which few Members of the House could claim, had expressed satisfaction with the Commercial Department of the Foreign Office. He hoped most heartily that the Department would be rendered both more practical and more important. Mr. Cobden once remarked that an Ambassador should be a commercial traveller of his country. It would be a disastrous day for this country when those who were concerned in the foreign relations of the country should cease to have intimate and important connection with the commercial concerns of the community. The difficulty of the subject enlarged as one looked upon it more closely, and when the Prime Minister alluded to the fanciful title of the Board of Trade and Plantations, he pointed to a reform which must occur to the minds of practical men. The Board of Trade had the title of dealing with foreign plantations which had become long since independent of the Government of this country. In order to give our Government a more practical character, he hoped the Board of Trade would take a new appellation. But the Board of Trade had begun a new career under the presidency of his right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), and had under its administration the Patent Laws to which the Premier had alluded, and Bankruptcy, which were heretofore in the hands of the Attorney General of the day. It was a new departure; but he (Mr. Arnold) regarded it as a very wholesome improvement. He had a strong expectation that there would be an increasing desire for some help from the Government with reference to the present depressed condition of agriculture. So long as hon. Gentlemen confined their demands to matters so harmless as the title or re-arrangement of a Government Department, he, for one, should not complain; but he looked with serious apprehension upon the character of the speeches made from the other side of the House that night. If hon. Members opposite really and sincerely wished to improve the condition of agriculture, they must not cry out merely for a new President of a new Department; but they must set their hands to work to reform the Land Laws of this country, which were at present the bane of agriculture and injurious to the country.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, there was one observation made by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister to which he desired to refer shortly. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Government would see that there was some Department charged with looking after all the special interests of agriculture and commerce, and that, as it was, they had not been overlooked or neglected hitherto. Their contention was that they had been neglected, and that was why they wanted a Minister and a Department. They were thankful for the introduction of a Bankruptcy Bill that Session, which the trading classes greatly required; but how about the Patent Laws? Why were not the prohibitive fees done away with that drove the English inventors to America and elsewhere? It might rather astonish the House to be told that many of their so-called American patents, though coming from America, were the invention of Englishmen who were driven abroad to get their patents, owing to the suicidal and prohibitive fees levied in this country. Why, in the interests of Commerce and Agriculture, had those things been neglected so long? Then there was another most important subject to which they had hitherto been unable to get attention given; that was, the railway rates, which were not only in favour of the foreigner as against the English producer, but were actually in contravention of the Statute defining maximum rates. Why were not these things seen to by the Board of Trade? He passed over such questions as prohibitive Tariffs that were crippling their manufactures, Agricultural Education, Corn Returns, and the large subject of Local Taxation, which was over-weighting them in the race with the foreign producer; but the subject of railway freights was essentially within the jurisdiction of the Board of Trade, and should not have been neglected. And one word more. If they were to have some rearrangement of the Public Departments to get these things seen to he trusted there was to be no delay. They could not afford to wait, and they had already waited too long.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, that, while entirely prepared to accept the Resolution, he was not one of those who were sanguine that a Minister of Agriculture could do much for the country in present circumstances. Statistics were, no doubt, valuable, and of interest both to Agriculture and Commerce; but it ought not to be supposed that foreign countries were in a much better condition than ourselves in that respect. So far as the statistics of this country were concerned they were equal to those of any other country. He recently applied for statistics respecting the agriculture of the United States; but he was informed at the United States Legation that for the last two years Congress had not voted funds for the printing of them. He thought that, considering the duties in connection with trade and agriculture now performed by the Government, and some others that might be added, it would be of general service that some special Department were organized in connection with some of the existing Departments. It would have to deal with statistics, and it would also be important that it should supply information with regard to Trade and Commerce from abroad. That information might be collected from our Consuls abroad, digested by the Government officials, and the results published in an available form for all those who were interested. One matter on which information was specially needed was the state of cattle diseases in foreign countries. One of the greatest difficulties of the Government in dealing with disease was that there was no reliable information of the state of cattle disease abroad; and he urged two years ago that the Government should take measures to obtain trustworthy information regarding disease amongst cattle in the United States. Another important matter, which would be of great service, was that the new Minister of Agriculture should endeavour to diffuse scientific education in agricultural subjects throughout the country. No doubt there was a great amount of apathy amongst farmers about scientific education on agricultural subjects. Unfortunately, farmers were not sufficiently aware of the great advantages which would accrue to them from a certain amount of knowledge in some of the sciences bearing closely on Agriculture, and a small sum of money might be well spent in drawing the attention of farmers to the subject. Another point which was of immense importance was that the Government should institute and endow, to a moderate extent, scientific investigation in agricultural questions. It had done a great deal for trades and manufactures; but as yet the Government had done nothing in the way of aid of Agriculture, beyond what was done by the Science and Art Department. In the case of Agriculture there were special reasons why the Government should make some attempt at encouraging scientific research and discovery. Great good might follow such a course, as in our manufactures invention and discovery might be stimulated, and the knowledge of agricultural chemistry, in particular, might be more widely diffused. In trade and manufactures, if any private individual made a discovery or any invention he could obtain a patent for it, and if of great utility he was amply rewarded. But this was not applicable to invention or discoveries in Agriculture. What for a farmer was a large sum of money and considerable knowledge were required to make agricultural experiments, and a farmer might make discoveries of importance; but, from the nature of such discoveries and the character of the subject, it was impossible for him to get a patent, and he derived no special advantage except what arose in the course of his own business, which was not sufficient to remunerate him for his trouble and expense. He thought, therefore, that a new Department, such as was indicated in the Resolution, was absolutely necessary. But to be of service a Minister of Agriculture must be acquainted with the subjects with which he had to deal; and there would be great difficulty in finding such a Minister; and unless he were possessed of practical knowledge of the subjects with which he had to deal, he (Mr. J. W. Barclay) could not see that much advantage would arise from this special Department which it was proposed to create. Another matter that he would like to refer to was the supervision of railway rates by the Board of Trade. They had been told that the United States had a Department of Commerce and Agriculture; but 19 separate States had also Departments which were specially constituted to deal with railway rates and charges, and they did their work to the great advantage of the public. A Department of Commerce should have similar powers to deal with Railway Companies in this country. The public had an idea that the Department looked after their interests in the case of private Railway Bills. But—and in saying what he was about to say he hoped the House would except his right hon. Friend the present head of the Department—the Board, practically, did nothing of the kind, and they had in a scandalous manner betrayed the interests of the public in regard to those Bills. The Board was required to report on all Railway Bills coming before the House; but from time to time it had allowed unopposed Bills to pass which gave the Railway Companies power to charge largely increased rates. In some instances that he (Mr. J. W. Barclay) knew of Companies had got power to charge more than double previous rates, and that without any notice being called to the matter by the Board of Trade. That, he thought, should warn them not to trust to any Department of State more than was necessary. Instead of looking so much after the affairs of foreign nations, it would be well if the House of Commons would devote itself more to affairs at home. He hoped, now that he had called attention to it, the subject would be looked after by the Board of Trade.

MR. MAC IVER said, if there was one thing which our American friends thoroughly understood, it was their own interests, and they were ever ready to take advantage of poor John Bull. He hoped he should not be thought unreasonable if he ventured to examine somewhat closely the gift which the Prime Minister was inclined to bestow. The Prime Minister reminded him of the old story of the siege of Troy. He would like to suggest to the agricultural interest of Great Britain a somewhat free translation of Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes. It might be put—"Don't trust the present Government." Take the Malt Tax. He was not a farmer, he was not an agriculturist, he was a carrier, and his experience showed him that since the abolition of the malt tax he had been offered more barley, sugar, and other things to be brought into competition with the British farmer than ever before. The Malt Tax was abolished with the professed desire to benefit the British farmer; but the Government had omitted the safeguards by which the abolition should have been accompanied; and, therefore, as a matter of fact, that which they had done had only increased foreign competition, and the only people who had been benefited by the abolition of that tax were that portion of the brewers who carried on the largest business. The Government adhered to what they called the principles of political economy. Political economy, however, was not an exact science, and they ought to deal with the affairs of the country in the same way that they dealt with their own businesses. How was it that we had got into such a mess with respect to the French Treaty? It was because, while we professed the theory of Free Trade it was rejected by the other nations of the world. There was no one in that House, he (Mr. Mac Iver) did not care on what side he sat, who had so thoroughly learnt the art of replying to a Question without giving information as the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had done. That hon. Baronet had, however, unintentionally misled the House in the replies which he had given to him. He (Mr. Mac Iver) had asked the hon. Baronet Questions about the Sugar Bounties and about the bounties on shipping; and the replies he gave amounted to this—that they were under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, and that Her Majesty's Government would make representations in regard to them. Now, he appealed to both sides of the House whether such replies were not calculated to lead simple-minded people in the country to suppose that the Government really meant to do something. ["Question!"] That was the Question, because those were matters with which a Minister of Agriculture and Commerce might well deal with; but which the hon. Baronet had not dealt well with, having much else to do. The whole question as regards bounties on shipping was practically settled and done with. Our Government might make any representation they pleased; but the French Government had perfectly concluded their arrangements to do a thing which was most detrimental to British interests. Let them look at the condition of Ireland. How could the industries of that country be restored unless the industries in Great Britain were prosperous? When they saw the woollen trade falling off, and when they saw competing goods from France and other countries increasing in their importation, and our own exportation decreasing, if we had a Minister of Commerce his first duty would be to see what could be done for the woollen trade at home. Let them look at the distress in regard to agriculture. He agreed with one remark in a letter lately written to Mr. Lord, of Bradford, by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, to the effect that the depressed state of our manufacturing industries was very much owing to the depressed state of the agriculture of this country. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that the connection between our agriculture and our manufactures was very close indeed. That was not a new idea to him; but it seemed to be new to the right hon. Gentleman, who had not sufficiently considered the rest of the subject, because he went on to say that the depressed condition of agriculture was only owing to a few bad seasons, and that we wanted but a little more sunshine and a little more yield from the land, and everything would go right. Now, going back 12 years, and taking periods of three years each, he found that, in round numbers, our annual importations of agricultural produce in the first three years averaged £60,000,000 sterling in value; in the second three years, £80,000,000; in the third three years, £94,000,000; and in the last £106,000,000. To him that looked very much like the displacement of our own industry; it looked very much as though the real cause of our agricultural depression was the unfair competition of foreign countries whose tariffs were hostile to our manufactures; while, moreover, the conditions of the carrying trade had been altogether changed during the last few years. Trade in the United States was prosperous, and there was enormous emigration going on, and the result was that steamers in the Atlantic trade were more prosperous than they were years ago; but this was no advantage to the farmers. The homeward rates of freight never were lower; and, at the present moment, grain was being carried from New York to Liverpool at 2*d.* a-bushel, and cattle at about £4 per head. In conclusion, he maintained that a Minister of Commerce and Agriculture ought to have been appointed long ago; but he ought not to be a mere theoretic political economist, but a man who really had the best interests of Great Britain and Ireland and also of our great Empire at heart—one who was not tied to theory, but one who would do his best for the interests of the country.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he did not rise in order to follow at any length the extraordinary and somewhat miscellaneous speech of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver). He did not propose to discuss with that hon. Gentleman the principles of Adam Smith, or even the protective theories which the hon. Member had so much at heart. It seemed to him (Mr. Chamberlain) that the hon. Member had somewhat anticipated the Notice of Motion which he had put on the Paper, and which he intended to bring forward on the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill. But he could not help thinking the hon. Member was rather ungenerous in his observations as to the abolition of the Malt Tax. The abolition of the Malt Tax had been for many years an object of the greatest importance with the Party to which the hon. Member for Birkenhead belonged. When that Party came into power they found themselves, owing to circumstances into which he need not enter, unable to deal with the question; and now that a Liberal Government had settled it, the hon. Member for Birkenhead declared that that which his own Party had called a boon had become a bane, because it had been granted by a Liberal Ministry. He hoped that the debate would now be brought to a close, especially as the statement of the Prime Minister had appeared to give general satisfaction. Some speakers that evening had, of course, unintentionally, tried to press further than his words would bear the statement of the Prime Minister. His right hon. Friend had not, as he (Mr. Chamberlain) understood him, said that the Government would pledge itself to the creation of a new Department. What he had said was that he would recognize, as a principle, that some Department of the Government should be prepared to meet every new demand made on behalf either of Agriculture or of Commerce. Some hon. Gentlemen seemed to anticipate too much from any mere re-organization of the work of the Government Departments. Such a re-organization could not be expected either to revive trade, or materially to promote the interests of Agriculture. Nor would it enable Governments or individuals to perform impossibilities. Complaint was made that but little progress had been made; but if there was any fault, it lay with the House of Commons itself. The practice of debating every question at inordinate length had necessarily delayed non-political Business which was not so urgent; and if the commercial class wanted commercial legislation to make more rapid progress, they must bring to bear some reform on the practice of the House which should prevent the waste of time that undoubtedly seriously impeded the progress of commercial legislation. The hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) complained that the Board of Trade had not dealt satisfactorily with the question of railway rates; but his (Mr. Chamberlain's) reply was that they had done all that legislation enabled them to do with reference to this matter. They had raised important questions before the Railway Commission. On some of them they had been defeated by defects in the law; but the Government were quite prepared, when time would allow, to deal with the question, and to take the powers necessary that the matter might be satisfactorily dealt with. But the difficulty there, as in the case of other questions, was the time, and not the particular arrangement of a Government Department. The hon. Member for Forfarshire had spoken of the scandalous way in which the Board of Trade had betrayed the interests of the public, although he was good enough to say that in this he cast no reflection upon the present head of the Department; but he (Mr. Chamberlain) must protest, on behalf of the Department, on behalf of his Predecessors and the permanent officials, against the rash charge brought against them that they had been unmindful of the public interests. He was certain that in past times, as during his occupancy of the Office, they had, to the best of their abilities, protected the interests of the public. They had on every occasion pointed out to the Committees of the House of Commons any alterations of rates proposed by Railway Companies, and the responsibility of allowing those rates rested not with the officers of the Board of Trade, but with the Committees of the House. The hon. Member for Mid Somersetshire (Mr. R. H. Paget) spoke with reference to agricultural statistics, which he desired to see extended. A Report had been made of a very elaborate character; but he (Mr. Chamberlain) understood the hon. Member to require that they should be published more frequently, and contain a great deal of information which they did not now include. Now, it might be possible to improve the preparation of these statistics, and send them to the country at an earlier period than was now done; but the value of statistics often depended on a sufficient period being taken, and if they were published weekly or monthly, no practical conclusion could be drawn from them. But he must remind the House that no Government could do for individuals what they could do better for themselves. He believed the statistics published by the Government were chiefly valuable for the statesman and the political economist. They were not of primary utility to persons engaged in trade, who could better obtain what they wanted for themselves. The experience of the United States had been referred to; and while the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) was mistaken in supposing that there was a Ministry of Agriculture in the United States, undoubtedly there was a Statistical Bureau, which published a great many statistics; but as to the advantage of them he (Mr. Chamberlain) believed that there was considerable difference of opinion even in the United States themselves. The experiment in England was not a success. At the head of the Office had been Sir John Sinclair, and its Secretary was Arthur Young. Yet it was unsatisfactory. Begun in 1793, it was finally abolished in 1821, and no one said a single word in its praise. Another question was, whether the Department of Agriculture and Commerce could advantageously be combined under one head? He looked forward with the greatest anxiety to the possibility of such an undertaking; and, in connection with it, he would tell the House what had happened to himself. He had only been in Office a very few days when he received a copy of a Return issued by the Department to farmers and others, asking a great number of questions of interest. The Return came back to him from a farmer not filled up. The writer declined absolutely to furnish any information either to the Board of Trade or to anyone connected with it, so long "as they knew as little of practical agriculture as a pig did of watchmaking." He (Mr. Chamberlain) felt the refusal was not altogether without cause; and he could not help fearing, if these two great Departments were permanently combined and placed under one head, difficulties would arise either from the President of the Board of Trade knowing practically as little of Agriculture or, on the other hand, of Commerce, as a pig did of watchmaking. But that was one of the questions which his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister promised to consider by accepting the form of Motion proposed, and he could not help thinking his mode of putting it into practice would be satisfactory to the House. With respect to the other matters concerning which complaint was made, the chief thing wanted was, again, time and opportunity, as the Government were anxious to legislate on many of the subjects which had been touched upon. After the declaration of the Prime Minister, he thought the House might trust the Government to put in practice the principles they were willing to accept.

MR. STORER said, that agriculture was again beginning to assert itself, because trade was declining, and this question was of the greatest possible interest. If they had had a Minister to look after their interest, there would not have been so much bad legislation as there had been of late years. At the same time, he was ready to admit that the manner in which the Vice President of the Council had managed agricultural matters relating to cattle disease was most creditable, and had gained for the right hon. Gentleman the general respect of the agricultural interest. He did not think it was fair to find fault with the sensible speech of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver) on the ground of its Protectionist tendencies, when Birmingham itself, represented by two Members of the Cabinet, had been asking for countervailing duties in opposition to the bounties. He (Mr. Storer) would inform the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade that a large number of his constituents met a few nights since at Birmingham and passed a resolution in the spirit of the speech of the hon. Member for Birkenhead. It had been said that the agricultural interest was not sufficiently grateful for the abolition of the Malt Tax as they ought to be considering their former agitation on that question. But, though he recognized the good the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had done, he could not but remember that the result had only substituted one monopoly for another, for the monopoly now lay with the brewer. The Education Act, too, had also done the farmer much injury, and inflicted on him what amounted to an Income Tax of 1s. or 2s. in the pound.

MR. RATHBONE said, he could have wished that the Resolution of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Massey Lopes) had been more general in its terms. He (Mr. Rathbone) felt bound to take a particular interest in this subject in consequence of the constant complaints which, as formerly representing a large commercial constituency, he had received as to the failure of the Administration Departments to do their work satisfactorily. There could be no more important Departments than the Local Government Board and the Board of Trade, and the Prime Minister had very often avoided in practice many of the evils of the system by placing able men at the head of every Department; but even in these cases the evil had not altogether been avoided. He thought the root of the evil lay in the present relative dignity and emolument of the different Offices of State. The heads of the Departments he had referred to were frequently not in the Cabinet; the Offices themselves were not considered as of equal dignity, and had not the same emoluments as great Departments. Therefore, when the time for promotion came, the merits of the individual did not enter into consideration. Besides, these very important Departments were often pushed aside from the fact that their Representatives were not in the Cabinet. He thought that the President of the Board of Trade, the President of the Local Government Board, and the Chief Secretary for Ireland should all have places in the Cabinet, and that those Offices should no longer be considered as mere ante-chambers to the more important Offices. A like dignity should also attach to the Minister of Education. Under the late Government, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had thoroughly mastered the condition of Ireland and its system of local government. But he succeeded to a position in which he had everything to learn—the Colonies—and he was succeeded by a Chief Secretary by no means his own equal. He (Mr. Rathbone) hoped the whole question would be considered in a comprehensive spirit.

MR. ROUND said, he did not intend to continue the debate after the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade; but he rose for the purpose of making a suggestion. The Prime Minister had stated that one of the great difficulties in connection with the re-organization of Government Departments was the necessary superannuation of officers. He (Mr. Round) understood that, at the present time, the head of the Statistical Department of the Board of Trade had resigned, and the Office was vacant.

MR. GLADSTONE: Will the hon. Member communicate with the President of the Board of Trade?

MR. ROUND said, he would take an opportunity of doing so, and, in the meanwhile, would suggest that the appointment should not be filled up until the new arrangements were made which it was stated were now in contemplation. As representing an important agricultural constituency, he felt much interest in the question, and desired also to thank the Prime Minister for consenting to the Motion of the hon. Member for South Devon. His constituency was one that had suffered much from the recent depression in agriculture, and was still suffering. As its Representative, he could not but watch with the greatest interest every notice taken by this House of questions connected with the agricultural interests; and he thanked the Government for their promise in connection with the Motion for a new Ministry of Commerce and Agriculture.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that that was one of the questions on which more than one Ministry had been in a state of chaos. On a previous occasion, in the course of his (Major Nolan's) inquiries on the subject of seed potatoes, he had been referred from one Department to another, from the Board of Trade to the Vice President of the Council, till at last it had been decided, after a consultation, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had more to do with potatoes than anyone else. At another time, he had been interested in a matter that was, perhaps, as much commercial as agricultural, and which was of some importance to the people of certain districts of Ireland—namely, the manufacture of kelp; but, on that subject, his inquiries had received no satisfactory answer. And, in like manner, a difficulty often occurred in Ireland as to the very serious question of the drainage of land. There was no one to whom application could be made, and the authorities were conspicuous by their absence. That a Department of Agriculture might greatly benefit small and unenlightened farmers by circulating information among them had been abundantly proved. That was a field in which the Department might prosecute the work that the agricultural societies neglected, or were unable to perform, especially among the small farmers in Ireland. He thought that the Government might fairly be asked to give assistance of this kind, reserving to themselves the question whether the Office of Irish Agriculture should be in London or in Dublin.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, that he had heard the nostrums of hon. Members from all parts of the House for the relief of agriculturists, who, without doubt, had been very grievous sufferers from the late three or four unfavourable seasons, and for the improvement of Agriculture; and he would mention his, which had this peculiarity—an unusual one in that House—that every hon. Member, on whatever side or part of the House he sat, would agree with him in the opinion that it was the most important of any. It was this—that they, landowners and land occupiers, should learn their business. There was no business or profession in that country with regard to which those who were the most interested were so ignorant. He confessed, and he did so with regret, that until he became a landowner he knew, and he cared, nothing about land. He hardly knew one crop from another, and he felt no desire to know; he had but one ambition, to rise in his profession and get the command of a regiment. He owned this with regret and some shame, because it was his duty to make himself acquainted with the business and calling, a good knowledge of which would enable him to benefit himself and all who lived on his estate. He did not hesitate to say that if, half a century since, he had possessed as good a knowledge of the management of land, and acquaintance with the qualities and treatment of stock, as his land agent or bailiff, he would have been, perhaps, 20 per cent richer during the whole of that time; he would never have had a bad farmer on his land; more work, and better paid work would have been provided for his labourers, and the country would have been benefited by his land producing more food for man and beast. Every class in the country would be materially benefited by landowners being better instructed in land, excepting one—namely, land agents. Their occupation would be diminished by landowners knowing their own business, instead of leaving it to them. In Germany there were few land agents; owners managed their own land. If their present difficulties induced landowners to learn more about land it would prove beneficial to the whole community.

Question put, and negatived.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Resolved, That it is desirable that the functions of the Executive Government which especially relate to Agriculture and Commerce should, as far as possible, be administered by a distinct department, and be presided over by a responsible Minister of the Crown.

Committee upon Monday next.

WAYS AND MEANS.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. WARTON, who had given Notice on going into Committee of Supply to call attention to Trade Combinations having for their object the undue diminution of the price for food payable to the producer, and the increase payable by the consumer, now rose for that purpose, and said, that for a long time it had been his intention to direct the attention of the House to this subject. It was a matter which seemed to him to be of considerable importance to a very large portion of the people of the country. It was hardly necessary to state that agriculture had been in a very depressed state. What he was content to observe was that at present they could not grow wheat at a profit. It was of the utmost importance that, as agriculturists could not grow wheat, and were discouraged from growing barley, they should turn their attention to some things which might be of great benefit. There were many products of the soil which might be grown to advantage, only that the way in which those products were disposed of often turned into a loss what might be sources of profit. At present we were paying foreigners many millions a-year for eggs, butter, poultry, fruit, and vegetables; and he did not hesitate to say that those millions might go into the pockets of our own farmers and market gardeners, provided what they had to sell could be sold fairly. It was a singular thing that we could get fresh fruit and vegetables from France, Germany, Holland, and Belgium at a cheaper rate than that at which our own producers could send them to market, and that arose partly from the system of railway charges, which he hoped the Committee on the subject would soon correct, and partly from the fact that the markets, and especially those of London, were carried on in a most artificial and unbusinesslike manner. He knew the case of a respectable farmer in Suffolk, finding his agricultural produce fetch him very little, directed his attention to onions. He got Sutton's seed, the best he could procure, paid the greatest attention to the crop, and sent up the produce to London salesmen. But when the account of profit and loss was made up, he was out of pocket by what he paid for the sacks. Another thought he would grow cabbages, filled two waggons with them, which he sent up to market, and got the sum of 6*d.* for his profit on the transaction.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD rose to Order, and asked, whether it was competent for an hon. Member, who had given Notice of a Motion on going into Committee of Supply, to move it on going into Committee of Ways and Means?

MR. SPEAKER said, that if the hon. Member proposed to move on the present occasion he would be out of Order.

MR. HEALY asked, whether it was not competent to raise any question on going into Committee of Ways and Means?

MR. SPEAKER said, he could not give an answer on a point of Order not absolutely before the House. The Notice of the hon. Member was for a Motion on going into Committee of Supply; but the Motion now was for going into Committee on Ways and Means.

MR. WARTON said, he rose at the proper moment; but he could not prevent the calling out of the Order for Ways and Means.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked the Government to explain why they had taken the course they had in so suddenly closing Supply?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH, in reply, said, that the Amendment having been carried on going into Committee, it was not considered advisable to set up Supply again after 11 o'clock; and in so doing they had acted in accordance with the usual custom.

MR. WARTON then resumed his remarks, when

MR. SPEAKER said, he must again remind the hon. and learned Member that it would be quite out of Order for him to move, on going into Committee of Ways and Means, an Amendment which he had given Notice of on going into Supply.

MR. WARTON then said, he would content himself by making some general observations on the subject of his Motion without moving it. What he complained of was that, by the arrangements made between the salesmen to whom fruits and vegetables were consigned for sale in the great London markets, the produce found its way into the hands of middlemen, who arranged the prices at which they should be sold to the greengrocers and costermongers, so that the producer did not receive as much as he ought to do for what he had to sell, and the consumers were compelled to pay much more than they ought to do for what it was necessary for them to buy. The telegraphs gave means to the salesmen in the London markets to regulate the supply that should be delivered, and, therefore, to have control over the prices that could be commanded. As matter of fact, it was well known that the London markets were supplied very largely with the refuse of the Paris markets; and, as far as our home producers were concerned, that they often received not more than $\frac{1}{2}$ d. each for cauliflowers, for instance, which were sold to the consumers at prices ranging between 4*d.* and 9*d.* The same rule applied to poultry and meat, which were brought to this country from France and America, and sold at enormous profit as the product of English poultry-yards and grazing and feeding farms. But the evils which existed in connection with vegetables, fruit, and poultry dwindled into insignificance when compared with the case of fish. On the average, an acre of sea produced as much food as three acres of good land, except in those parts of the sea to which fish did not go. Now, sometimes there was a great catch of fish, but the public was seldom allowed to benefit by it, the greater part being in most cases thrown back into the sea or allowed to rot. This was the doing of the salesmen, who regulated the supply according to their own wishes, with the object of keeping up the price of the article. Fish could be kept in ice for 12 or 15 days; and, therefore, there could be no excuse for throwing it away. Providence having given us the blessing of great abundance in fish, surely we should avail ourselves of it. His object was to have fish properly exposed for sale for a sufficient time to enable the public to buy it. In conclusion, he would observe that the question concerned Irishmen and Englishmen equally; and he could do no more, after what he had said, than to hope that the matters to which he had drawn attention would receive the careful consideration of the Government.

(POLITICAL AFFAIRS).

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in rising to call attention to the deficiency of official information respecting recent events in Asia, said, he had intended to ask the Government, If they can explain to the House why, when they fixed on the 24th March for the discussion of their policy in Afghanistan, they failed before that date to supply the House with the necessary documents, since published, giving the Russian official exposition of the meaning of their previous assurances, as well as the objections of the Indian Government to the orders sent them from Downing Street? He apprehended, however, that according to the Forms of the House it would not be competent for him to address to the Government that identical Question; and, therefore, he proposed to put a Question of a different character to the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He would ask, Whether he could supplement the statement which he made on March 24 with information about the advances since made in Central Asia by the Russian Armies; whether the statement that General Skobeleff had been recalled was an accurate statement; and, whether his hon. Friend had any reason to believe that the Russians had been ordered to discontinue their warlike operations? On all questions of this character in a discussion the Government who were in Office had an enormous advantage, as they could produce what Papers they chose and hold back what they chose. If the discussion was likely to prove inconvenient, they had only to say they could not produce such and such documents. Well, on the occasion when his hon. Friend (Mr. E. Stanhope) brought forward his Motion they were entirely in the dark upon two all-important points, and those two points were what were the opinions of the Indian Government upon the orders which they had received from home; and, secondly, what were the intentions of the Russian Government with regard to military operations in Central Asia. They had a pretty strong opinion at the time that the opinions of the Indian Government and of the Council of the Governor General were antagonistic to the orders they received from Downing Street, and they were very anxious to obtain from the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India an accurate record of what were the opinions of the Indian Government, and they pressed the noble Marquess on that subject; but they could not induce him to afford them information. The Papers from India containing the objections to the orders from Downing Street somehow miscarried, and did not arrive in time for the debate. A debate took place, and a division was arrived at. The Government obtained a majority of 120; and that majority, he thought, gave the Prime Minister the greatest satisfaction, for he on more than one occasion alluded to it. They obtained that majority, and the British troops were ordered to withdraw from Southern Afghanistan. The British troops were still in Southern Afghanistan, and why? Because the Indian Government, although they did not dare to refuse to obey the orders that were sent to them from England, yet felt it so necessary in the interests of the Indian Empire that those orders should not be carried out beyond certain points, that they insisted on occupying Pishin. And Pishin was just as much in Southern Afghanistan as Candahar. The result was that at the present moment our troops in Southern Afghanistan were in a most unfortunate position. There were certain advantages connected with a permanent occupation of Candahar. There were certain advantages also connected with a withdrawal from Candahar. But they had abandoned the advantages of both by occupying Pishin. The advantage of remaining at Candahar was that the presence of British troops would prevent any local insurrection or disturbance. On the other hand, there was the danger that if a local disturbance did take place we might be involved in it. But, by withdrawing to Pishin, they had very much increased the likelihood of a disturbance at Candahar; and if that disturbance took place our troops would be bound to come forward and help our friends to suppress it—unless the Liberal Government came to the resolution that it was better to throw our friends over than run the risk attendant on such an operation. Well, such was the unfortunate position in which we found ourselves. And why were we in that unfortunate position? Simply because the House on the 25th March arrived at the conclusion, in absolute ignorance of the opinions both of the Indian Government and of the Council of the Governor General of India, as well as of the intention of the Russian Government. He thought he might here say that it had been the invariable practice of every Government to produce Papers which were relevant to any question which was to be discussed, especially if it was a Party question, in time for that discussion. It was perfectly clear that no discussion could be thorough if those who discussed it were not in possession of accurate information. The Secretary of State and the Viceroy had a power of enormous magnitude; but when Parliament vested Secretaries of State and Viceroys with that power it laid down certain precautions. It was felt at the time when the Government of India was transferred from the East India Company to the Crown that Indian questions might be more frequently introduced and become matters of Party conflict, and therefore that the House might always be in possession of the opinions of those who were not influenced by Home politics, it was enacted that any despatch, whether written by a Secretary of State at home or by a Viceroy of India, which was laid before their Councils, any opinions the members of those Councils might express should, with the despatch, be laid before Parliament; and by that means, therefore, Parliament would be in possession of the views of Indian officials on any question that might be under discussion. What had happened? On the 25th of March the House had arrived at a most important decision with regard to our Frontier policy in the North-West of India, and late on the night of the 24th despatches were laid on the Table of the House, so that his hon. Friend who had brought forward the Motion relating to Candahar had not had time to read them before he spoke on the subject. A few days after the opinions of certain Members of the Council of India were laid on the Table, and about three days subsequently a number of most important despatches relating to the intentions of Russia with regard to Central Asia were published by the Foreign Office. Now, he found the arguments which had been employed by the Members of the Council of India were entirely in accordance with the views expressed upon that (the Opposition) side of the House, while the despatches from St. Petersburg more than confirmed the darkest insinuations which had been thrown out in regard to the designs of Russia. It was impossible, therefore, to avoid coming to the conclusion that if the House had been in complete possession of the authentic and official information to which he referred, they would hardly have come to the decision at which they had arrived. [A laugh.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh; but he might mention that when the question as to who was to blame for the delay of the despatches came to be investigated in India, the Deputy Postmaster of Bombay, upon whom the responsibility was sought to be placed, was so affected by the decision that he committed suicide. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for India was asked, in reference to the occupation of Candahar, whether a certain despatch from Sir Donald Stewart represented the views upon the subject entertained by that gallant General at that moment. There had been some doubt upon the point, and therefore the question was asked. There was now, however, in the Blue Book a despatch from Sir Donald Stewart which entirely confirmed almost every argument which had been put forward by his hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincoln (Mr. E.

Lord George Hamilton

Stanhope) against the abandonment of Candahar. Yet in the debate the name of Sir Donald Stewart had been paraded by Her Majesty's Government as being in favour of the policy of abandonment. He now came to another and the most startling of all the documents which had since been published. The House was aware that the Russian Government had given the most positive assurances that they had no intention of attacking or going near Merv—one of the most important stations in Central Asia. But when the late Government were defeated at the General Election in the month of April last year, the Russian Government were sharp enough to see that it was possible the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian and his Colleagues might come into Office. What, under those circumstances, did they do? In April they prepared a despatch, which they sent to the Russian Ambassador in this country. The despatch stated, in effect, that they thought the importance of Merv had been very much exaggerated; that they could not pledge themselves to the exact limits within which their military operations would be confined; that they had no desire to push as far as Merv, but that, if they found themselves compelled to do so, they certainly would not contemplate a permanent occupation of the place, and would withdraw from it as soon as possible. He might add that the Russian Government gave to their Ambassador in this country absolute discretion as to the time when he should communicate the contents of the despatch to Her Majesty's Government here. At a later period Earl Granville protested against the despatch; and Lord Dufferin, when informed at St. Petersburg that Russia might occupy Merv, said that, as the late Emperor had given assurances on the subject in the most unequivocal language, he had led his own Government to regard the matter as having been placed beyond doubt, and that he hardly knew in what terms to convey to Lord Granville information to a contrary effect. All the Russian despatches were couched exactly in the same terms, and they showed that no assurances given by the Russian Government were worth the paper they were written upon. The date of the latest of the despatches being the 8th of March, and the day specially fixed by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister for the discussion of the Motion of the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln being the 24th of March, he wished to know why the despatches had not been laid on the Table of the House before the debate was brought on? He did not for a moment pretend that either the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India or the Under Secretary had deliberately kept back these documents. [A laugh.] Under the circumstances, he thought the noble Lord ought to be very grateful for that statement, because the House had before them the remarkable fact that when the documents were not forthcoming, and he heard that the Motion was coming on, he suggested to the noble Lord that he should have them sent by telegraph. But—"No," said the noble Lord; "I cannot telegraph these documents. They are of too great importance; and to telegraph an abstract of such communications would materially diminish their importance." He could not help thinking that if these documents of great importance had confirmed the views of the noble Lord, he would have been glad to communicate the effect of them by telegraph, and to lay them in that way upon the Table of the House. And, although he did not mean to say that the noble Lord did not telegraph them because they were in conflict with his own views, there was a certain amount of vis inertiae which the noble Lord allowed to overcome his energy and activity to supply the House with information with which it ought to have been supplied, and which, somehow or other, induced him to take less trouble in the matter than he might have been expected to take. As he had said before, the House were in a position of some little difficulty. They could not discuss the question again, because they were precluded from doing so by the Forms of the House; but, under the circumstances, he thought they had a right to ask for some explanation from Her Majesty's Government. If the Government could, as it seemed to him they must, admit the facts to be as he had stated them, then he did hope that the House would receive some assurance from them that if ever again they made a question a Party question—["Oh!"]—if, above all, they ever made an Indian question a Party question—

[“Oh!” and laughter.] Hon. Members opposite laughed; but he believed that it had not hitherto been the practice to make Indian questions Party questions. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: Who made it so?] “Who made it so?” said the Home Secretary. Why, the Prime Minister. It was not a Party question in “another place.” [“Oh!”] If it was a Party question, it was a very curious thing that so large a number of Liberal Peers should have voted against their Party. Having been for some years Under Secretary of State for India he knew, and was bound to state, that during the whole of the time he occupied the Office he must gratefully recollect the consideration which the right hon. Gentleman the present Under Secretary (Mr. Grant Duff) always gave to him. But, unfortunately, since the question of the policy to be pursued towards Afghanistan came under discussion many Indian questions, as the House well knew, had been made more or less Party questions. He sincerely hoped that, in the interests of India, they would soon get to the end of Party questions; and all he asked from Her Majesty’s Government was an assurance that if they should consider it necessary in future to bring any one particular Indian question before the House, Her Majesty’s Government would consider it right to publish all the information they had in their possession in reference to such question, and to take such steps as were necessary to have that information before the House before the question was discussed, and when it might be useful, and not afterwards, when it was more or less useless.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: We all, I think, on both sides of the House, appear to have been labouring under a most unfortunate misapprehension in regard to this question of Candahar and Afghanistan. The noble Lord has informed us for the first time to-night that it was the Government who made this question a Party question, and that it was not in the mind of the Opposition to make it a Party question at all. We were under the impression, and it was never contradicted by any Member of the Opposition until this moment, that the Motion of the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln (Mr. E. Stanhope) was a Vote of Censure on Her Majesty’s Government. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North

Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) put a question to the Prime Minister as to the opportunities which would be given for the discussion of the Motion; and the measures which were taken stamped it and marked it as a deliberate Party Motion—a Party Vote of Censure. Taking it in that light, my right hon. Friend gave the earliest and fullest facilities for its discussion. If we had known what we know now from the noble Lord, that it was not a Party Motion at all, but only an academical discussion of a question that was to be discussed like all other Indian questions, without reference to Party considerations, whatever they might have thought, it might not have been necessary for the Government, at an extremely inconvenient period of the Session, to have devoted the time they did to the discussion of the measure; and it is a pity that the intimation was not made until after the discussion which took up so much of the time of the House. In the course of the discussion on that Motion, which we now learn was not a Party one, the charge which the noble Lord made to-night was insinuated once or twice, and I rose to take the earliest opportunity I could to put the question directly to hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and to ask them whether they did deliberately believe that I, in the interests of the Government or in the interest of any particular view of the question, had deliberately suppressed, or taken measures for the suppression, of these Minutes of the Members of the Council of India, which were unfavourable to our views? I had no sooner asked the question than it was repudiated, as I thought universally, by right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I understood that it was an expression of opinion from Members on the opposite side that no such idea was entertained by them. But now, after several weeks’ interval, the noble Lord comes forward and deliberately resuscitates this charge, which I cannot consider as any other than a charge of having deliberately suppressed the despatches. [“No, no!”] Then I certainly cannot understand what it is that the noble Lord does mean. The noble Lord says the Government made a Party question of this, and fixed the 24th of March for its discussion, and he says that the Government named that day and at the same time did not take measures for placing the House in possession of all the information to which it was entitled. Let me just state to the House what are the facts and the dates in regard to this matter. At an early period of the Session several Questions were put to me as to what the answer of the Indian Government was with reference to my despatch on the subject of Candahar. I said that the reply had not been received; but, having communicated with the Government of India by telegraph, I was able subsequently to state that the reply was on its way. That reply was dated the 2nd of February, 1881, and ought to have been received about the end of the month of February. The concluding paragraph of that despatch was as follows:—

“The Minutes which are being recorded on the subject-matter of this despatch by some of our own honourable Colleagues will be forwarded by the subsequent mail.”

I assumed, as I think I had a right to do, that the subsequent mail referred to would be the next mail. I could not imagine that when the Government of India agreed to send the despatch that they were likely to delay it beyond the subsequent mail. But in that I was mistaken. In spite of having been informed that the Minutes would come by the mail which followed the reply, sent by the mail on the 2nd of February, none of them were sent until the mail of February 21st; and the Minutes sent by the mail of February 21st were those which miscarried. On the 28th of February, two subsequent Minutes were dispatched, one of them being that of Mr. Rivers Thompson and the other that of Major Baring. Both of these arrived, I think, on the 21st of March, and it was only then that I ascertained that the despatches sent on the 21st of February had miscarried altogether. They had been sent by the previous mail of the 21st of February, but had missed altogether, and would not be forthcoming. I then found that it was of no use waiting for them any longer, and I gave directions at once that all the Papers in our possession should be printed and placed in the hands of Members. I regret exceedingly that they were not in the hands of the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln until a few minutes before he rose to make his speech; but the despatches, which were extremely short, were in hands of hon. Members that evening, and all who cared to read them had an opportunity of doing so before they came to the division next night. These despatches, although not complete until the subsequent mail, did contain the most able and the strongest Minute against the policy of Her Majesty's Government—I mean that of Mr. Rivers Thompson. The noble Lord says that no explanation has been given of the manner in which the despatches miscarried. The noble Lord never asked what became of them, or it could have been afforded to him. The explanation is a very simple one. They did not go to St. Petersburg. By some mistake they were placed in the Bombay Post Office, and they were sent home, not by the mail, but as a parcel, and in that form they were received, I think, at Portsmouth. [Lord GEORGE HAMILTON: Hear, hear!] The noble Lord seems to think the matter extremely amusing; and, indeed, referred lightly to the suicide of the Deputy Postmaster of Bombay, who was held responsible for the mistake. I do not know whether the noble Lord meant to be serious. If not, it was an extremely bad joke. It is the fact, however, that Mr. Row, the Deputy Postmaster at Bombay, was held responsible for the mistake, and it is a fact that Mr. Row, subsequently to the discovery of the blunder, has committed suicide. What happened was perfectly clear, and there is no mystery about it. The noble Lord evidently believes that the Deputy Postmaster was instructed to send these despatches to Portsmouth by parcel instead of by letter, and that he has been made the victim of the machinations of Her Majesty's Government. The noble Lord says that if the opinion of Sir Donald Stewart had been in the hands of Members before the division was taken, it would have had great influence upon the House, and would have altered the result. Now, not one word was said about Sir Donald Stewart's opinion that was not borne out, and more than borne out, by Sir Donald Stewart's subsequent Minute. What did Sir Donald Stewart say in the Minute that did not reach us? He said that he did not consider Candahar as a strategical position, nor was an advocate of its annexation for any purpose, not even if it could be demonstrated, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that our Frontier could be strengthened by such a measure. I stated that Sir Donald Stewart was not an advocate of the retention of Candahar. I fully admit that he states in his opinion that the evils which may result from a change of policy on the part of one Government when it succeeds another are so great that he is of opinion that it is doubtful whether we ought to evacuate Candahar. Sir Donald Stewart's political opinion was that which I have just read, and it was quite as strong as anything that could be attributed to him in the course of debate. The noble Lord, not satisfied with referring to Papers which are not before us, has gone back to Papers which were before the House for weeks before the Motion of the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln came on. He is now complaining that I published Lord Lytton's Minute, and he says that it has nothing whatever to do with the question. It may not have anything to do with the question in his sense—because he does not find it convenient from his view of the question—but it has a great deal to do with the question, as it was discussed, of the value of Candahar in a strategical and political point of view; and when I was placing before the House the opinion of great authorities on this question, I do not see why I should not include the opinion of so great an authority as Lord Lytton in the year 1878. The noble Lord invites me to discuss our present position in Afghanistan, and he says it combines all possible disadvantages with the fewest possible advantages. He says that this has arisen in consequence of the peremptory orders issued by Her Majesty's Government. Well, I can only say that the present position of matters is the one contemplated by Her Majesty's Government at home, and is the one supposed by the Government of India to be the most suitable. We issued instructions of a very precise character as to the abandonment of Candahar. We left it to the Government of India to decide as to the time of our withdrawal from Pishin. With the full assent of Her Majesty's Government, the Government of India have availed themselves, acting upon the best advice and information in their possession, of the discretion given to them, and in the exercise of that discretion have decided to prolong for some time the occupation of Pishin without, in the least degree, deciding what the permanent policy in regard to that place is to be. Pending further instructions from the Government, they are of opinion that our withdrawal from the position we occupy in Southern Afghanistan ought not to be precipitate, that it ought not to be sudden, that it ought not necessarily to be immediately completed. For that purpose, and with that object, bearing that consideration in view, great discretionary power was given to the Government of India. The Government of India has availed itself of that discretion, and I have no reason to believe that the Government of India has been placed in any position of embarrassment whatever by the position we now hold in Southern Afghanistan. The noble Lord has invited me to give assurances that in the case of future debates full information will be given to the House. I cannot undertake to give any assurance that any other course will be taken than has been taken in this matter. We had every reason to suppose that by the day fixed by my right hon. Friend for the discussion of the question the fullest information, and all the information it was possible to obtain, would be in the hands of the House. Some of that information was withheld by an unaccountable accident for which the Government cannot be held responsible, and I think it is rather to be regretted that the noble Lord and his Friends should by this carping attack endeavour to weaken the decision at which the House has already arrived by so large a majority.

Mr. E. STANHOPE said, he thought the noble Lord who had just spoken had very much misunderstood the observations of his noble Friend the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), and the spirit in which they were made. When he spoke of this question not having been brought forward until a month after the Afghan debate, the reason for this was very clear. His noble Friend had had no opportunity of bringing it on before. He had placed his Notice on the Paper, and called attention to the subject on the earliest occasion that presented itself. The noble Lord appeared hurt at the observations of his noble Friend with respect to this being or not a Party question. But the meaning of his noble Friend appeared to him perfectly obvious. The Motion, when brought forward, was rejected by a large majority of the House. That decision he perfectly accepted; but he was not without considerable hope that the arguments urged in the course of the debate which took place would even now have a very considerable influence on the policy of the Government. When the Motion was proposed, the Prime Minister at once accepted it as a Motion of Want of Confidence. No doubt, it was a very convenient course for the right hon. Gentleman to take, and he did not complain of his decision. After what had taken place in the House of Lords, it was, he thought, perfectly fair that the Motion should have been accepted in that sense. But anyone who looked at the terms of the Motion would see that it would have been very easy to have treated it in no such sense. However, at that moment it was really not worth while entering into an elaborate discussion as to whether it was proposed in a Party sense or not. All he would say was, that the sooner Indian subjects ceased to be discussed from a Party point of view the better, and he was sure the House would find that, as soon as those sitting near him could get away from subjects connected with India which they were obliged to press upon Her Majesty's Government, they were prepared to assist Her Majesty's Government to the best of their power in dealing with all matters relating to India. The noble Lord seemed to think that his noble Friend had made a charge against him of having deliberately suppressed certain Papers. He certainly had not understood his noble Friend's observations in that sense. What he understood him to say was, that the Government fixed their own day for the debate—namely, the 24th of March—and that they were so careless in obtaining information beforehand that, when the subject came on for discussion, the House was without information that the Government might perfectly well have laid upon the Table of the House. He hoped the noble Lord would not think he was referring to Papers with which he was particularly concerned; he was not referring to the opinions of the Government of India or of the Council of India. For his own part, he must say he thought the noble Lord would have been anxious that those opinions should be before the House. They were, on the whole, very unfavourable to the views of the noble

Lord, and, in a certain sense, their absence had been made use of in the course of the debate. But he did think, notwithstanding, that the course adopted by the noble Lord and by the Government, although it might have been perfectly accidental, was most unfair towards Sir Donald Stewart, because throughout the discussion Sir Donald Stewart was being constantly misrepresented. It was urged in various quarters of the House that the opinion of Sir Donald Stewart was in favour of the policy of the Government, while it was urged in others that it was in favour of the policy supported on that side of the House. For his own part, having had an opportunity of reading all the Papers put forward by Sir Donald Stewart, he thought it only fair to say that he had been consistent throughout. He said from the first that, from a military point of view, it was not, in his opinion, of so much importance that Candahar should be occupied by British troops; but that, on political grounds, it would be the basest possible desertion of the people of Candahar that our troops should be withdrawn from it. Now, Sir Donald Stewart was not only the Commander-in-Chief of Her Majesty's Forces in that part of the country, but the officer politically in charge of it; who had lived there for many months, and was the man most qualified to express an opinion upon the question. But that brought him to another point. The noble Lord had said he placed before the House—and, no doubt, he did—the opinions expressed by the Government of India, at the earliest possible date. But he ventured to repeat the complaint made on the occasion of his addressing the House before, as to the famous despatch dated the 2nd of February. That despatch had completely changed the position of affairs with regard to the retention of Pishin and Sibi, and it intimated to this country for the first time that the Government of India objected to the policy that was intended to be imposed on it from home, and desired, for a time at least, that Pishin and Sibi should be occupied by our troops, and had urged some strong contentions in support of that view. That despatch might have been in the hands of hon. Members three weeks before the debate took place; and yet, although it was perfectly well known that they, on that side of the House would, on the 24th March, call attention to the policy of Her Majesty's Government, not only with regard to Candahar but with regard to Southern Afghanistan generally, Her Majesty's Government had thought fit to keep back that despatch of the 2nd of February, and it was not put into his hands until 10 minutes before he rose to open the discussion. He now came to another point, and was glad that the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had not yet spoken, because his next observations would be specially directed to him. When he addressed the House on the former occasion, the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs immediately followed, and made two statements with reference to the whole subject which had a very considerable effect upon the House, and had, as far as he could judge, actually influenced the course of public opinion on the question. He ventured to call attention to both statements. The first of them arose in this way. He had stated in the course of his remarks that an absolute pledge had been given by Sir Donald Stewart to the people of Candahar that they should never again fall under the dominion of the Ruler of Cabul, and he had further stated that to be a specific pledge given not only to the Ameer Shere Ali, but to the people themselves. What happened then? The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs got up and quoted a despatch that was not on the Table; but he frankly and fairly stated that the despatch, although not there, had become the property of the House; and he quoted from that despatch and from a diary certain declarations made by Sir Donald Stewart, that it was the object of the Government, if possible, to make the Ameer secure on his Throne, and, as soon as he had been made secure and independent of British assistance, to withdraw from Candahar. He had since seen the diary on which that statement was published, and found that the diary, so far from in any way affecting the statement which he made was a remarkable confirmation of it, because there was the further statement, which the hon. Gentleman did not think it worth while to read to the House, that General Sir Donald Stewart reiterated to the Sirdar that he might rest assured that the government of the whole of Afghanistan would certainly not be vested in future in a single individual. So absolute a confirmation of his statement ought, he thought, to have been laid before the House. Then, there was another point. Upon the occasion to which he had alluded, he urged upon the House the importance which might be attached to Russian intrigues in Afghanistan, and to the Russian advance towards that country. The hon. Gentleman thereupon got up and said, with an air that, at any rate, carried conviction to the Liberal side of the House, that General Skobelev had been recalled from Central Asia. On a subsequent occasion he had taken the opportunity of asking the hon. Gentleman upon what that statement was founded, and he said it was founded upon information which had reached him, and which had been afterwards confirmed by a despatch from Lord Dufferin. But, upon examination of the despatch, he found that, so far from its being a confirmation, it stated that General Skobelev had been, at his own request, relieved from his command. And that was what the hon. Gentleman described as being recalled by special order of the Emperor. The hon. Gentleman, therefore, appeared to him to have gone on the merest possible hearsay; and it turned out, two days later, when Lord Dufferin's despatch was received, that his statement was not confirmed. What his noble Friend complained of was that the despatches to which he had drawn attention were in the possession of Her Majesty's Government in sufficient time to be laid upon the Table of the House for the purposes of the debate that took place. But the noble Lord opposite had not even touched upon that subject. It was true that had the Government written to St. Petersburg for leave to publish the despatch, some time must have elapsed; but the telegraph would have brought in two days the fullest possible information with regard to the disposition of the Russian Government upon this question. He thought, in that matter, the Government had not treated them at all fairly. They had kept back, no doubt without any design of deceiving the House, information that ought to have been laid upon the Table; they had fixed the debate for a day that was convenient to themselves, and then withheld the information necessary for full and fair discussion.

Mr. E. Stanhope

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he did not quite understand whether the charge against the Government was that they had fixed too early a day for the debate, or that it was owing to carelessness on the part of the Government that the latest Papers were not produced in time for the debate. In either case, he was himself present in the House when the Prime Minister was pressed to fix an early day for the debate, and was now quite ready to examine the two statements that had been made with regard to the Indian Minutes and the Foreign Office Papers. The noble Lord who began this debate had been, in his opinion, sufficiently answered by the Secretary of State for India with regard to the Indian Papers; and everybody on that side of the House, he believed, considered the defence of his noble Friend to be complete. With reference to these Papers, there was every reason to believe they would reach this country in time to be printed; but, owing to the error of the unfortunate man, the Sub-Postmaster at Bombay, who had committed suicide, they had not done so. How any charge could be made against the Government, under the circumstances, he really could not understand. The important despatch to which the noble Lord opposite had referred was that of Lord Dufferin, dated the 8th of March. That despatch was received at the Foreign Office on the 14th of March; and the hon. Member who had just spoken had inquired why leave to publish it had not been asked by telegraph? That had been done. It was the practice, whenever a Foreign Office Blue Book was to be laid before the House, and whenever Foreign Governments had to be consulted with regard to publication, to telegraph the numbers of the despatches, and the consent to publish was generally returned in the same way. But there were often in St. Petersburg great difficulties in seeing gentlemen able to give the consent of the Government; and, in the present instance, consent to publish was not received until the day of the debate. The hon. Member opposite made a further inquiry as to why the despatch of the 2nd of February, relating to Pishin, had not been published? The House would see that the last paragraph of the despatch alluded to the Minutes which were on their way home, and it was the wish of

Her Majesty's Government to publish both the despatch and the Minutes together. When, however, the Secretary of State for India found that the Minutes had not arrived, the despatch was published without them. The hon. Member who had just spoken had also made one or two remarks personal to himself. He said that in the course of the Candahar debate, in which he followed him, he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had quoted from a portion of the Candahar diary, and that, after reading the context, he thought it did not bear out the explanation given. The hon. Member argued that the present Government had reversed the policy of their Predecessors with regard to Candahar; but he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had contended that with regard to Candahar the late Government had no policy. The late Government, he would point out, had never themselves decided what they were going to do with Candahar. He had referred to the matter before; but the noble Lord had never been able to tell him the policy of his Party with regard to that city. Upon this matter he had quoted from the Cabul diary; and when he reminded the noble Lord that he had been unable to designate the line the late Government proposed to take on the question, he would point out that two speakers who had taken part in the debate to which reference had been made, one on the first night, and another on the second, who had been connected with the late Government, took different views to that which the noble Lord himself had taken. He could only refer hon. Members to the diary, which, he maintained, exactly bore out the statement he had made that the late Government had no definite policy with regard to the retention or abandonment of Candahar; and that, as a matter of fact, they were drifting with the stream when they went out of Office. Then a question was put to him as to the recall of General Skobelev, and it was stated that the reply he had previously given was inaccurate, not being borne out by subsequent published documents. It was said that the General had not been recalled, but had retired of his own wish; but it must be remembered that when it was convenient for the home authorities to "recall" an official, it was usually explained that it was done at that individual's express desire. A great many cases of recall could be covered in this manner; and when the presence of a person in a certain place had ceased to be convenient, it was very easy to recall him "at his own wish." The Government had been informed by Her Majesty's Representative at St. Petersburg that General Skobelev had been "recalled." They had continually asked for confirmations of that statement, and they had from time to time received the same reply, which had been submitted to the House in answer to Questions put by hon. Members. The noble Lord had put three questions to him, and this was one—whether the statement that General Skobelev had been recalled was correct? His reply was that it was correct. Then the noble Lord asked whether orders had been given by the Russian Government for suspending the advance of the Russian troops in Central Asia? In reply, with regard to the orders given by the Russian Government, he could only state what Her Majesty's Government were informed. He could not say what orders had been given to the Russian forces; but they heard from Her Majesty's Representative at St. Petersburg, as he had twice informed the House, that there had been a stop put to the forward movement of the Russian troops in Central Asia. Therefore, as to what advance the Russian forces had made, he answered that they had made none; that they had, in fact, been falling back since the date of the debate. Before sitting down, he could only repeat the statement made by his noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) that there was not the smallest foundation for the assertion, either in connection with the Foreign Office or the Indian Office, that Papers had been kept back at the time of the debate. The Government had been asked to name an early day for the discussion, and before that date they had got together all the Papers they possibly could, and had produced them; and even if the Papers which were ultimately found to be missing had been forthcoming at that time, he did not believe that they would have had any substantial influence upon the debate.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the hon. Baronet appeared to think it sufficient excuse for the Government having commenced the debate on the abandonment of Pishin when they did, that they had been urged by the Opposition to name an early day; but he would remind the hon. Baronet that it was impossible for them on that side of the House to know what information the Government were in possession of. When Members of the Opposition pressed the Government for an early day, it was not to be supposed that they wished the Government to bring on the debate before they were able to produce, for the information of their opponents, all the despatches that were at their own disposal. The hon. Baronet who had just sat down began his speech by saying that he really did not understand the charge made against the Government; and the noble Lord who preceded him on that side of the House (the Marquess of Hartington) appeared so to misunderstand the charge as to suppose that it was one of duplicity brought against Her Majesty's present Advisers. They both seemed unable to imagine that there was any middle charge between absolute duplicity on the part of the Government, and absolving the Government altogether from blame in this matter. The case of the Opposition was not that at all. No man on that side of the House believed that the Government intended deliberately to withhold these Papers from the House; but, at the same time, they could not absolve the Ministry from the charge of having so acted that important information which should have been given to the House did not reach them. Let them compare the manner in which the Government had used information, but had not produced it, when it was in their interest to so act, and when it was against them. The hon. Baronet who had just sat down was in possession of certain information with regard to the Cabul diary, to which allusion had been made. He made use of this information, and also referred to a despatch, subsequently laid upon the Table, with regard to General Skobelev. He had used the despatches which supported his own view; but he had given them no opinion as to the despatch which told against them—information with regard to which he had in his possession. That was the natural thing to do; but let them observe how capable it was of abuse, for if Government allowed themselves to use despatches only that told in favour of themselves, it was certain that they would ignore all those despatches

which in any way told against them—and that was exactly what the Government did. He was not touching on the Indian despatches that were kept back by an accident, but the despatch which the Government actually had in the Foreign Office—namely, the Cabul diary which had since been published. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, undoubtedly, did make quotations from that diary, which hon. Members sitting opposite to them were unable to answer because they had not the despatch before them; but he had forbore to quote from information which he also had, and which would have told powerfully in favour of his opponents. That alone, he thought, was sufficient justification to his noble Friend for having called attention to this matter. The noble Lord was unable to go into this question in the course of the debate they had had, as he had not been in possession of the materials to enable him to do so; but he had put down his Notice as soon as he could, and had brought on this question on the earliest possible day. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India got into a state of virtuous indignation at the supposed accusation from the Front Opposition Bench; but it must be remembered how fond the present Ministry and their Followers when in Opposition were of accusing the late Government of feloniously keeping back information. Well, if the present Opposition ever had an opportunity to make use of a similar accusation there never was one more plausible than the present, because there were two entirely separate sets of despatches, both telling in favour of the Opposition and against the Government, in charge of different Departments, and entirely subjected to different influences, neither of which came into the hands of the Opposition in time for the debate. He made no charge of duplicity; but he did say that if such an event had occurred during the tenure of Office of the late Government, he had not the slightest doubt that hon. Gentlemen opposite would not have been restrained by any similar delicacy. He supposed they would have no opportunity—in fact, they could not possibly have any opportunity—of discussing this question this Session with the full information they had received; but he confessed he could not agree with his noble Friend who brought this subject forward, when he said that hon. Members opposite would have had their opinions influenced by these documents if they had been forthcoming. It was clear hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House had formed their decision entirely apart from the documents. Their opinion, in fact, was formed at the time of the General Election. They were influenced by no documents that were then in their hands, and he did not believe they would have been influenced by any documents which had lately been laid on the Table. The only consolation Members of the Opposition had was this—that, apparently, the Government were now being compelled by circumstances not only to go against the policy which they themselves intended to pursue, but to go in favour of that against which they had been able to bring down a majority of 120 votes in this House.

MR. ONSLOW said, that as he had taken as much interest in this matter as any other hon. Gentleman in the House, he should like to be allowed to say a few words. The hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs said hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House had pressed the Government to fix an early day for the discussion on the Candahar question. Well, that might be so; but did hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House believe that the despatches the Government had at their disposal, or could have had at their disposal, could not have been laid on the Table when that discussion came on? He thought it was the duty of the Under Secretary to have warned the Prime Minister, when the right hon. Gentleman was fixing the day, that certain Papers of great importance could not be produced in time for the debate. The right hon. Gentleman, before the debate came on, should have been enabled to give reasons why it should be adjourned to a future date; but that was not done, and the House received no information of the absence of those Papers either from the Representatives of the Foreign Office or the India Office. He could not conceal from himself that the perusal of those Papers, which were not in their possession at the time of the debate, but which had since been produced, would have influenced many hon. Members on the other side of the House. The noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) said the Opposition had made this a Party question; but he was sure the noble Lord would not accuse him of having, at any time, made India a Party question in this House. He thought the whole policy of the retirement from Candahar was part of the policy that the noble Lord sketched out when he was addressing his constituents in North-East Lancashire at the General Election. The noble Lord had been determined to withdraw from Candahar, no matter what happened, and no matter what were the opinions of those now capable of forming a judgment, and had denounced, in no weak language, the policy of the late Government. Well, we had gone from Candahar, and it was only flogging a dead horse to discuss the matter any longer. He would venture humbly to advise the Government with regard to these despatches from India—for it was the first time in his experience that he had known despatches of this kind to be sent by parcel and not by the regular post—that in future they should be sent as all other despatches were transmitted. He did not know whether the noble Marquess had communicated to the Viceroy his displeasure at the course taken by the Assistant Postmaster; but it certainly seemed most extraordinary that these despatches should have come by parcel via Southampton instead of the ordinary method via Brindisi. It was the first time important despatches had come in this way from India, and he hoped it would be the last. It was a most important circumstance, on a question of such vital importance as this before the country, that despatches of great consequence should have been withheld. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs said that he had stated, in the course of his speech, with frankness, that General Skobeleff had been recalled. Yes; but why did he say that? He told them, at the same time, or he indicated, that there had been a change of policy on the part of the new Emperor; and he endeavoured to impress on the House that the change of policy was such, that Russia had no intention of advancing on Merv, and that so strong was the intention of the present Emperor not to follow in the footsteps of his Father, that he intended, on the first opportunity, to recall General Skobeleff. Well, he (Mr. Onslow) contended that the despatches before them did not bear out the impression conveyed to them by the hon. Baronet on that occasion. He (Mr. Onslow) believed that Russia did intend to advance upon Merv, and that at no very distant date. It was said that nothing was to be gained by remaining in Pishin; but he very strongly disagreed with that view. If they were to leave Candahar, it was a great compromise indeed to stop at Pishin; and one of the strongest reasons for that course was, that if in the future they had to advance on Candahar, they would be in a much better position to do so than if they went away altogether beyond the old Frontier. But they were not discussing this matter; and he only wished to impress on the noble Lord, in his responsible position of Secretary of State for India, the necessity, on all future occasions when discussions on Indian matters took place, that he should put before the House all the despatches and all the information he possibly could, and that if he could not give them all the despatches, that he should tell the House why he did not do so.

COLONEL MAKINS did not wish the House to misunderstand the position of hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House. No one would for a moment accuse either the noble Marquess or the hon. Baronet of an attempt at a wilful suppression of despatches; but, at the same time, they could not lose sight of the fact that there were some despatches that were not forthcoming, and the Government should not have allowed the discussion to go on in the absence of those despatches. The hon. Baronet should have suggested to the Prime Minister the desirability of postponing the debate until such time as the despatches could be laid on the Table of the House. If that had been done, all this difficulty would not have arisen. He (Colonel Makins) had no intention whatever of bringing any accusation against any Member of the Government; and all he wanted to do was to point out that they had made a mistake in allowing the debate to take place before the production of these despatches.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he had heard, with great pleasure, the concluding sentences of the noble Marquess, because they seemed not only to justify the speech of the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton), but the original Motion on the Candahar question. They now heard, with the utmost satisfaction, that the Government had arrived at no decision whatever as to the withdrawal of troops from Southern Afghanistan.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the noble Lord who had just sat down was easily satisfied, if he was satisfied with a statement from the noble Marquess, which was precisely similar to one which he had made before the decision was taken in the very debate to which reference had been made. If anything proved the absolute want of necessity for the bringing on of the present debate, it was the statement of the noble Lord (Lord John Manners) that he was entirely satisfied that the object of the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) had been obtained by eliciting from the Indian Secretary the statement he made in his speech on the Candahar debate. The few observations of the noble Lord who had just sat down proved most conclusively that the time of the House had not been usefully occupied with the present discussion. The noble Lord had been beating the air to obtain from the noble Marquess a statement which he explicitly made a month ago.

Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

(Stamp Duty on Transfers of County Stock.)

(1.) Resolved, That where the justices of any county, liberty, riding, parts, or division of a county, shall be empowered by any Act of Parliament to create "County Stock," the transfers of such stock shall be chargeable with Stamp Duty as if they were transfers of the debenture stock of a company or corporation.

(Stamp Duty on Stock Certificates to Bearer.)

(2.) Resolved, That every "Stock Certificate to Bearer" which shall be issued under the provisions of "The Local Authorities Loans Act, 1875," or of any other Act authorising the creation of debenture stock, county stock, corporation stock, municipal stock, or funded debt, by whatever name known, shall be charged with the Stamp Duty of Seven Shillings and Sixpence, for every full sum of One Hundred Pounds, and also for any fraction less than One Hundred Pounds, or over and above One Hundred Pounds, or a multiple of One Hundred Pounds, of the nominal amount of the stock described in the certificate.

(Duty on Licences for Sale in Railway Carriages.)

Moved to resolve, That there shall be charged and paid upon every Licence for the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors and Tobacco in any carriage used for the conveyance of passengers on any Railway, the Excise Duty of . £5 0 0.—
(Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

MAJOR NOLAN inquired, as a matter of form, how hon. Members could obtain information as to Ways and Means?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, Resolutions of this kind were never given Notice of, he believed; but they would be renewed on Monday, and could then be considered. The present proposal was not an important one; it was simply to provide facilities for refreshment on Pullman cars.

MR. GORST asked whether this tax was to be levied for Revenue, and whether Revenue was expected from it?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH replied, that he believed there was one dining car now in use, and the object of the proposal was simply to enable persons dining in that car to obtain a glass of wine.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next.

THAMES RIVER (No. 2) BILL.—[BILL 148.]

(Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Evelyn Ashley.)

MR. W. H. SMITH hoped a longer date than Monday would be fixed for this Bill, and observed that there was no chance of the Bill being taken on Monday.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR said, the Bill would not be taken on Monday.

(re-committed) BILL.—[BILL 104.]

(Mr. Monk, Mr. Serjeant Simon, Mr. Fry, Mr. Barran.)

MR. MONK moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, and that the Order for Committee should be discharged.

MR. WARTON wished to know the object of the hon. Member's Motion?

MR. MONK replied, that the object of sending the Bill to a Select Committee was that the Amendments on the Paper should be carefully considered in Committee upstairs, and evidence taken if necessary.

Motion agreed to.

Order for Committee read, and discharged.

Bill referred to a Select Committee.

[BILL 5.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

COLONEL MAKINS asked whether this Bill did not come under the operation of the half-past 12 Rule, as there were Amendments?

MR. SPEAKER: The Rule does not apply to Amendments when they are only Amendments in Committee.

Clause 1 (Interpretation).

MR. INDERWICK said, it appeared to him and to some of his Friends desirable to have some definition as to what were public meetings for the purposes of the Bill; and he, therefore, proposed that for the purposes of the Act the words "public meeting" should mean "any meeting to which reporters of the Press were admitted." As this was a Bill to give certain privileges to newspaper editors and proprietors, he hoped the Committee would be of opinion that the definition he proposed was sufficient to give them an intimation of what a public meeting was, and how far their liability extended.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 3, after the word "advertisements," to insert the words "public meeting shall mean any meeting to which reporters for the press are admitted with the assent of the said meeting."—(Mr. Inderwick.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL MAKINS saw considerable objection to proceeding with this Bill, even though it was unopposed, at that late hour; but he should like to ask the hon. Member why he left out the definition "not less than twenty Members?" Any hole-and-corner meeting might, by obtaining the presence of reporters, constitute itself a public meeting within the terms of the clause. He objected strongly to leaving out the definition "not less than twenty Members."

MR. HUTCHINSON said, his hon. Friend had omitted the words at his desire, for otherwise meetings of Churchwardens, Vestries, Local Boards, and other local authorities would be excluded from the Act.

COLONEL MAKINS thought meetings of Guardians, Vestries, and such public bodies might very well be alluded to specially in the clause; but he objected strongly to leaving out the limit as to 20 persons, having regard to meetings other than those specially mentioned.

MR. LEAMY wished to know why the hon. Member omitted the words "with the consent of the meeting," seeing that reporters could not report unless they were admitted.

MR. INDERWICK explained that the ordinary course for reporters who were sent to private meetings was to ask if they were to be admitted; and if they were admitted, it was understood that they were admitted by consent of the meeting. But the words "with the consent of the meeting" might render it necessary to put the question to every meeting. That was why he put the Amendment in that form. He thought the Bill very reasonable, and he put this Amendment on the Paper in order that it might be discussed.

COLONEL MAKINS thought the Amendment proposed was so different in character from that already on the Paper, that it would not be right to consider it at that time. It raised many questions which would require discussion. He should move that the Chairman should report Progress.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. HUTCHINSON, gathering that the general feeling of the House was to adjourn the discussion, expressed his willingness to bow to that feeling.

MR. HEALY said, it was so seldom that there was a chance of making progress, that it was advisable to discuss this important Bill.

MR. COURTNEY hoped the hon. and learned Member for Rye (Mr. Inderwick) would not press his Amendment. The Bill had been carefully considered by a Committee upstairs for several years, and he had the honour to consider it as a Member of the Committee. The first year the Chairman was the Attorney General of the late Government, and last year the Attorney General of the present Government was Chairman. The Committee considered the question of putting in words precisely defining public meetings, but they gave up the attempt as being really impracticable. They, however, inserted words which they thought were a sufficient guarantee. It would add materially to the difficulties of applying the Bill if it was attempted to provide precisely as to how reporters were to be present at meetings, and he hoped the hon. and learned Member would not press the Amendment.

MR. INDERWICK said, he should like to take the opinion of the Committee on the matter. His object was to extend the operation of the Bill, and he did not anticipate the difficulties pointed out by the hon. Gentleman. He should, therefore, take the opinion of the Committee as to whether it was desirable to introduce this definition.

MR. WARTON thought the proposal most absurd. Two persons might meet together, and because they had a reporter present they became a public meeting.

MR. DAWSON considered the words proposed to be introduced most proper words, for the presence of reporters at a meeting made it a public meeting in the most effectual manner. He heartily approved of the Amendment.

COLONEL MAKINS said, he should certainly vote against the Amendment; but, in the event of its being carried, he should move that a public meeting should consist of not less than 20 persons.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 13; Noes 40: Majority 27.—(Div. List, No. 202.)

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (Newspaper reports of certain meetings privileged) agreed to.

Clause 3 (No prosecution for newspaper libel without fiat of Attorney General).

MR. COURTNEY proposed, in line 33, to leave out the words "Her Majesty's Attorney General," in order to insert "Director of Public Prosecutions." This question was raised in Committee upstairs, and he was bound to say it was there decided against his opinion and in favour of making criminal prosecutions for libel depend upon the allowance of Her Majesty's Attorney General. It appeared to him at the time, and it had appeared to him more strongly since, that no allowance for a criminal prosecution should be left to the discretion of a political officer. It appeared to him that in many cases the task of the Attorney General would be one of great difficulty and delicacy. Many libels arose out of a political controversy; and it might happen that the Attorney General was of opinion that no allowance should be made for a criminal prosecution, yet he might grant it, for fear that if he did not he would be accused of political partizanship. To relieve the Attorney General from the possibility of such a position he proposed this Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 33, to leave out the words "Her Majesty's Attorney General," in order to insert the words "the Director of Public Prosecutions."—(Mr. Courtney.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'Her Majesty's Attorney General' stand part of the Bill."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON), suggested that, inasmuch as the Attorney General directed criminal prosecutions in Ireland, and as there was no such Officer in Ireland as "Public Prosecutor," the Amendment should read—"Public Prosecutor in England and Attorney General in Ireland."

MR. HUTCHINSON said, the House was unanimous the other day in thinking the Attorney General by far the best authority to whom this question could be referred, because he could be called to order in the House of Commons if there was any misuse of his power. This would not be so in the case of the Public Prosecutor. They need have no fear of the duty being honourably discharged by the Attorney General for the time being; his social position and political status were sufficient to ensure an impartial administering of the Act. He disapproved of making any further differences between England and Ireland.

MR. WARTON hoped the distinguished legal authority who had just spoken (the Solicitor General for Ireland) would excuse him if he did not agree with him. He should infinitely prefer the Attorney General to the Public Prosecutor. One thing was most amusing. The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), in moving the Amendment, did not know the name of the official he proposed to substitute for the Attorney General. He did not know whether it was the Prosecutor General, or Director of Prosecutions, or Prosecutor; and had to appeal to the right hon. Gentlemen sitting near him. The fact of the matter was that the office of Prosecutor was on its trial. There was a staff of six clerks to be appointed; only one clerk had yet been appointed, and the whole Office was treated with discredit by everybody. The Prosecutor was a man of no weight; and there was no argument which could be used in favour of the present proposition. The hon. Member for Liskeard had said the duty would be a delicate one for the Attorney General to have to perform. No one ever supposed the Attorney General would act unfairly, no matter to which political Party he belonged. He knew the Attorney General was a most overworked man, and wanted to have no fresh duty thrust upon him. He was, however, the proper person to discharge a duty of this kind; and it was rather hard at this time of the morning to have an Amendment of this nature started upon them.

MR. HEALY thought they ought to establish a precedent in this Bill, and make the Public Prosecutor or Attorney General give this allowance without fee or charge. He therefore asked the hon. Member for Liskeard to consent to add to his Amendment the following words:—"The same will be given free of all charge or fee."

MR. LEAMY said, the Public Prosecutor in Ireland was the Attorney General. He understood the Attorney General assented to other prosecutions. If that were so, he did not see why his assent should not be taken in the case of criminal prosecutions for newspaper libel.

MR. INDERWICK said, this was a matter which chiefly concerned editors and proprietors of newspapers; and he understood they preferred to be in the hands of the Attorney General rather than in those of any other official. In his opinion, it would be a great advantage to substitute the Public Prosecutor for the Attorney General. The Public Prosecutor was a permanent official; he was not a political Officer or a Member of the House of Commons, but was liable to give an account of his actions to the Lord Chancellor or the Lord Chief Justice for the time being. Under these circumstances, it would be held by the public that he was a more impartial official than the Attorney General, especially in libels of a political nature, and he must support the Amendment.

Question, "That the words 'Her Majesty's Attorney General' stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Further Question put, and agreed to, "That the words 'the Director of Public Prosecutions' be substituted."

MR. COURTNEY proposed to add, after the word "prosecutions," the words "in England, or the Attorney General in Ireland."

MR. HEALY thought this a most objectionable proposal. They wanted a Public Prosecutor in Ireland. He did not wish to obstruct the Bill; but it was a most disgraceful thing for them in Ireland, where political strife was at times so heated, to have to apply to the Attorney General to be allowed to conduct the prosecutions. They had a recent case in Ireland—the case of Mr. Parnell and others against The Dublin Evening Mail. If Mr. Parnell and others had had to go to the Public Prosecutor or the Attorney General in that matter, the fiat would never have been granted. The Attorney General for Ireland would see the force of his remarks.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, his hon. Friend (Mr. Healy) mistook the scope of the Bill. It was not a Bill to protect writers, but to protect newspaper editors from the consequences of publishing libellous reports. As they had no other official in Ireland than the Attorney General to whom a matter of this kind could be referred, he should support the Amendment.

Mr. Hutchinson

MR. WARTON asked why the word "fiat" was retained in the clause? How could there be a "fiat" to the Director of Prosecutions if such an official existed?

Amendment agreed to.

MR. INDERWICK moved, at the end of the clause, to add the words—

"And every such prosecution shall be heard and tried on the same principles, and in the same manner, and subject to the same rules and regulations as civil actions now tried in the High Court of Justice."

He thought that, as a matter of principle and as a matter of right, the defendant in an action of libel might require the charge to be proceeded with as a civil action, and that it should not be in the power of the prosecutor to put him to the disadvantage of being put on his trial for a criminal action, where his mouth would be closed. He therefore moved this Amendment as an act of fairness and justice to the newspaper proprietors, and as an amendment of the law which had become absolutely necessary.

Amendment proposed,

At end of Clause to add "and every such prosecution shall be heard and tried on the same principles, and in the same manner, and subject to the same rules and regulations as civil actions now tried in the High Court of Justice."—(Mr. Inderwick.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) was sorry that he could not accept the Amendment. It might be right or it might be wrong to allow a person placed on his trial for a criminal action to give evidence and to have the same advantages as the defendant in a civil action. He would not enter into that question, which was a very broad one, now; but it was not proposed by the Bill that the trial in these cases should necessarily be by means of a civil action, and the question whether it was right or wrong to retain the present condition of things, and to refuse to a man who was criminally charged the power of giving evidence in his own behalf, should not be settled by making an exception to the ordinary rule in trials for libel. Under the Criminal Law, all persons put upon their trial for a criminal action were placed in a certain position, and it would be undesirable to establish an exception only in the case of a particular class of persons who happened to be newspaper proprietors. He trusted that his hon. and learned Friend would not ask the Committee to assent to the important alteration proposed by the Amendment.

MR. DAWSON thought that some distinction ought to be drawn between an ordinary libel and a newspaper libel. Very often a newspaper libel only repeated words which some other person had used, whereas an ordinary libeller placed himself knowingly in the position which rendered him liable to be prosecuted. The newspaper proprietor who published a libel was in a totally different and in an altogether exceptional position. No moral criminality attached itself to him; but he was constantly harassed and distressed by being made the object of a criminal prosecution. He thought the House ought to avail itself of any legitimate opportunity for relieving the Press from the invidious position in which it was now placed.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson) seemed to forget that the Committee were now engaged in giving exceptional privileges to the newspaper proprietors, and already in Section 2 they had provided that if it could be shown that the newspaper proprietor had only published a report that was accurate, it should be a complete answer to the charge. It was unreasonable to ask them to go further, and to say that a case which the Attorney General or Public Prosecutor considered to be a fit case for a prosecution should be dealt with in an exceptional manner.

MR. HUTCHINSON said, he should have been glad to accept the Amendment; but, after the remarks which had been made by the Law Officers of the Crown, he hoped that his hon. and learned Friend would withdraw it.

MR. INDERWICK had no desire to put the Committee to any unnecessary trouble in the matter. He had understood that the Amendment he proposed had the assent of the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Hutchinson) and others who took an interest in the question; and personally he should be glad to see such a provision extended to actions other than actions for libel. He had thought it right that the Committee should have their attention drawn to the subject, and that the law should provide that wherever there was an alternative remedy and the person aggrieved chose to proceed by way of criminal action, the defendant should have the right of giving evidence in his own behalf. He had no wish, however, to put the Committee to the trouble of dividing, if the feeling of the Committee was substantially against his Amendment.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Register of newspaper proprietors to be established) agreed to.

Clause 5 (Annual returns to be made) agreed to.

Clause 6 (Penalty for omission to make annual returns).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) moved to report Progress. The Committee would recollect that in the course of the discussion which took place on the second reading of the Bill, the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) called attention to the deficiencies of this clause in regard to the penalties imposed under it. It was necessary that the clause should undergo some alteration. He had no wish to stop the progress of the Bill at the present moment; but it was necessary to report Progress, because it would not be regular to propose any alteration of the penalty on the Report, and he was not in a position then to say in what respects it was desirable to alter the clause.

THE CHAIRMAN: It would be quite competent to re-commit the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) believed that an understanding had been come to that something should be done to alter this clause; and he certainly thought it would be better to report Progress. He did not think there would be any difficulty in getting the Bill through Committee when it was brought on again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

MR. WARTON thought there ought to be a penalty of so much a day for neglect of registration.

Mr. Inderwick

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Tuesday next.

QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any information could be given with regard to the nature of the Treaty or Convention which was reported to have been signed by the Bey of Tunis? From accounts which had been received, it appeared that the French General with a large escort, and supported by a strong force in the immediate vicinity of the City of Tunis, demanded an audience of the Bey, who was at length, under great pressure, induced to sign a Treaty virtually placing the Regency of Tunis under a French Protectorate.

EARL GRANVILLE: The Treaty which has been signed appears in some of the newspapers; but it will be only officially communicated to us at the time when it is communicated to the French Chambers. After it has been so communicated it will be included in the Papers which will be laid on the Table of your Lordships' House.

RUSSIA—PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: I beg to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which I have given him private Notice. I wish to know, Whether he has received any information from Her Majesty's Consul at Odessa or elsewhere with regard to the alleged persecutions, and even massacres, that have been perpetrated on the Jewish population in Southern Russia?

EARL GRANVILLE: I have received no information from Odessa; but I received this morning a despatch from the Chargé d'Affaires at St. Petersburg to the following effect:—

"Serious riots, accompanied with acts of great violence against the Jews, have lately occurred at Elizabethgrad and Kieff; and The Official Gazette of to-day states that General Drenteln telegraphs from the latter place that order has now been re-established, but that disturbances against the Jews have broken out at the stations of Tartovo, Imerinki, and in the town of Vassilkoff, and that troops have been despatched to the above places. Riots of a similar nature, not possessing, however, a dangerous character, have, it is stated, occurred in the districts of Konatop and Ananieff.—I have the honour to be, with the highest respect, your Lordship's most obedient servant,

(Signed) "HUGH WYNDHAM."

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY rose to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether they will prohibit the importation of American hams of which a large proportion are infested with trichinæ and bacilli, also of such oleo-margarine or butterine as contains the grease of pigs suffering from the new disease of swine at Chicago, and the fat of horses infected with disease, or such as is adulterated with soapstone? The noble Lord said this question had attracted the attention of the Government some time ago. They had made inquiries of their Inspectors on the subject, and on the 8th of March Mr. Dodson said he believed no case of trichinosis had occurred in this country, and that there was no cause for alarm on that score. He had directed a Circular to be issued to the several sanitary authorities as to precautions in cooking hams and pork. Yet the Local Government Board's ninth Annual Report for 1879-80 contained a medical Report on an epidemic on board the Cornwall schoolship, which was proved to be caused by trichinosis, by Mr. Power having exhumed a boy who had died of it, named Richard Pierce, and discovered that his body was full of trichinæ, and one still living, wandering trichina. A case of trichinosis which occurred at Kansas was thus described by the British Consul—

"In this case the victim was a farmer. He had been ill for some time, and became much reduced in flesh. Upon consulting a physician trichinæ were found; worms were in his flesh by the million, being scraped and squeezed from the pores of his skin. They are felt creeping through his flesh, and are literally eating up his substance. The disease is thought to have been contracted by eating sausages."

The Consul reports that two persons recently died of this disease at Milwaukee and one at Chicago, and at that city several people were ill with it. From the answers given on behalf of the Government in "another place" it would appear that they were not sufficiently alive to the dangers incurred from American hams, which were frequently infested by trichinæ and bacilli. Trichinosis was frequently fatal; and the Local Board appeared, as late as the 8th of March last, to be still under the impression that these parasites could be rendered harmless by boiling the meat which contained them. A medical man, however, published the result of his experiments in The Irish Times, and stated that when boiling hams he had not obtained a higher temperature than 45 degrees inside the meat near the bone, which was much too low to kill the trichinæ. Professor Vacher, of Paris, said that the idea that ordinary cooking destroyed trichinæ was quite illusory, and that opinion was based on his experiments. He was told that this low temperature was owing to the salt in the hams. The Local Government Board also appeared to rely upon microscopic examination of hams and pork by the sanitary authorities; but it was not every person that was capable of using the microscope effectively, and the number of hams imported from America was too great for any reliance to be placed upon microscopic examination as a complete protection against the introduction of trichinosis. That was the reason why the French Government decided on prohibiting the importation of American hams by a decree dated February 18, and in doing so it followed the example of Germany, Italy, Austria, Spain, Portugal, and Greece, which had already taken that step. He was informed at the Office of Commerce and Agriculture at Paris that 30 per cent of the hams examined microscopically were infested with trichinæ. Even though the attention of the French medical men was directed to an exceptionally bad consignment, yet a much smaller proportion might cause a great mortality. Trichinæ appeared to have been first heard of about the year 1835; but last year another parasite made its appearance in American hams. Seven of these were eaten by many people at a sale at Welbeck; cases of illness of as many as 72 persons were recorded, besides others that were attacked; four deaths subsequently became the subject of official investigation, and he had heard of two other deaths on the same occasion from the same cause not included in the official Report. The Report by Dr. Ballard, founded on microscopic examinations by Dr. Klein, who was a great authority in such matters, established that these parasites or organisms, to which they had given the name of bacilli, were capable of reproduction, either artificially or by being swallowed or inoculated; and their reproduction and the diseases caused by them in several organs of the body was very rapid. That was proved by experiments on various kinds of animals. All the hams that caused sickness and death to 72 known persons at Welbeck were cooked. The Government could not, therefore, continue to rely upon boiling as a safeguard, and the Circular to the medical officers which was to have been issued in March last with recommendations as to cooking, would be of no avail to prevent disease, and could only serve to obtain for the Local Government Board undeserved credit for good intentions and vigilance. Nothing short of prohibition could keep out the infected hams or secure greater care on the part of those engaged in this trade in America to exclude diseased swine. At Chicago 1,700,000 pigs were killed annually at a large establishment, and as the greatest activity in that trade was from November to May about 12,000 pigs were killed in a day at that modern Gennesareth. M. Molinari, the French agriculturist, had visited and described the establishment and the rapidity with which the pigs were killed. And in dealing with such large numbers it was impossible to expect sufficient care to have been taken to exclude the unhealthy. There was, however, another danger in American meats and butters, perhaps worse than those of trichinosis. All these products were mixed with some chemical solution of an antiseptic nature, such as salicylic acid, chloride of lime, bisulphate of lime, potash, borax, creosote, pyroligneous acid, carbolic acid, sulphuric acid. All these solutions were injurious to and undermined the constitution; and if an excessive quantity were present in a portion of the meat, these drugs might have a fatal effect. With regard to the butterine or oleo-margarine, there were two questions, that of fraud with regard to wholesome oleo-margarine which was sold as butter, and that of the inferior and unwholesome qualities of butterine. It appeared from the Correspondence lately presented to Parliament that a very large quantity of oleo-margarine was imported and sold in this country as butter, and at a price far in excess of its value or the cost of producing it, the difference of the price of cost and sale having been stated to be as much as 5*d.* and 1*s.* a pound. An attempt had been made by the American trade to obtain real Cork firkins in order to pass off these compounds as Cork butter. But besides the butterine made under Mège's patent in a few well-known factories, there was a great number of compounds made in imitation of oleo-margarine, of pig's fat and the fat of diseased horses. Some persons in the United States had been very angry with some of the foreign Consuls for having attributed to mortality among the swine at Chicago to trichinosis, when it was really only a kind of cholera, or a disease to which they had given that name; but whatever the disease, the prevalence of it should be a reason, if not for prohibition of the butterine called suine, at least for its being not allowed to enter this country except under its true name. Mr. Arthur Arnold, M.P. for Salford, had shown that much of the butterine sold in Manchester was unfit for food; but that, owing to the omission of the word "butter" in the Public Health Act of 1875, the health officers could not interfere with it. The majority against the Resolution of Sir Herbert Maxwell was only 16. American industry had reached a lower depth of adulteration, and soapstone powder was largely used to increase the bulk of flour and butterine. Everyone knew, from the label on Dinneford's fluid magnesia, that magnesia might cause obstructions; and he had a good medical opinion that soapstone powder was still more likely to cause obstructions. The right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) said he had a medical opinion in favour of the wholesomeness of soapstone—he was, probably, the only man who would rely upon it.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY said, he could assure the noble Lord that the matters referred to had received, and were still receiving, the careful attention of the Government. It was extremely doubtful whether there was any power to prohibit the importation of any of the articles referred to in the Question. The point turned upon Sections 42 and 43 of the Customs Laws Consolidation Act, 1856. The first prohibited the importation of the carcasses of any infected animals which the Privy Council might by order prohibit, in order to prevent the dissemination of any contagious distemper. This, however, appeared to be limited to the prevention of diseases among animals, and not to extend diseases among human beings. The second provided that the importation of arms, ammunition, gunpowder, or any other goods might be prohibited by Proclamation or Order in Council. The expression "or any other goods" would probably be construed to refer to goods of the kind enumerated—namely, munitions of war. There was no well-established case of American hams imported into this country being infected with trichinæ, and the only instance in which bacilli had been discovered was the well known Welbeck case. The Local Government Board some time since issued a Circular to all the sanitary authorities in the country, pointing out the precautions to be adopted in cooking pigs' flesh, and impressing upon them the necessity of seeing that their officers used special vigilance in inspecting meat of the description referred to, and dealing promptly with such as appeared to be diseased. There was no reason to suppose that this advice had not been acted upon. As regarded oleo-margarine or butterine imported from America, there was nothing to show that it contained the grease of pigs suffering from the new disease of swine in Chicago, or the fat of infected horses. There was no evidence of any injury from oleo-margarine or butterine which had been imported from America; and with respect to such as was adulterated with soapstone, there was no reason to believe that it was injurious to health at all. Of course, if it were sold as butter, an offence was committed against the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, which could be dealt with under that Act. Moreover, assuming it to be injurious to health, Section 3 of that Act would apply, which provided that if any person sold an article that was injurious to health he should be liable first to a penalty of £20, and then to imprisonment for misdemeanour. Even if there were prohibition, the examination, &c. of butterine at the Custom House could scarcely be carried out, looking to its perishable character; and to insist upon such an examination would be, in effect, to prohibit the introduction of foreign butter altogether. Having regard to these circumstances, it did not appear that the Government was in a position to prohibit the importation of these hams and the other things mentioned in the Question.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—TERRITORIAL TITLES OF REGIMENTS.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY rose to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to cause a re-consideration of the proposal to efface the present numerical and other distinctions in regiments of the line and Militia by the substitution of novel (so-called) 'territorial' titles, inasmuch as this proposed substitution is known to be viewed as subversive of esprit de corps, and is in consequence most distasteful to the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates generally, whilst it has not the advantage of increasing the Army by a single additional trained or untrained soldier; the proposed re-organization being moreover practically but a fuller development of the present twin (or linked) battalion system which the Report of Lord Airey's Committee has already proved to have been attended with the most disastrous results."

The noble Earl said he gave Notice of this Motion so long ago as the 7th of April; he did it on his own responsibility, and there was nothing in it of a Party nature. In 1875 and 1879, during the reign of a Conservative Government, he had brought forward Motions on military matters in a similar manner, solely in the interests of the Army and of the country. Four days after he gave Notice of the present Motion, there appeared in the newspapers an epitome of the General Order of the War Office to carry out the scheme of Army Re-organization, embracing the establishment of the territorial system. He had found among several friends of his own extraordinary ignorance as to the meaning of these territorial arrangements; and he should, therefore, venture to give some explanation of the matter. It was 10 years since Lord Cardwell, as Secretary of State, started the scheme of pairs of battalions, whether double or linked. The basis of the scheme was that there should be one battalion at home to be the feeder of its twin battalion abroad, and this arrangement had continued down to the present time. At the same time, it had been thought desirable to establish a local connection between the Militia regiments in the district in which these pairs of battalions of Regulars were supposed to be localized; two Militia battalions were affiliated to two battalions of the Line, making the third and fourth battalions of the brigade, or, as it was now to be termed, the "territorial" regiment. That change was simply nominal, except in regard to the change of uniform and the change of title. As the General Order came out on the 11th of April, it might be thought that his Motion was a day after the fair, but that was not a fair way of looking at it; indeed, he regretted that it would be a part of his duty that night to show that the Secretary of State for War was open to the charge of unfair dealing in the matter—first of all on account of the way in which he had treated the Report of the Committee presided over by the noble and gallant Lord on his right (Lord Airey); and, secondly, in having stated that this proposed re-organization was simply what was proposed by his Predecessor in Office. To appreciate the position in which the question stood, it was necessary to trace it chronologically from its origin; and this could be done most conveniently by giving an epitome of the evidence of Mr. R. A. Knox, Estimate Clerk at the War Office, before the Militia Committee presided over by the late Secretary of State for War, at the time of his holding the Office of Financial Secretary. The Committee was specially appointed to inquire into "certain questions that had arisen with respect to the Militia and the present brigade dépôt system in connection with it;" and it was important to bear this fact in mind, on account of Mr. Childers now attributing the initiation of the proposed system of "territorial" regiments to Colonel Stanley, his Predecessor at the War Office. Mr. Knox began by saying that, in March 1869, in introducing the Army Estimates, Mr. Cardwell said he had a strong disposition to favour a system of shorter enlistments. In the end of the same year great pressure had been put upon the Indian Government by the Home Government to reduce public expenditure, and in consequence the Indian Government had offered to send home seven Infantry and four Cavalry regiments. Ultimately, after much discussion at home, it was decided to reduce the number of companies as well as of battalions in India; and the result was that there were to be 50 regiments of Infantry alone in India, instead of 52, and eight companies in each, instead of 10. At the same time, it was determined to withdraw a certain number of battalions from the Colonies, the result being that whereas in 1869, 46 battalions only were at home, in the following year the number at home was increased to 68, and of course there was a corresponding decrease in India and the Colonies. In the same year the short-service system was introduced, with which, however, his Motion had nothing to do. In 1871, Mr. Cardwell explained why he abolished dépôt battalions. But this Mr. Knox explained in his evidence was the real commencement of the twin—or double and linked—battalion system, which, he said, was the forerunner, and not the sequitur, of the brigade dépôt system; and he continued to describe it thus—

"In the plan that was proposed to the Indian Government in 1870, to effect the reductions in their military expenditure, the plan of linking the battalions of the Service where the regiments did not consist of two battalions was fully drawn out, and I will just read briefly what the plan was. This was in February, 1870—'The principle attempted to be carried out in the following scheme is (1) that the Infantry shall be composed of regiments, each consisting of two battalions, within which service shall be interchangeable for both officers and men; (2) that the normal distribution of those regiments shall be one battalion at home, and one abroad, which would take their tours of foreign service alternately; (3) [this was one of the advantages pointed out of the scheme, says Mr. Knox] that the cadre of the home battalion be so organized as to admit of a second battalion being detached for service, and yet a strong cadre left at home for depôt purposes. The plan in its perfection can be at once worked in all regiments possessing two battalions, one of which is at home and the other abroad. As regards the other battalions, if it may be assumed that before long the number of battalions serving at home and abroad will be equal, one battalion at home could be permanently attached to a battalion abroad as its reserve and depôt, and to alternate with it in its tour of foreign service.' Mr. Knox adds—'Under this arrangement eight companies of the two-battalion regiments would be on foreign service, and 12 companies on home service.' This was in 1870, before the Memorandum of His Royal Highness or the Report of General Macdougall's Committee. In order to start this two-battalion system, a plan was started in the Short Service Act of 1870, which (he says) 'may be described almost as general service for the enlistment of men.' In 1871 Mr. Cardwell explained why he had abolished depôt battalions (in language, as it seemed to him (Lord Galloway), but too curiously applicable in every detail to his own subsequent invention of brigade depôts) in these words—'That system was costly, it was inefficient, it removed the officers from direct subordination to their commanding officers, and placed them under the commanding officers of the depôt battalions. Now it is proposed to establish training centres for the Regular troops and the Militia upon the local principle.' He then explained a proposal to appoint colonels to command large bodies of from 15,000 to 20,000 men. The permanent staff of Militia and Volunteers were to be utilized by these colonels, who were to be colonels commanding of Militia, when the latter were not out for training. Militia and Regular recruits were to be trained together. Militia recruits to have longer training. Billeting of Militia at this time also was objected to. More Regular battalions at home entailed a necessity for more barracks. It was considered, therefore, a convenience was thus afforded to carry out what was wished, of establishing a more intimate connection between the two Forces; 'and thus,' said Mr. Cardwell, 'follows the principle laid down by Mr. Pitt in 1803, that all the instruction of the Militia Forces should be given by the Army.' So far up to 1871 (inclusive), the principle of short service and localization was determined on—that is, identifying with each locality the recruiting and training of Regular, Reserve, and Auxiliary Forces. In 1872, the mode of carrying it out was explained definitely by Mr. Cardwell, and at the same time the brigade depôt system introduced. The chief points were thus notified—'Association of two battalions of Regulars, and two of Militia; the two battalions of Regulars having 20 companies, giving technical strength of one battalion of eight companies for foreign service, the same for home service, and one battalion of four companies, which you can make into a third battalion or a depôt.' Mr. Cardwell, in 1872, explained in the House of Commons 'that in consequence of further withdrawals from the Colonies and abroad the number at home was 71, and abroad 70 of the 141 battalions of Infantry of the Line;' adding, 'it is intended that of two Line battalions united in one brigade, one shall always be abroad and one always at home. The two Militia regiments will be associated with them in the same brigade.' He (Mr. Cardwell) continued—'That the permanent staff of the two Militia regiments will be associated with the local depôt, and when present interests cease, the new permanent staff was to be appointed from the battalion which constitutes the depôt. Army Reserve men and Pensioners in each district were to be attached to the depôt centre for payment, training, &c. Infantry Militia battalions to be placed under canvas at their respective depôt centres. Line and Militia recruits were to be sent direct to brigade depôts for their recruit training.' Adding—'The object sought to be attained by this arrangement is that the battalion at home may serve as a feeder for the supply of casualties in the twin battalion of the same district serving abroad.' After further questions and answers, A. 22, page 5, Mr. Knox says—'The plan which was in the mind of the Secretary of State in 1871-2 did not include brigade depôts at all; it simply included an idea of dividing the country into large sub-districts commanded by a colonel on the Staff to superintend recruiting and inspect the Auxiliary Forces.

In 1870, estimates provided for	17	colonels
In 1872,	"	" 30 "
In 1873,	"	reduced to 15 "

On page 8, in reply to Questions 66-8, by Sir Garnet Wolseley asking whether the intention had not been to amalgamate eventually the linked regiments, and designate them as one corps, and whether The Army List was not changed with that view in its form, Mr. Knox admitted all this, but said it was found inconvenient for reference, and was therefore changed back again. Thus, up to 1872 (inclusive), had been formulated a system embracing (1) twin battalions; (2) short service enlistment; (3) brigade depôts."

Short service was not part of to-night's question. The twin battalion, whether double or linked, was the one and same principle—requiring one battalion always abroad, the other always at home. Brigade depôts may be shortly described as the localization principle, to be carried out by a fusion of the training machinery, and, in consequence, destroying the single battalion (whether Regulars or Militia) as "the tactical unit." This was all started in 1873. In two years the Militia found it was suffering from the effects of the new organization, and set up a howl of lamentation which resulted in the appointment of a Committee which reported in November, 1876.

Here he wished to point out that Colonel Stanley, then Financial Secretary at the War Office, and Chairman of this Committee, prefaced a question which he put to Mr. Knox by a remark which showed that the whole object of the appointment of the Committee was to inquire into the evils from which the Militia was suffering. He said—"This question of the brigade depôt is only referred to us as far as the Militia is concerned." The two chief points which the Committee of which Colonel Stanley was the Chairman recommended were—first, that the Militia battalion should have returned to it its Adjutant, Quartermaster, and permanent Staff, in order to have it restored as a tactical unit; and, secondly—he was quite prepared to admit this much—that the double or twin battalion system having been established, as far as the Infantry of the Line was concerned, the two Militia battalions of the district should become the third and fourth battalions in direct association with them, thus forming in each district a regiment composed of two battalions of the Line and two of the Militia. But the Committee further said that where both battalions of the Line were abroad at the same time the normal establishment of 100 men at the depôt should be expanded to 600, and that, if necessary, one Militia battalion or more should be embodied. It should also be remembered that that Committee was empowered to report only as to improvements in detail on the system established, not to recommend its reversal. The Report was made in November, 1876; and in 1877 the noble Viscount (Viscount Cranbrook), then Secretary of State for War, acted on the advice of the Committee as to restoring each Militia battalion as a tactical unit by giving it back its Staff. The recommendation about the "territorial" regiments came to nothing; and it might, therefore, be fairly argued that the proposition could not have found favour with Viscount Cranbrook. In the spring of 1878 Colonel Stanley became Secretary of State for War; but he did not attempt to introduce "territorial" regiments. He wished their Lordships to bear in mind that Mr. Cardwell, when Secretary of State for War, always urged that the sole object of the new system was to insure that the country should always be prepared for war; and this it was most important to bear in mind in arguing the merits of this question, for it was too apt to be lost sight of. This time, in 1878, indeed, was the first opportunity of testing the new system. But what happened? Two years ago there were two small wars on our hands, the Zulu War and the Afghan War; but in both cases there was a universal outcry against the wretched state in which our battalions had to be sent out. There were innumerable Returns called for on the subject; and, as their Lordships must remember, on both sides of both Houses the subject was continually brought forward. He himself, among others, brought the subject under their Lordships' notice; and his special argument was that the breakdown was far more attributable to the twin battalion, with its sequitur the brigade depôt system, than to the short service system. After he had spoken, the Duke of Buccleuch acquiesced in his remarks, upon which Lord Cardwell got up and said he was surprised at the noble Duke's acquiescence, because he was one of those who signed the Report. The noble Duke said it was perfectly true he had signed the Report—

Lord Limerick, who also sat on the Committee of 1876, said on the same occasion it was true that he also had signed the Report; "but if the question had been an open one"—in other words, if they had had to report on the advisability of the system itself—"the result would have been different." The real fact—as told him by Members of the Committee—was that there was so much recommended in the Report that was good that no one liked to decline to sign it. But there was a further fact, which was that though the "territorial" system was recommended by the Committee, anyone who read the evidence would find that Sir Garnet Wolseley was the person who was really anxious for that system. Sir Garnet Wolseley had at that time carried out the Red River Expedition—a bloodless campaign—with great credit to himself; he had afterwards marched to Coomassie through a mass of jungle, in very difficult circumstances, fighting his way up to that city with yet greater credit to himself, having rightly estimated exactly the number of days it would take. He was thus, at this particular moment, at the zenith of his fame, and it was only natural that his opinion at the time should be taken in preference to any other. Anyone who went through the evidence would see that the Report, as regarded the "territorial" system, was his child alone. His reason for dealing fully with that part of the subject was that on the 3rd of March last the Secretary of State for War having at length been induced to promise the production of the Report of the Army Organization Committee on the following morning, had announced that his Predecessor's Committee in 1876 had recommended the complete fusion of the four battalions—two of the Line and two of the Militia—into one territorial regiment; and he was, therefore, now anxious to point out that, although attributed to Colonel Stanley, as Chairman, the scheme was in reality that of Sir Garnet Wolseley. It might be, naturally, further asked why the changes recommended in 1876 had not been carried into effect up to this time, if Colonel Stanley was so anxious to act upon his own supposed recommendation. But too much stress, it must be admitted, should not be laid on his not having adopted it during the time he was Secretary of State for War, for he found on his hands, in 1878 and 1879, the Afghan and Zulu Wars. Shortly after the late Secretary of State for War came into Office there were constant complaints of the unprepared condition of our Forces; and Colonel Stanley evidently doubted whether the establishment of territorial regiments was likely to prove the true remedy for that unfortunate state of things. He, on the contrary, appointed a Committee, as strong a Committee as could possibly have been chosen, to inquire into the subject. It was worth while to notice the treatment received, not only by that Committee, but also by Parliament, at the hands of the present Government. The Blue Book in which this Report was published contained great quantities of important evidence, and the Report itself displayed the deepest and most copious knowledge of military matters. That Report was received by Colonel Stanley during the last few days of his tenure of Office; then came in March, 1880, the Dissolution of Parliament, and, though Parliament re-assembled in April and sat on into the second week in September, the Report still remained in the hands of the Government, in spite of the constant remonstrances of political friends and foes in Parliament. On November 1 The Times published the first of a series of articles on Army Reform, which bore evident marks of inspiration, and this continued at intervals until the tardy production of the Report early in last March. He did not blame a journal for anxiously endeavouring to be well informed; but it was extraordinary, to say the least of it, that the Report should have been so long withheld from Parliament after it had been practically communicated to The Times, and even after the production of the Report their Lordships had further just reason to complain. Notice was given in that House that attention would be called to the Report by Lord Abinger on the 20th March, scarce a fortnight after its production; but the debate was postponed for a fortnight at the special request of the Duke of Argyll, at that time a Cabinet Minister, as his Grace suggested, "for the convenience of the Government." The discussion was therefore fixed for April 4; but before that day arrived was issued, bearing date the 1st of April, Mr. Childers's re-organization scheme. That was treatment of which both the Committee and the Members of both Houses had a just right to complain. The Secretary of State for War had in some cases accepted the recommendations of the Committee in a modified form. In adverting, however, to the proposal for abolishing the system of linked battalions, the right hon. Gentleman said—

"I must refer to this part of their Report with some qualification; because, however eminent may have been the gentlemen who constituted the Committee, their opinion on this question was not sought in the official reference to them. On the contrary, they were told 'that there was no intention on the part of the Government to depart from the general principles of re-organization which had been accepted by the country since 1870.'"

This was not a pleasant way of alluding to what a Committee of distinguished Officers evidently considered to be the most important part of their Report. Mr. Childers went on to remark—

"I find, however, that at the last moment, when five-sixths of the Evidence had been taken, and when the Committee were on the eve of preparing their Report, a note, in an unofficial form, of which there is no record in the War Office, was received by the Chairman of the Committee, saying that they were not 'precluded from touching on' this question. Whatever may have been the authority for this note, I must decline to treat the recommendations of the Committee on this head, in which they were not unanimous, as other than the personal opinions of a body of officers for whom, as individuals, I have the greatest respect."—[3 Hansard, cclix. 195.]

Within the last three days he had been authorized by his noble and gallant Friend who presided over that Committee to say that on various occasions he went on various points for more direct authority to the Secretary of State for War, and that the right hon. Gentleman's special instructions were, that the Report should be made as wide as possible. It had been alleged that the note was an unofficial one; but his noble and gallant Friend would inform their Lordships that he not only received a verbal sanction from the Secretary of State to go into this question, but that, in order that there might be no mistake, a note was sent to him by the permanent Under Secretary corroborating that sanction. But if further proof be wanted on this subject, reference need only be made to Clause 14 and the following paragraph of the Instructions to the Committee, signed by the Secretary of State for War—

"Clause 14 (n.) Lastly, as being a matter closely connected with the above considerations, it would be well that the Committee should place on record their opinion whether the present organization of battalions and companies is, on the whole, the best for the purposes required for the English Army, both at home and abroad.

"The Committee may further report upon any other question that may be raised, during the investigation, in connection with the above references, and they may call for any Papers or Returns which they may deem necessary.

"War Office,

"20th June, 1879. (Signed) FRED. STANLEY."

In regard to the remark of Mr. Childers "that the Committee were not unanimous on this head," he might point out that this could only refer to Sir Patrick M'Dougall, who, having been Chairman of the Localization of Forces Committee, was bound to put a good face on the matter and to support the system of linked battalions. For Sir Patrick was the only dissentient to unlinking; and even he (whose opinions on Army Reorganization the noble Lord quoted at great length) admitted that the system of linked battalions had not worked well, though he excused its shortcomings on the ground that it had been "unfairly weighted," making, however, this remarkable admission, that—

"It is only in time of peace that the number of battalions at home can balance the number abroad;"

and yet it was acknowledged that it was this basis upon which the system was dependent for expansion in time of war. Their Lordships would see, therefore, that too much importance ought not to be attached to the so-called want of unanimity on the part of Lord Airey's Committee. He must now ask permission to quote several passages from the Report of the Committee in support of his argument. On reference to paragraphs 21, &c., on page 10 of the Report of the Committee, it would be seen that the original scheme—that was, Lord Cardwell's—could never be carried out—namely, "that one battalion should always be at home, and one always abroad," on account of the distribution of battalions from year to year, which would be best shown by quoting the following extracts from the Report of the Committee, of which paragraphs 21, 22, 23, 24, 27, 28, 29, and 30, 31, 32, 34, were thus analyzed—

"Defects of scheme as worked are that even in time of peace the demand for men to supply the battalions on foreign service cannot be met from the depôts, and recourse must be had to the linked battalions, which are thus deprived of their best men; the recruits being transferred, after few weeks at depôts, on to home battalions, and then on to others, unsettles their minds, their interest in obtaining good opinion of officers lessened, discipline and regimental esprit de corps both suffer—no knowledge of one another between men and officers must prove fatal.

"In time of war these defects are intensified, and battalions first for service are rendered inefficient.

"A call for volunteers from the Reserve may be ineffectual (as proved in June, 1879, when 11 sergeants, 19 corporals, and 1,039 privates only responded at a most favourable opportunity in every way); but in any case the men not immediately available.

"These defects caused by varying distribution of numbers of battalions decreased in their strength. No source left available whence the men required for war could be supplied but by

He must ask permission further to read, in extenso, paragraphs on page 42—namely, 263, 264, 265, 266 (as well as paragraph 27 in the Summary) on Linked Battalions—

"We cannot close our Report without referring to a question which, being intimately connected with the present organization, has been pressed upon our consideration in the evidence we have taken, and has a most important bearing on the efficiency of the Army. In the early part of our Report (in 25 and following paragraphs), we pointed out the evils which have arisen from the system in force of linking battalions, by which the battalion at home is practically converted into a depôt for its affiliated battalion abroad, having to furnish drafts for its maintenance to such an extent as to be utterly subversive of efficiency and of that esprit de corps which is essential to the constitution of a good and effective corps for service in the field.

"(264.) We pointed out that under this system the field for the selection of non-commissioned officers was restricted, and that the efficiency of the battalions first on the roster for foreign service was seriously impaired.

"(265.) We have expressed our opinion (paragraph 170) that it is essentially necessary that the weak battalions at home should be in a condition to receive the men of the Reserve when called out on emergency, so that they may be got into good working order without delay; but we are of opinion that this cannot be the case so long as the home battalion is the depôt of its affiliated battalion abroad. The evidence, also, as to the conduct of the young battalions employed in the Zulu War has clearly shown that under the existing system there is a deficiency of that solidity which is due to a thorough knowledge of the various members of a corps, including officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, of each other, and of that feeling of comradeship which is a great motive in causing men to stand by each other with firmness and resolution in the hour of trial.

"(266.) The result of the evidence we have taken has been to impress strongly upon our minds the absolute necessity of some decided measure being taken to re-establish to the utmost that esprit de corps which formerly bound men of the same regiment together as a family having common interests and such strong ties that the honour and credit of the regiment was dearly cherished by each individual composing it. This feeling not only tends to efficiency in war, but to promote good discipline and conduct in peace. After much consideration, we have come to the conclusion that it can only be re-established by unlinking the battalions, by which we mean that the officers and men should, as formerly, belong to separate units, and not be transferable from one to the other. We are aware that this measure, according to the scheme for organization we have proposed, will be attended with expense; but so strongly are we impressed with its necessity, that we unhesitatingly recommend it, and are decidedly of opinion that the expenditure will be more than compensated if, by this means, a proper feeling of esprit de corps can be restored. This expenditure will be caused by the necessity of maintaining larger depôts, but will be compensated, in great measure, by the considerable additions it will bring to the Reserves, and their more rapid growth. Such brigade depôts as shall not be converted into training depôts should be used for the head-quarters of Militia regiments; for training the recruits of the Militia; as recruiting centres; and as centres for the Reserve men residing in that sub-district. The establishment of a depôt from each regiment in each district will not be necessary, and the staff of the brigade depôts should be reduced to such an extent as will suffice for the duties which will remain to be performed thereat.

"(Summary 27.) With a view to prevent the frequent drafting of men from one regiment for service in another, to the cessation of the system by which one regiment serves as a depôt for another, and to the re-establishment of esprit de corps in, and efficiency of, regiments, the present system of linking should be done away with.

He fearlessly challenged the statements made by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War on this subject. The right hon. Gentleman said that if the large scheme was adopted they should repeal their legislation and undo their policy. That need not be the case, for, practically speaking, they need hardly disturb the existing organization. "They should," said the right hon. Gentleman, "alter the whole system of brigade enlisting." Well, he asked whether it was not easier to enlist men for one particular regiment than for more than one regiment? Again, he said that they would "confuse the right and seniority of every officer appointed within the last eight years." That was simply an effort of the imagination.

EARL GRANVILLE wished to point out to the noble Earl that it was not usual in that House to read from a written speech.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, that to read a speech was not his habit. He had copied quotations he meant to rely on, thinking that it would be more convenient to read them from the manuscript in his hand than from the Blue Book. He had confined his reading to quotations and figures. If the noble Earl looked at the paper he would see that it consisted of memoranda which, legible to him, would be quite useless to anyone else. The subject was one of great importance, and he held that it was the bounden duty of every Member of Parliament who believed that a grave wrong was about to be done to the country to rise in his place and protest against it. The figures he was about to quote were taken from the revised Estimates of the Secretary of State for War, and the result of the detailed statement was that 68 depôts would have establishments for the training of about 3,530 officers, non-commissioned officers, and men. The total cost of the 68 brigade depôts, without including recruits, would be £184,167 without rations, or, including rations, £250,000. By the scheme proposed by his noble and gallant Friend the Chairman of the Committee, the cost would be under £150,000. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War said that by his scheme the first 12 regiments for foreign service would have 950 men, and 150 each for their depôt, or 1,100 men. But under the larger scheme the number of men would be the same—they would keep 300 for furnishing the battalion abroad, and have 800 in the other battalion, whether linked or separate. The right hon. Gentleman said, with respect to territorial regiments, they proposed that the two battalions of the Line and two of Militia which now formed a territorial brigade should henceforth form territorial regiments with a common depôt. Then followed a statement of, as he would call it, a general dislocation as to the Scotch regiments, with the addition that “the other two depôts—Edinburgh and Ayr—would remain unchanged.” His noble Friend opposite said that no increased expense would be attached to the change. [The Earl of MORLEY dissented.] What the noble Earl said in reply to his having moved for a Return of the expense to the country and individual officers incidental to the proposed changes—and he was now quoting from Hansard—was that the expense of the proposed changes would be very slight, as only badges and facings would be changed this year. The more important changes, such as alterations in the colour of uniforms, would be deferred till the next issue of clothing. A Return would be misleading. As to the officers, he did not really see how it could affect them very much. Such was the noble Earl's reply. He had himself got an estimate of the cost from Messrs. Hobson—a moderate firm in Little Windmill Street—and it appeared that the alteration in the Scotch regiments would cost the officers £49 5s. per head, and in the English regiments £18 2s. 6d.; while the cost to the country in their behalf, or else to the individual officers themselves, of the one brigade with which he himself was associated—namely, the 61st, at Ayr, would be over £6,000. This was for the officers alone of one single brigade to be converted into a “territorial” regiment. The opinion of officers on the subject generally might not, perhaps, be thought worthy of consideration, after the treatment recently experienced by those distinguished Officers who had framed their Report as the result of the most exhaustive evidence; but he would quote some opinions of non-commissioned officers and privates as to the proposed amalgamation of Infantry regiments, the abolition of their numbers, and the extinction of their regimental individuality. A corporal of the 52nd Light Infantry, a remarkably fine and intelligent man, said—

“I am quite sure nothing would cause more general discontent than doing away with the numbers. What would my regiment be without its number? It is only by its number that it is known in history, and if the number is taken away there will be no connection between the regiment and its history.”

A corporal of the 6th Regiment, a fine young fellow, an Irishman, said—

“Is it take away our numbers? Sure, then, we would be only Militia. They have taken away half our facings, and when the number is gone the history of the old regiment will be gone too.”

A sergeant of the 52nd, a smart young fellow, said—

“I have heard of some changes, but didn't hear till now that we were to lose our numbers. That will be bad. But you see, sir, they have left us the stripes on both arms yet.”

A sergeant of the 69th said—

“These changes will cause great discontent. We hate the 41st already because we are to be joined with them.”

A colour sergeant of the 22nd said—

“I couldn't bear to leave my regiment for any other, and I should not like to leave my battalion. I should resign my stripes sooner than go to the other battalion. I am quite ready to go anywhere to-morrow with my own battalion. I wish they would send for a sergeant from each regiment, and ask him what he thinks of these changes."

A private of the 73rd said—

"I am a Londoner, and I don't want to be a Highlander and to wear the kilt. I know my regiment was the second battalion of the 42nd; but that was many years ago, and we don't want to go back."

He held in his hand several other quotations, all of the same import, which it would be unnecessary to read. He might add that he had also received sundry growls by letter as to specific changes; but that was not his point. He wished to show that both the country and individual officers would be put to great expense in order to create general dislocation and fresh re-allocation, which would take a century to learn, and all that to perpetuate a system which had proved to be rotten and to have broken down by the Report of the Committee appointed specially to investigate the subject after taking voluminous evidence. To continue and perpetuate this system in its intensity was simply to court fresh disaster. He imagined he would be told in reply that the new organization would give an aggregate increase of 2,792 in the number of men, as suggested by a curiosity Memorandum emanating from the War Office. He denied it, and requested proof. Neither Lord Airey nor General Sir Lintorn Simmons admitted it, for there was nothing in the proposed re-organization that could supply more men. It was said that there would be an advantage in a regiment being kept abroad longer—namely, for 16 years, and that it would be more economical. But it was no economy. The regiment would have changed nearly three times over in that time. If they had to send out 1,000 men in one regiment, or five drafts of 200 men each, the expense was the same. He might be told that the House of Commons had passed the scheme; but he utterly denied that the House of Commons had had an opportunity of really discussing it; and he had seen in the newspapers that the scheme had been challenged by Notice of Motion in the other House, although no opportunity had yet been afforded for discussion on the point. He doubted also the wisdom of raising fresh suspicions in the minds of the Militia as to their becoming Line soldiers. He begged to apologize to their Lordships for the length at which he had spoken. He thought, however, that he had proved the proposed scheme of re-organization to be, in detail, ridiculous as regarded the changes in uniform, and, in principle, unsound, unreal, and unpopular—he might almost have added inhumane. But that was a question which came under the head of the "Waste of the Army," with which he would have a further opportunity of dealing. In regard to the length of his speech, he must plead the importance of the subject; and simply ask them to consider the serious state of matters now on the shores of the Mediterranean, and the equally serious state of things across the Irish Channel. He asked, then, whether this was a time well chosen for taking away from regiments those traditionary numbers and special distinctions in dress to which they had been so long accustomed, of which they were so justly proud, and which they still so dearly cherished?

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to cause a re-consideration of the proposal to efface the present numerical and other distinctions in regiments of the line and militia by the substitution of novel (so-called) "territorial" titles, inasmuch as this proposed substitution is known to be viewed as subversive of esprit de corps, and is in consequence most distasteful to the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates generally, whilst it has not the advantage of increasing the Army by a single additional trained or untrained soldier; the proposed re-organization being moreover practically but a fuller development of the present twin (or linked) battalion system which the Report of Lord Airey's Committee has already proved to have been attended with the most disastrous results.—(The Earl of Galloway.)

THE EARL OF MORLEY admitted the great importance of the subject introduced by the noble Lord. The noble Lord had gone at great length into the history of Army Organization since Lord Cardwell's scheme was framed, 10 years ago; and he trusted that the noble Lord would acquit him of any discourtesy if his answer did not extend to the same length. He doubted whether his noble Friend fully appreciated the great difficulties which surrounded questions relating to the organization of the British Army. The important fact must be always borne in mind that more than half our Army was employed in foreign service — 50 battalions of Infantry being permanently stationed in India, and 20 in the Colonies; and that these battalions were annually kept up to their full strength by drafts from home. This fact lay at the basis of every scheme of organization. The problem to be solved was how to keep up a sufficiently large Force at home, and, at the same time, to feed the Army abroad. The scheme now criticized was based on no new principles; it was the logical consequence or development of Lord Cardwell's original measure. That measure rested on two important principles—namely, first, the organization of the Infantry of the Line in double battalions; and, secondly, the localization of those battalions connected with Militia battalions at the brigade depôts. The first principle was carried into effect by “linking” two regiments in cases where they had not a double, or, as in the Rifle Brigade and 60th, a four-battalion constitution, the object being to facilitate the relief of foreign battalions. The second principle had for its object the union of the Auxiliary and Regular Forces, and the improvement of recruiting in all parts of the country. He could assure the noble Lord that the Government was very grateful to Lord Airey's Committee for the ability and industry with which they had conducted their inquiries; and, so far from depreciating the importance of their Report, the Secretary of State, he was glad to say, had been able to adopt, in a great measure, the most important recommendations of that Report. He had not been able to adopt their suggestion that all the linked regiments should be unlinked, and that we should revert to a single-battalion organization. On this point the Committee were by no means unanimous. Moreover, another Committee, presided over by the late Secretary of State for War, and composed of several distinguished Officers and Members of this House, had three years previously recommended a distinctly opposite course—namely, the formation of territorial regiments, consisting of two Line and two Militia battalions. With this conflict of authorities, the Secretary of State was bound to consider the two proposals on their merits. The noble Lord had attributed all the difficulties in completing battalions for service in South Africa to the linking system. He was at a loss to understand how he arrived at that conclusion. If, as the noble lord appeared to wish, all regiments had had but one battalion, fed by a depôt at home, would the difficulties then experienced have been avoided? Far from it; the battalions on active service would equally have been made up to their full strength by volunteers from other regiments. There would have been no other source from which the men could have been drawn, for it was clear that the depôt formed only when the battalion was ordered on foreign service could not have furnished them. The true cause of all these difficulties was to be sought, not in the system of double-battalion regiment, but rather in the fact that that system had not been worked out in the manner which was suggested by those who, in the first instance, recommended its adoption. The regiments at the top of the roster for foreign service were all far weaker than they ought to have been. Instead of having 18 regiments of 800 men, these regiments were only at a strength of 740; and, moreover, in consequence of the opinion given by the Law Officers of the Crown, the late Government did not at first consider that they could accept the service of volunteers from the Army Reserve. In consequence of the weakness of the regiments, large numbers of men were required to raise them to war strength; and as the Reserve men, even as volunteers, could not be employed, these men were drawn from other battalions and regiments at home—a most unfortunate proceeding, but one which was constantly resorted to in former days—in the days, for instance, of the Crimean War—and for which the new organization was by no means responsible. Indeed, he (the Earl of Morley) might fairly say that, had the linking system never been introduced, the difficulties in the way of preparing the battalions for the war in South Africa in 1879 would have been even greater than those which they had actually experienced. Further, he might quote the case of the two four-battalion regiments—namely, the 60th and the Rifle Brigade. The comparative ease with which battalions of these regiments were prepared for service was an argument for going further in the direction of large regiments than was now proposed, rather than of adopting the course suggested by the noble Lord. He admitted that the linking system had not worked quite satisfactorily—there had been a certain amount of friction, there had been found a want of unity of sentiment in many cases between the two linked battalions. It was impossible to remain in the present position; we must go forwards, or back—back to single battalions, or forwards to consolidated regiments of double battalions, with the same constitution as the first 25 regiments of Infantry. The noble Lord quoted from a speech of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State the objections to reverting to the old organization—namely—“You would then have to repeal the whole of the localization scheme. You must break up the first 25 regiments, the 60th, and the Rifle Brigade, into single battalions; and you would practically have little or no use for the depôts, on which nearly £3,500,000 had been expended.” In spite of the noble Lord’s argument, he ventured to think that these were very strong arguments against such a course of proceeding. There was, however, another way of regarding the question. To supply the annual reliefs for battalions on foreign service a very large number of recruits would be required—the estimates varied from 16,000 to 20,000; and if, as was now proposed, no soldier was to be sent to India with less than one year’s service, the latter figure would probably not be much above the mark. These men would, according to the noble Lord’s scheme, be posted to the depôts of the battalions abroad; whether in small depôts, or in battalions, or at large training stations, as proposed by Lord Airey’s Committee, it was not necessary now to inquire. These recruits would be quite useless for home service. The question would then arise, By whom would the expense be borne? It was not likely that any Government would impose this burden on the Indian Exchequer; and, on the other hand, it was doubtful whether this country would pay for an army of recruits useless for service at home. No doubt, the difficulty might be met by including these 16,000 men in the Home Establishment, and treating them as supernumerary to the service battalions.

But if the home battalions were to be kept at their present strength, this would mean a very large addition to the Home Army; and he asked their Lordships whether there was any probability of the House of Commons assenting to such an addition? If, on the other hand, the Home Establishment could not be increased to such an extent, the only possible means of finding place for these depôts would be either by diminishing the strength or the numbers of the home battalions. It was admitted on all hands that the home battalions could not be reduced in strength. Consequently, the only alternative left would be to reduce their number, and to find room for the 16,000 men in the depôts of foreign battalions. They would be forced to destroy at least 20 battalions of Infantry. Was that the best way to strengthen the Army? For the sake of reverting to the old organization, they would destroy 20 or more regiments which, though weak in times of peace, could, in a case of national emergency, be developed, by means of the Army and the Militia Reserve, into thoroughly efficient battalions. This argument appeared to him (the Earl of Morley) conclusive. For these and other reasons the Secretary of State had determined to adopt the recommendations of Colonel Stanley’s Committee. The Report of that Committee had been adopted without a dissentient voice. The noble Lord had hinted that certain Members of that Committee, who were colonels of Militia, and also distinguished Peers, had signed the Report because some of the recommendations would benefit the Militia, not because they agreed with the territorial system—which was, after all, the great principle on which all the other recommendations were based. He could not accept such an explanation; it was not likely that the noble Lords in question would have taken such a course. Had they entertained at the time the opinions attributed to them by the noble Lord, they would have qualified their assent, or they would have explained their views in Supplementary Reports, as was done by several Members of Lord Airey’s Committee who differed, in principle or in detail, from the Report of the majority. Without such qualifications, the Report stood as one which was adopted unanimously by a strong and able Committee. Now, with regard to the question of esprit de corps, he (the Earl of Morley) was far from undervaluing the importance of esprit de corps in the Army. It was a sentiment which he honoured and respected in the highest degree, and one to which as little violence as possible should be done. But respect for this sentiment might be carried a little too far, if it were allowed to prohibit any changes of organization which were, in other respects, for the good of the Army at large. Moreover, he would ask whether these changes would, as the noble Lord foretold, destroy all esprit de corps in the Army? He should be extremely sorry to think that these anticipations would be realized. Every effort had been made to preserve, in each case, the badges and distinctions in which the various regiments felt a just and an honourable pride. Every effort had been made to associate together regiments which were connected together by local or other ties. In some cases, no doubt, a certain amount of self-sacrifice would be required; but these cases had been brought within the narrowest possible limits; and even if in these cases the old associations were, for a time, weakened, he hoped and believed that, in process of time, an enlarged esprit de corps would grow up in the territorial regiments which it was now proposed to create. Many persons, he was aware, considered this a fanciful theory. A sentiment of this kind could not be created in a day; but even now, though the local system was as yet scarcely in thorough operation, experience showed that this enlarged esprit de corps was being gradually formed. In the Appendix to the last Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting would be found the answers of 64 colonels commanding depôts to the question—"Is a local connection beginning to establish itself?" Fifty-four of these officers gave affirmative answers, and only five directly negative answers. That could not but be regarded as highly satisfactory. The noble Lord referred to the expense which would devolve on officers in consequence of changes of uniform. On that subject he (the Earl of Morley) could only say that arrangements would be made to render this expense as light as possible; and in cases where regiments which had now scarlet uniforms were converted into Rifles or kilted regiments, the Secretary of State for War would be prepared to give the officers some pecuniary assistance, the amount of which was now being considered. While speaking of the officers, he would point out that in double-battalion regiments they had this not inconsiderable advantage—they could, if they wished, exchange from the home to the foreign battalion, or vice versa, without losing their places in the regimental list; whereas, if an officer exchanged from one regiment to another, he was placed invariably at the bottom of his rank in his new regiment. He had listened attentively to the speech of the noble Lord, and had not heard an argument which proved that the single-battalion organization was better suited to the peculiar conditions of the British Army than the organization which now existed, and which it was proposed to consolidate. Not one of the defects which the noble Lord deplored would be met by the retrogressive policy which he proposed. It might be argued that an organization of regiments, consisting of three or four battalions, would be more elastic and capable of adapting itself to sudden emergencies than a double-battalion system; but to contract regiments to a single battalion, resting, when abroad, on its own depôt, would, he maintained, be a step in the wrong direction. Such a course would render it impossible to carry into effect the new system of supporting our Indian and Colonial Army, which he (the Earl of Morley) had explained on a previous occasion. The object of this new system was, as far as possible, to insure the Indian Government that the men sent out to them would serve in that country for a full term of seven years. The efficiency of the Indian Army would thus be promoted, and a very considerable economy would be effected—a matter of very great importance. It would be effected by retaining the battalions for a longer period in India, and supplying their deficiency by annual drafts, rather than by relieving a large number of battalions. He had already shown that by reducing the number of battalions annually sent abroad as reliefs from eight to four the constitution of the Army at home would also be improved. It would, in these circumstances, be much easier to keep the regiments first on the roster up to their full strength, ready for any sudden emergency, without suddenly pouring into their ranks a large number of young and half-trained recruits, a course which obviously diminished their efficiency. The system which he was now advocating would, he believed, at the same time, facilitate our foreign reliefs, and would tend to improve the constitution of the home and foreign Army. It would promote the union which it was most desirable to establish between the Regular and Auxiliary Forces; it would stimulate recruiting throughout the country, and would, by degrees, form an enlarged esprit de corps in the territorial regiments, without obliterating the associations which these regiments cherished. If these proposed changes were for the good of the Army at large, even though at first they might be at variance with the feelings of some individuals, he could, with confidence, rely on the public spirit and patriotism of officers and men to accept them, and to assist loyally in carrying them into effect.

VISCOUNT BURY urged his noble Friend behind him (the Earl of Gallo-way) to be content with the expression of opinion which he had elicited from the Government, and not to push his Motion to a division, especially as the House was almost empty, and as the changes referred to were actually being carried into effect under a General Order recently issued. There were, no doubt, several noble Lords who would have liked to address the House on this subject; but other occasions would certainly arise on which they would be able to do so. For his own part, he would only point out, in reference to the speech they had just heard, that while the noble Earl assumed that existing defects in the organization of the Army were about to be remedied, the adoption of the territorial system would not in the least help them to attain that end. The great difficulty was to obtain men. By the new system they would not get any greater number. Another difficulty was—seeing that there were to be 71 battalions at home and 70 abroad—that the dislocation of any single battalion would dislocate the whole. The new territorial system would dislocate them in exactly the same way. The scheme of the Secretary of State for War had many good points, which deserved a fair trial, and that trial would have been given it in the most complete manner if the linked regiments had been left together, and not changed into territorial regiments, which, he maintained, entirely subverted the regimental plan upon which the British Army had been successfully based in the past. He did not believe that the territorial system would succeed, and he thought it was a step which might hereafter have to be retraced; but the responsibility meantime must rest with the Government, and he would advise his noble Friend not to divide the House on the question.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK remarked, that the noble Viscount (Viscount Bury) had not correctly appreciated the remarks of his noble Friend (the Earl of Morley). The system of territorial regiments was not an invention of the present Government, but had been handed down to them from their Predecessors in Office; and he was surprised at the objections raised to it by the noble Viscount, because it was the recommendation of Colonel Stanley, the late Secretary of State for War, under whom the noble Viscount had served. As regarded the difficulty of meeting Colonial wars, their Lordships ought to bear in mind that it was not upon the territorial system alone, or indeed principally, that the Government relied. The development of that system was only one of a series of measures which had been introduced by the present Secretary of State for War; and it should be remembered in these discussions that we were now in a much better position as regarded Reserves than we had ever been previously. He agreed with the noble Viscount that it would be inconvenient to prolong the debate, and would only add that their Lordships might rely upon the Secretary of State for War endeavouring to meet the various difficulties of the situation to the best of his ability, and that he would do his best to preserve the esprit de corps of the regiments.

LORD AIREY did not complain of the course which the Government had pursued in adopting their own scheme in preference to that recommended by the Committee over which he presided; but he thought that there were just grounds for complaining that the Government had unduly delayed the publication of their Report. He believed that if it had been produced sooner, the system would have been different from what it was now. He had great doubts whether the present system was anything more than an experiment.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he had intended to speak upon this Motion; but, looking at the state of the House, he would reserve what he had to say to a future occasion. Too much stress had been laid upon the Committee over which Colonel Stanley presided having recommended the formation of territorial regiments. The double-battalion system had not at that time been tried and failed. The weak point of the system was that when the home battalion acted as a feeder to the one abroad, it became absolutely unfit to be employed on active service. It would require about 600, or even 700, Reserve men to bring it up to war strength; and it would consequently be some time before a battalion so composed could possibly be fit to take the field.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY protested against the doctrine that if a civilian met a soldier in the street he was not at liberty to inquire of him how he liked the Service, his regiment, and his uniform.

QUESTIONS

ARMY—COMPETITIVE EXAMINATIONS.

MR. RYLANDS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been directed to the following facts disclosed by the Return of March 24th relative to First Commissions in the Army—namely, that during the years 1879 and 1880, 1,630 young men qualified for First Commissions in the Army before the Civil Service Commissioners at the open Competitive Examinations; that only 448 of these successful Candidates at the open Competitive Examinations obtained First Commissions in the Army during 1879 and 1880; whilst 423 First Commissions in the Army were given to Militia Officers during the same period; whether he can state the number of young men who, having been unsuccessful in open Competitive Examinations, received First Commissions in the Army as Militia Officers, or otherwise, during the years 1879 and 1880; and, whether he is prepared to take any steps to prevent the continuance of the state of things which appears in the above-mentioned Return to have existed during the years 1879 and 1880?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, I have paid especial attention for some time past to the subject of the Return to which my hon. Friend refers. It is most important and instructive; but, whether from the language of the Return or not, he has been led into some misconception of the facts. The 1,630 young men who qualified for first commissions in the Army in 1879 and 1880 were not all successful candidates at the open competitions. All the successful candidates have obtained, or are in course of being given, commissions, and they are the 448 for the year 1879-80 to which my hon. Friend refers in his Question. All the Militia officers who obtained commissions are included among the 1,630 who qualified in 1879 and 1880, or among those who qualified in previous years, or have qualified by passing an equivalent examination before the Civil Service Commissioners as University candidates. What is unsatisfactory to my mind is the very large number of commissions granted to Militia officers. But for this in 1879-80 there were two reasons—the first, that in previous years the number assigned to the Militia (120), under the system of nomination by colonels, had not been made up; and the second, that the vacancies in the Army were made abnormally large in those two years by the Afghan and Cape Wars. On the other hand, Sandhurst can only turn out a limited number of qualified cadets every year, so that the balance had to be made good from the Militia, and the substitution of competition among the whole of the subalterns of the Militia justified a larger number of appointments from this source. For the future, under the Army Re-organization arrangements which I have explained to the House, a smaller number of commissions by 50 will be granted annually, and even this reduced number will not be appointed after 1882, until gradually the Establishment has been brought down. The proportion given to Sandhurst—that is to say, to virtually open competition—will be much larger than in 1879-80.

CENTRAL ASIA—CAPTAIN BUTLER'S MISSION.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether, in the year 1877, Captain Butler, of the 9th Regiment, was secretly ordered by Lord Lytton, then Viceroy of India, to proceed to the Perso-Turkoman Frontier, with a view of surveying the Turkoman land from the Caspian Sea to Merv; whether he was directed by Lord Lytton and by Mr. Thornton (the then Indian Foreign Secretary) to arrange to be in a position to raise the Turkoman Tribes in case of a War with Russia; whether he was specially directed to conceal the object of his mission from all the home authorities, from Her Majesty's Minister at Teheran, and from the English officials at Meshed; whether a Report of Captain Butler, as to his proceedings in the Turkoman land, was sent by him to the Indian Foreign Office on his return from his mission; and, if so, whether there is any objection to lay the same upon the Table of the House; and, also, whether, considering that Captain Butler's health greatly suffered, owing to the hardships incurred during his mission, and that in consequence of this he was granted sick leave for eighteen months, and that his medical advisers inform him that, although still suffering from the effects of his arduous mission, his health will in all probability be completely restored should he be granted leave for a further six months, such additional leave will be granted to him, instead of his being placed on half-pay, owing to his present and temporary inability to perform active service in India?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, according to Papers which I find on record at the India Office, it appears that in May, 1877, an offer from Captain Butler to proceed to Merv was accepted by the late Viceroy of India, not to "survey country from the Caspian Sea to Merv," but to "Gain information as to the state of affairs among the Merv Turkomans, and the geography and resources of the valley of the Murghab, without compromising Government," and some pecuniary assistance was given him for this object. These Papers do not contain any evidence that Captain Butler was directed to "arrange to be in a position to raise the Turkomans in case of a war with Russia;" but, on the contrary, directly refute any such idea. It appears that Captain Butler's mission was to be undertaken at his own risk and responsibility, and that he was to make his journey as an ordinary unofficial traveller. He was ordered not to go to Teheran, chiefly on account of representations from himself that if his presence in Persia, and the object of his mission were known, difficulties might be thrown in his way by the Persian authorities. Captain Butler submitted to the Indian authorities, through the Quartermaster General, a Report of his travels on the Northern Frontier of Persia. Official information received from other sources by the Government of India has thrown considerable doubt on the accuracy of Captain Butler's Report of his proceedings. The Report itself does not contain any information of a valuable character; and, if published, would have to be accompanied by a large mass of Correspondence which would serve no useful purpose; and I do not, therefore, think it necessary to lay it on the Table. As to the latter part of the hon. Member's Question, I can only say that the matter of additional leave to Captain Butler is one entirely for the consideration of the Field Marshal Commanding in Chief, in regard to which I see no ground for interfer-

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND)—LIMERICK ASYLUM—PAUPER LUNATICS.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is not true that the rates of the City of Limerick have lately become charged with the maintenance in the Limerick Lunatic Asylum of several persons, not natives or inhabitants of the city, who, being prisoners in the Limerick District Prison, were transferred thence on account of mental derangement to the Limerick Lunatic Asylum, and several soldiers enlisted in the city, who, having become mentally deranged in the service, were transferred from Netley to the Limerick Lunatic Asylum; and, whether he will take into consideration the desirability of compelling the place in which a pauper lunatic, admitted to a lunatic asylum, shall have been usually resident, to contribute to his maintenance and treatment in such asylum?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the Inspector of Lunatic Asylums reported to him that two soldiers who had been confined in the Limerick District Prison, and who had become insane, were transferred to the Asylum for the county, in which they now remain. Only one soldier had been sent from Netley to the Limerick Asylum, and he was a native of the county. It would be very difficult to carry out what was recommended by a general rule; but, in individual cases, the matter might be arranged by the Inspector of Asylums, as was done in this case.

STATE OF IRELAND—INFLAMMATORY PLACARDS—THE IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the following paragraph from the "Enniscorthy Guardian" of the 7th instant is correct:—

"On Wednesday an affair took place in Enniscorthy which perhaps was the most unwarrantable stretch of authority ever attempted. In two or three places placards, a copy of which is given below, were posted on the walls. No sooner had these caught the eye of the vigilant constabulary than they at once tore them down. This was repeated twice:

The Marquess of Hartington

"'Wexfordmen! assemble in your thousands at the Court-house, Wexford, on Friday next, the 6th instant, at two o'clock, to witness landlordism degraded, to the collection of unjust rent through the sheriff, and to see the resources of Buckshot Forster liberally supplied for what he himself denounced as the enforcement of injustice. Contingents will attend from the various branches of the Land League. The land for the people. God save Ireland;'"

whether the police admitted they tore down the placards by order of the head constable; and, whether the Government sanction such proceedings; and, if not, what notice has been taken of the matter?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Yes; I understand that the placard in question was pulled down by special order of the head constable; and I think that the head constable acted perfectly right.

MR. HEALY asked, under what statute the head constable had acted; and, whether anybody else tearing down placards would not have been liable to be prosecuted?

MR. O'DONNELL asked, whether the reason why the right hon. Gentleman approved of the head constable's conduct was because the words "Buckshot Forster" appeared on the placard?

MR. HEALY, after a short pause, asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman intended to reply?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, it appears to be thought that it is a matter of necessity and duty that Gentlemen sitting on this (the Treasury) Bench should give a reply to every Question put to them. There is no necessity for that. A Question must be answered according to the way in which it is asked, and at the discretion of those to whom it is put. This Question is manifestly for the purpose of insult. There is no more reason why a person in my position should be called on to answer it than any other person. I only state that I am perfectly ready to meet any charge that may be brought against me with regard to those placards.

MR. HEALY begged to move the adjournment of the House. ["Oh!"] As the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think he had put the Question to insult him, he only wished to disclaim any such intention. He must explain that his attention had been called by a resolution of the Land League branch to the matter, and he was asked to put the Question in that House, and he had done so. He had put down a Question with regard to it, and, to make the Question clear, he had quoted the placard quite irrespective of the fact that it contained the words "Buckshot Forster." The question was not whether the right hon. Gentleman was bound to answer the Question, but whether he approved the conduct of the constables in pulling down the placard, and by what law or authority it was done. Force seemed now to be the only rule in Ireland, and the right hon. Gentleman who put that rule in force went down to Bradford, and thanked the people of Bradford for their kind reception of him in the name of the people of Ireland. The most comical thing was that while, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University said, the Government had not the respect of a single man in Ireland, from Cape Clear to the Giant's Causeway, the Chief Secretary for Ireland went to his constituents and thanked them in the name of the Irish people. That placard incident was a sample of what was occurring every day in the country. Surprise was expressed at outrages being committed. His (Mr. Healy's) surprise was that many more were not committed. And he could tell the right hon. Gentleman that if he continued to support the police in arbitrary acts, he would find that ten times more outrages would occur, those outrages being the only resource which those unfortunate people had against high-handed proceedings.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE rose to Order. He asked Mr. Speaker, whether it was competent for a Representative from Ireland to threaten the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant that if he persisted in the course he was pursuing ten times more outrages would be committed in Ireland, and to say that that was the only resource against the rule of the right hon. Gentleman which would be left to the Irish people? He asked, also, whether the House was to listen to those threats, and incitements to the people of Ireland?

MR. SPEAKER: The course taken by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) is taken entirely on his own responsibility. I deplore the language which I have heard this evening, coming both from him and from the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell).

The hon. Member has also, on his own responsibility, moved the adjournment of the House, not being satisfied with the answer he received to a Question. As the House knows, I have very frequently pointed out the great inconvenience arising from Motions of this character — Motions of which, within the last few days, we have had three examples.

MR. HEALY said, he had not moved the adjournment of the House on account of dissatisfaction with an answer, but in order to protest against the statement that he had put a Question on the Paper for the purpose of insulting the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. Heaven knew that they had sufficient means of attacking the right hon. Gentleman without doing that! He was going on to say, when the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence) interrupted him, that if the people of Ireland had no means of protecting themselves against the unwarrantable aggression of the right hon. Gentleman and his armed forces in Ireland it would not be surprising if the outrages were multiplied. He would give an illustration, in something which had taken place on Saturday, of the high-handed conduct of the Executive in Ireland. Two evictions were made the other day, and 13 souls were left on the roadside, and one of the police who attended it was stated to have shed tears. That was very different from the behaviour of the police, whose conduct in the county of Wexford the right hon. Gentleman justified. There had not been a single agrarian outrage in Wexford for a considerable time past; and yet in spite of that the right hon. Gentleman allowed the police to insult the people by tearing down their placards, which were put up in the most legal manner. If illegal, had not the right hon. Gentleman plenty of power under the Protection of Person and Property Act? A hundred people had already been arrested under that Act on the most frivolous and absurd charges; and as anybody could be arrested on "reasonable suspicion" of posting the placards, the Government could not plead that they were without sufficient power.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he felt obliged formally to second the Motion, for the simple reason that when he asked that Question of the right hon. Gentleman, he did it deliberately, for the purpose of obtaining an expression of opinion whether it was the use of insulting epithets to him on the placard that caused him to have them taken down. The fact that the right hon. Gentleman was popularly known in Ireland by epithets not complimentary was by no means without precedent in Ireland. There was a former Chief Secretary who was known as "Orange Peel;" and if that Chief Secretary had approved of the tearing down of placards, because he was alluded to in that way, it would have been legitimate for the Irish Members of that day to call attention to the pettiness of motive which such conduct revealed. Looking at this placard he saw nothing objectionable in it, except the reference to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary; and although words personally disrespectful to the right hon. Gentleman had been used in the placard, that was not a reason why he should authorize the police to interfere with and obliterate the expression of opinion on the part of the people. If the appearance in public prints of opprobrious epithets towards Members of the House was to be a ground for the suppression of those Papers, they would soon have a very considerable diminution in the journalistic literature of Great Britain. He was still under the impression that if the right hon. Gentleman had been referred to in this placard more in conformity with his own account of himself to his constituents at Bradford, there would have been no interference by the right hon. Gentleman's police auxiliaries. The placard called on the people to make a silent protest against what they all thought most condemnable; and if they had not referred to the right hon. Gentleman in Parliamentary language, however privately he (Mr. O'Donnell) might object to the use of un-Parliamentary language, he had a perfect right, with all respect to the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman about himself, to inquire whether it was merely the personal insult to himself that led him to authorize the Irish constables to do that which English constables would not be permitted to do; and, if necessary, he could quote a great number of cases. The right hon. Gentleman might be a little more tolerant of even these heated expressions on the part of isolated individuals of the Irish nation, considering that he himself set the example of calling names. The right hon. Gentleman had denounced a whole class of most respectable men as village ruffians—[VOICES: Dissolute ruffians!] — that was the language he applied to respectable traders, Poor Law Guardians, and similar respectable members of society, and it was on this class that he vented his disappointment, under the Coercion Act, for his failure in Ireland.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Healy.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER (who rose amid cries of "No, no!" from the Ministerial Benches, and "Agreed!" from the Opposition Benches above the Gangway) said: I will detain the House for only a few minutes. As far as regards this House and myself, I feel it would not be necessary for me to say a word. But I will just state that when I alluded to insult, I was referring, not to the Question of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), but to the Question of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), and I am of opinion I was justified in using that word. I understood that these placards were pulled down, not on account of the use of the particular words referred to, but for a perfectly justifiable reason—that they were summoning persons to come together in thousands on a particular day to interfere with the legal act of a sheriff in connection with an auction. I think that that was abundant reason, and I think it was sufficient reason for prosecuting anyone who put them up, or instigated others to put them up, if they could have been discovered. The hon. Member for Dungarvan chooses to say that I applied the term village ruffians—[A VOICE: Dissolute ruffians!]—to a large class of respectable persons in Ireland. I think it will be in the recollection of the House that I applied it only to those persons who committed outrages, or instigated others to commit them.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he wished to enter his protest against it being supposed that the prefix "Orange," as applied to Peel, was an opprobrious epithet. It was a compliment rather than an insult.

MR. BARRY said, the question was a very narrow one. If the police had acted legally in pulling down the placards, he should like to know under what statute they acted; and, if they had acted illegally, why was their conduct approved? The Constabulary, no matter how they outraged public feeling in Ireland, were sure of a defender in the right hon. Gentleman. He thought, considering that the county of Wexford was entirely free from agrarian crime, that there was not even a threatening letter, it was an extraordinary thing to defend this outrageous conduct of the Constabulary. All he would say was that conduct like this could lead only to results such as the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Healy) had indicated.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he must express his regret that any language or epithet should have been used calculated to insult the Chief Secretary for Ireland, or any Minister of the Crown. Having said that, he would remind the House that buckshot for shooting down the Irish people had been introduced by the Predecessor of the right hon. Gentleman. As to the placards, was it not for the interest of the landlord that the people should attend the sale? He desired to know whether the police were to be allowed to tear down a placard calling upon people to attend a public auction; or whether it was intended by the Government that public auctions in Ireland should be conducted in the presence of the auctioneer and the man in charge of the cattle? [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh at the bare idea of an auction being conducted in a secret manner; but he (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) did not sympathize in their sentiments by any means. He knew that they would not care to have auctions in which they were pecuniarily interested conducted in such a manner. Perhaps the Chief Secretary for Ireland, or the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law), would tell them whether the police tore down the placards illegally; or whether there was a statute empowering them to do so. If they had the statute behind them, let the House hear where it was to be found. He believed, although he did not think the Chief Secretary for Ireland had acted under the impression, that the placard was torn down on account of the sentence reflecting upon himself. The reference to the right hon. Gentleman was most offensive and unjust; but, while he could sympathize with the natural feeling of irritation on the part of the Chief Secretary for Ireland at being identified with a certain class of ammunition, he told him to beware how he encouraged the Irish police in their lawlessness in tearing down placards.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Law) said, the question had been asked more than once, under what statute the police tore down the placard. It was torn down because it was an inflammatory placard, asking the people to assemble in their thousands, not to attend and bid at the auction, but to witness "landlordism discredited" in its attempt to enforce an unjust rent by execution of a writ from a Superior Court; and, in effect, for the purpose of obstructing the sheriff in the discharge of his lawful duty. As such, the police had a right to tear it down, not under any statute, but in accordance with what was much more important—namely, the Common Law of the land. [A VOICE: What statute?] The placard was illegal at Common Law; and, in his humble opinion, the police were perfectly justified in removing it. He hoped that after that explanation this irregular discussion might cease.

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY rose to call the attention of the House to the repeated Motions which were made for the adjournment of the House. He did not wish to see that privilege abolished; but he should like to see it regulated; and he rose to call the attention of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), who had a Motion on the Business of the House on the Paper for to-morrow. He should like to ask the hon. Member—

MR. PARNELL rose to Order. He said, as far as he could gather from the remarks of the hon. Baronet, he was discussing a Motion which now stood on the Paper. He desired to know, whether the hon. Baronet was in Order in discussing, upon the Motion for the adjournment of the House, a Motion which stood on the Paper?

MR. SPEAKER: So far as the hon. Baronet may have been discussing a Motion on the Paper for consideration to-morrow, he was not in Order.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he entirely agreed with the hon. Baronet. That power of moving the adjournment ought not to be abolished. If wisely preserved, it enabled Members to bring forward matters with which they could not otherwise deal. He was anxious to bring before the House a matter similar to that which had been raised by his hon. Friend. It was only on Saturday night last that three men, whom he knew to be perfectly incapable of crime, were arrested in Queen's County. ["Question!"]

MR. MACARTNEY rose to Order, and asked, whether the hon. Member could refer to matters totally foreign to the subject before the House?

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR, resuming, said, he wished to show why the House should adjourn. He held that there were some things even more important than the Land Bill. The rights of property were secondary to the rights of personal liberty and security. The right of personal security was entirely suspended in Ireland, and the powers which the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary for Ireland had vested in them were being used in the most wanton and unjustifiable manner. The three men referred to who had been arrested within the last 72 hours were perfectly incapable of crime. They were men with a character as good as that of anyone on the Ministerial Bench. They enjoyed the respect of all who knew them, and the only offence they had committed had been an offence against the landlords of the Queen's County. Those landlords monopolized the magistracy. They held every post of influence, and they had on their side a law which the Prime Minister and the Chief Secretary for Ireland admitted to be unjust. These three men in question were some time ago charged with having intimidated a certain individual in Maryborough. They were found guilty, and the magistrates sentenced them to two months' imprisonment in default of paying a fine. They appealed to the County Court Judge, and the decision was reversed, the man who was alleged to be intimidated swearing that he was not intimidated at all. The magistrates, however, had informations sworn against them, and the three men were arrested recently upon a charge of intimidation which was never committed at all. He thought the right hon. Gentleman ought to make some statement with regard to the reason why these men were arrested at 2 o'clock in the morning and lodged in gaol, without having been proved to be guilty of any offence whatever.

MR. PARNELL said, that the Government might have avoided the unpleasantness which had taken place during the discussion, if they had adopted in the beginning the course which they had since followed as to the supplementary Question of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) with respect to the statute under which the Government had acted in tearing down the placards. The Chief Secretary for Ireland, instead of doing so, however, had immediately risen and, with a great show of indignation, said that he did not consider it his duty to answer insulting Questions. There was nothing insulting in the Question. The right hon. Gentleman had given no reply, and did not draw any distinction whatever between the two Questions when he refused to answer either. If the right hon. Gentleman had followed the course which he (Mr. Parnell) had pointed out, or if the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law), acting for him, had given the information required of the Government, and informed the House that the action had taken place under the Common Law of Ireland and not under Statute Law, all reasonable grounds for his hon. Friend's moving the adjournment of the House would have been taken away, and the discussion might have been avoided. He also wished to say that in such circumstances Irish Members had no other course left them than that which they had adopted. It was very difficult for them to obtain any time for bringing those things to the attention of the House, or to obtain any information which they required. He himself had been endeavouring to obtain some information with regard to the offences alleged to have been committed by the persons arrested under the Coercion Act in Ireland, and thrown into prison by the right hon. Gentleman. He had, however, been unable to obtain any opportunity to move a Resolution on the subject, owing to the way in which the Business was blocked. He hoped the House would be good enough to recollect that they had placed Ireland in an exceptional position, and had given the Government exceptional powers over both the liberties and the property of the people of Ireland. They must, therefore, expect that Irish Members, when they found that those powers were used, would take a course which was undoubtedly exceptional, and undoubtedly inconvenient.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—TREATMENT OF PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT IN LIMERICK GAOL.

MR. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the complaints of the political prisoners detained in Limerick Gaol, contained in the "Cork Examiner" of the 10th instant, as follows:—

"Mr. Hodnett said the governor was most hostile towards him, and on this morning (May 9), without any reason being assigned, he was detained in his cell until ten o'clock, whereas he should have been permitted to quit the apartment at eight o'clock for breakfast. Mr. Hodnett said his apartment was the ordinary convict cell, twelve feet by six, with defective ventilation. The window was inclined slightly inwards, with an aperture of six inches to admit fresh air. He hoped that, if the prison authorities insisted on keeping the prisoners in those cells, a freer passage would be provided. Eighteen hours' detention in such cells rendered the want of pure air the more disagreeable. More suitable apartments were available for the accommodation of the political prisoners, and, as a promise had been made by the Government to provide them with the best rooms in the prison, detention, not punishment, being the object, they hoped the promise would be fulfilled. All the prisoners complained specially of the number of hours for recreation and the distribution of those hours. The total number of hours was six, four of these being in the exercise yard, and two in friendly intercourse. There was no exercise before breakfast, it was confined to the middle portion of the day. Mr. Hodnett having been in the habit of rising at six considered it a cruelty, and the other prisoners shared the same opinion at being deprived of the poor privilege of sauntering in the yard before breakfast. The doors had hitherto been locked after five o'clock in the evening;"

and, whether the Government will take any action in the matter?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that he had received a Report from the Inspector General of the Prisons Board, stating that he had seen the prisoners confined in Limerick Gaol, and in reply to his inquiry whether they had any complaint to make, they answered in the negative, excepting the prisoner Hodnett, who made a complaint with regard to the hours of exercise. The special rules required that prisoners should be allowed four hours' daily exercise—two before dinner and two after dinner—subject to the limitation that the Governor, who was responsible for the management and discipline of the prison, should fix the hours. He did not, therefore, think it reasonable that the prisoner Hodnett should be allowed to commence exercise at 6 o'clock in the morning. With regard to the ventilation, the medical officer pronounced the cells amply sufficient for all purposes, both as regarded space and ventilation.

HIGH COURT OF CHANCERY (IRELAND)
—CASE OF "KAVANAGH MINORS."

MR. REDMOND asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If his attention has been called to the case of "Kavanagh Minors" in the High Court of Chancery in Ireland; whether it is a fact that the children in question, aged respectively 7, 5, and 4 years, were forcibly taken from their mother by the relatives of her deceased husband, and that on the 21st of December 1878 the Lord Chancellor appointed a guardian of the fortunes of the children, and ordered him to institute an action for the administration of the estate of their father, and further ordered that the matter of the custody of the children should be proceeded with concurrently in the Court of the Vice Chancellor; whether it is a fact that such matter respecting the custody of the children has never been proceeded with, and that, in consequence, the mother has been deprived of the custody of her children, not from any fault of her's, but because she is unable to incur the expense of repeated applications to the Court to compel the order of the Lord Chancellor to be complied with; and, whether he can take any steps to ensure that the mother shall be no longer deprived of the custody of her children to which she is by law entitled?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW): The hon. Member must be aware that I have no special means of ascertaining whether the facts of the case referred to are as stated in the Question; and, even assuming the facts to be as they are stated, I must remind him that I have no means or power whatever of interfering in the matter.

ACT, 1881—TYRONE.

MR. MACARTNEY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What are the reasons which have induced Her Majesty's Government to place the baronies of Upper and Middle Dungannon, in the county of Tyrone, under the provisions of the Peace Preservation Act?

MR. LITTON also asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he can state the grounds upon which the baronies of Lower and Middle Dungannon, in the county of Tyrone, have been proclaimed, those baronies forming one of the most peaceable districts in Ireland, and being eminently free from agrarian crime; and, whether he will be good enough to reconsider the propriety of the step so taken?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, the Peace Preservation Act was put in force as far as the carrying of arms is concerned, and only as regards the carrying of arms, in the baronies of Upper and Middle Dungannon, and not in the barony of Lower Dungannon. These baronies were proclaimed, not on account of agrarian crime; but I must remind the hon. Member that to prevent agrarian crime was not the sole object of the Peace Preservation Act, and that, in many cases, many lamentable occurrences have resulted from the carrying of arms in the North of Ireland. All the principal localities in the County Tyrone where Party disturbances have taken place are in the baronies referred to.

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—THE ASHANTEE WAR.

MR. SUMMERS asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he is in a position to lay upon the Table of the House Copies of Papers relating to the Ashantee "scare" at the Gold Coast, and to include in those Papers a Copy of the Instructions under which Sir Samuel Rowe is acting?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, I will read the latest news from the Gold Coast with respect to what the hon. Member describes as "the Ashantee scare." It was received yesterday. Sir Samuel Rowe telegraphs—

"Ashantee Prince delivered his message 29th April. King begs for peace; kneels before Her Majesty. Offers 2,000 ounces of gold, not as payment of expenses, but as sign of sincerity—small part only here, more believed to be on the way. Replied that I should answer after due consideration. Progress most satisfactory."

This looks as if we might soon be able to say that matters had returned to their normal state. When we are able to do so with perfect confidence, I shall lay Papers on the Table, including the Governor's Instructions.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE BASUTO WAR—
FRENCH MISSIONARIES.

MR. SUMMERS asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Mr. Sprigg's Ministry refused permission to a French missionary (the Rev. H. Dieterlen) to pass through the lines of the Colonial forces with medicines and ambulance materials for the use of the Basuto wounded, such permission being refused on the ground that "the Government did not feel justified in affording facilities for the prosecution of rebellion;" and, whether any communications have taken place upon the subject between Her Majesty's Government and the late Government at the Cape?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, we have had no correspondence with the Government of the Cape regarding this matter, and, indeed, have heard nothing about it. We had some correspondence with a French Missionary Society, which is printed at page 108 of the South African Papers, 2,821.

ARMY—PROMOTION FROM THE RANKS.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, What number of first Commissions, exclusive of those of Riding Master and Quartermaster, are annually granted to soldiers who have served in the ranks, and what number to gentlemen who have not passed through the ranks; and, if he intends to take measures to increase the proportion granted to the former class?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, the rule between 1871 and 1880 was that five commissions might be annually granted to non-commissioned officers, excluding those promoted as quartermasters, riding masters, and officers of the Coast Brigade of Artillery; but, as a matter of fact, rather more than six have been granted in consequence of special cases having been sanctioned by the Secretary of State. I raised last year the fixed number for the line from five to ten a-year. The total number of other commissions granted of late has averaged 393 yearly; but under the new plan of organization it will be normally about 50 less. I do not propose, without further experience, to make a second addition to the number of promotions from the ranks.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—COMPULSORY RETIREMENT OF COLONELS.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, If, under the new Warrant to be issued on the 1st July, Colonels of fifty-eight years of age will be allowed to complete their service in those situations to which they have been appointed for five years, or if they will be compulsorily retired on pensions before the completion of the five years term from the command of Depot Centres and other equivalent positions; if the latter is the case, will he inform the House what is the additional expense which will be entailed on the Exchequer by such compulsory retirements, and if any compensating saving will be effected; and, what will be the gross loss incurred by the officers who would be thus compulsorily retired before the completion of their five years' term?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. and gallant Gentleman, I have to say that if he will wait a few days he will find that I have determined somewhat to relax the rigid rule proposed on this subject in the Memorandum. It would be impossible, without very elaborate calculations, to assign to this part of the proposed changes the exact cost, the total of which is provided in the Estimates for the whole scheme now before the House.

MADAGASCAR—THE NEW TREATY—IMPORTATION OF RUM FROM THE MAURITIUS.

MR. CROPPER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is the fact that the Government of Madagascar are prepared to conclude a new Treaty with England as soon as possible; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will consider the expediency of enabling the Government of Madagascar to control the unrestricted importation of Mauritius rum into the Island?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the revision of the Treaty of 1865 between Great Britain and Madagascar is under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, and communications on the subject are taking place with the Hova Government, who propose to increase the duty of 10 per cent now levied on Colonial rum.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY—FEES ON MONUMENTS.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is true, as stated in the public journals, that the fees paid to the Dean and Chapter of Westminster Abbey for permission to erect a Monument therein to the late Earl of Beaconsfield will amount to about £400; and, if so, whether these fees will be the private emolument of the Dean and of the members of the Chapter, or for what purpose?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, I am obliged to my hon. Friend for asking me this Question, and thus enabling me to remove an entirely erroneous misconception upon the subject. In answer to an inquiry which I have made into the statement quoted by my hon. Friend, I have been informed that there are no fees whatever paid to the Dean and Chapter for monuments erected at the public expense. Any fees for private monuments are expended entirely on the support of the fabric, and no portion whatever goes to the private emolument of the Dean or of any member of the Chapter.

MR. MACDONALD gave Notice that on Thursday he would put another Question to the noble Lord upon the same subject.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—COUNTY COURT JURISDICTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If he is aware that the county court judge of Antrim exercises criminal and civil jurisdiction within the borough of Belfast, which borough has a separate jurisdiction, with a recorder, court, and officers, and is such jurisdiction by the county court judge according to the statute; and, if so, is it desirable to continue a dual jurisdiction in Belfast?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW): Sir, the County Court Judge and Chairman of Quarter Sessions of the county of Antrim is also Recorder of the borough of Belfast, which includes part of that county as well as part of the County Down, and as such he exercises criminal and civil jurisdiction within the borough. This is quite in accordance with the law, and is, in fact, required by the County Officers and Courts Act of 1877.

MR. BIGGAR asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If it is the fact that the county court judge and justices of Antrim hold the annual licensing quarter sessions for the district of Belfast about the middle of November, over one month after the licences expire; and that last year it was necessary for applicants for transfers and confirmations of licences to apply to His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland for authority to carry on trading in the interregnum; and, whether it is possible to provide for the holding of annual licensing courts at such times as will obviate difficulties of a similar character?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW): Sir, the annual licensing quarter sessions for the Belfast division of the County of Antrim were last year held on the 1st of November, and are this year fixed for the 31st of October. I am not aware of its having been found necessary last year to make any such applications to the Lord Lieutenant as are mentioned in the Question. Though licences expire before the middle of October, and, therefore, before the licensing quarter sessions are held in most parts of Ireland, ample opportunity is afforded for obtaining renewals and provisional transfers before that day, by application to the justices at petty sessions, or at ordinary quarter sessions, such transfers holding good until whatever time the licensing quarter sessions are held. There is thus no inconvenience or difficulty caused, nor is any change of the system required.

FOREIGN JEWS IN RUSSIA—EXPULSION OF A NATURALIZED BRITISH SUBJECT.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any steps will be taken by Her Majesty's Government with regard to the case of Mr. L. Lewisohn, a highly respectable London merchant, who, though provided with a British passport, duly viséd by the Russian Consul General in London, was expelled from St. Petersburg, to which place he had proceeded on business in September last, on the ground that he was a Jew; whether it is not true that no cause of complaint, political or otherwise, was alleged against him; and, whether, with reference to Lord Tenterden's letter to Mr. Lewisohn of the 2nd ultimo, informing him that the Russian authorities decline to permit him to revisit Russia, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to withdraw their protection from British subjects abroad who may belong to the Jewish faith?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, Mr. Lewisohn, a naturalized British subject and the bearer of a Foreign Office passport, wrote on the 26th of November, to complain that on account of his being a Jew he had been required to leave St. Petersburg at 24 hours' notice. Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires, who was instructed to furnish a Report on the subject, stated that the notice was in accordance with Russian law, and that other foreign Representatives had at various times remonstrated unsuccessfully against similar treatment of subjects of their Governments. Notwithstanding the personal application of Lord Dufferin, the Russian authorities have declined to modify their decision in Mr. Lewisohn's case. There is no ground for the inquiry made in the last paragraph of the hon. Member's Question, which I have read with much regret.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked, whether no British subject of the Jewish faith could remain in Russia?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I believe, Sir, that no foreign Jews are allowed to remain in St. Petersburg.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, that he would take an early opportunity of bringing the matter before the House and moving a Resolution. He would also ask, Whether Her Majesty's Government have made any representations to the Government at St. Petersburg with regard to the atrocious outrages committed upon the Jewish population in Southern Russia; and, whether they contemplate taking similar steps in the matter to those which were adopted by the late Government in the case of the Jewish massacres in Roumania, and the atrocities of the Bashi-Bazouks in Bulgaria?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have not addressed representations to the Russian Government with regard to the outrages on Jews and students in Southern Russia; but that Government has already of themselves taken steps to quell these disorders. I may add that the cases of the Roumanian massacres and the atrocities in Bulgaria are not parallel with the disturbances in Russia; as in one case the remonstrances of Her Majesty's Government were directed against the laws in force respecting the Jews, and in the other against the conduct of troops employed by the Porte itself.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS wished to know, whether it was not the duty of Her Majesty's Government as a civilized Government to remonstrate against the atrocities to which he had drawn attention? Remonstrances had been addressed to the Roumanian Government in similar circumstances.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE explained that in the case of Roumania the protest was made in conjunction with other Powers. The Government had received no invitation from foreign Governments to interfere in the present question.

ARMY—AUXILIARY FORCES—VOLUNTEER SURGEONS.

MR. DONALDSON-HUDSON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Her Majesty's Government will accord to Volunteer Battalion Surgeons, after twelve years' service, the rank and title of Surgeon Major, as in the case of Militia Battalion Surgeons; and, whether they will give to them, under the Memorandum showing the principal changes in Army Organization, &c., intended to take effect from 1st July 1881, the same privileges upon retirement, after fifteen years' service, as to other officers of the Auxiliary Forces?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that Volunteer surgeons will be on the same footing as Militia surgeons not on the Departmental list—that is to say, they will, after 20 years' service, receive a step of honorary rank, or on retirement, if duly recommended for it. Volunteer surgeons will, after 15 years' service, be entitled to retain their rank.

WAR OFFICE—STUDY OF FRENCH.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the case that some correspondence has taken place between the War Office and the Head Masters of Public Schools on the subject of greater prominence being given to the study of French, and especially to a colloquial facility in that language; and, if so, whether there will be any objection to lay the Papers upon the Table?

MR. CHILDERS: Yes, Sir. We made proposals a short time ago to the public schools on this subject, in consequence of the unfortunate deficiency in knowledge of French and German on the part of candidates for commissions. I will lay on the Table, if my hon. Friend will move for it, a copy of our letter to the Chairman of the Conference.

STATE OF IRELAND—COUNTY OF ROSCOMMON.

MR. O'KELLY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, On what grounds an iron police hut has been erected at Kilgefin, county Roscommon; whether there are not three police barracks within a short distance of the iron hut; and, whether there is any one living near the hut requiring special protection?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, a hut has been erected at the place referred to in the Question. There are, it is true, two police barracks at a distance of three and a-half, and one seven miles from this hut; but there are persons living near requiring special protection, which is one of the reasons that have led to the determination to erect the hut.

STATE OF IRELAND—ALLEGED RIOT AT BALTINGLASS.

MR. M'COAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state to the House the Report received from the Irish Police authorities respecting an alleged riot at Baltinglass on Thursday last, in which, according to the Dublin correspondence of the "Times" of Saturday, many Protestant houses were wrecked, and other serious outrages committed?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he found what was but the drunken freak of a single individual had been greatly exaggerated in the correspondence in a newspaper. He might add that on the 3rd instant, the day before the occurrence, the constable who had charge of the police reported that the town was in a peaceable and orderly condition.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE BASUTOS (THE NEGOTIATIONS).

MR. W. FOWLER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, What further information, if any, has been received by the Government as to the present state of the negotiations now pending between the Cape Government and the Basutos?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, the news from Basutoland is conflicting; but here is the latest telegram, received on Saturday evening from Sir Hercules Robinson—

“ 14th.—General Clarke telegraphs on 12th:—‘Have fairly reliable information that Basutos were to have held large meeting yesterday (11th) at Letsea’s, to consider terms of Governor’s award. Lerothodi and another inclined to accept, many others very doubtful.’ ”

PUBLIC HEALTH—CEMENT MANUFACTURES.

MR. WARTON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he can state the number of workpeople employed by cement manufacturers in England; and, whether any complaints have been received by the Local Government Board from inhabitants of parishes where cement works are carried on?

MR. DODSON: Sir, I have no information as to the number of workpeople employed in cement works in England; but as far as I have been able to ascertain, there are altogether between 100 and 150 of such works. The Local Government Board have not, so far as I am aware, received any formal complaints from sanitary authorities where these works are carried on; but complaints were made by residents before the Royal Commission, and the Board themselves have received complaints of the injurious effects of these works from persons affected by them, and notably from the pilots and others interested in the traffic of the River Thames.

FRANCE AND TUNIS (THE TREATY).

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty’s Government can recognize any Treaty made with France by the Bey of Tunis, under the pressure of the superior force which has been brought against him, and in contravention of the Firman of 1871, which forbids the Bey, as the Governor of “an integral part of the Ottoman Empire,” to make Treaties with any foreign Powers, which Firman Her Majesty’s Government have stated they have fully recognized?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I have already promised that the Papers shall be immediately laid before Parliament; and meanwhile, it will, perhaps, be the more convenient course to defer the discussion of particular points until the whole case is seen.

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST said, that after the unsatisfactory answer just given, and considering the importance of the matter, he felt obliged, though with deep regret, to move the adjournment of the House. He felt that that was the only moment at which the question could be raised by a private Member. The subject required the grave and immediate attention of the House. In contravention of assurances which the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs said he had received from the French Government, that there was no intention to annex any territory in Tunis, the French Forces, 30,000 or 40,000 strong, had marched into a friendly country, and the French Fleet had been sent to take possession of the important position of Bizerta. This country had received a Circular from M. St. Hilaire, and if he (Mr. Guest) were to read a few extracts from it, the House would be astonished at the way in which Her Majesty’s Government had been hoodwinked. In that Circular M. St. Hilaire said—

“ We are ready, as soon as good relations are resumed, to engage in a host of other not less beneficial enterprizes—lighthouses on the coast, inland roads to connect many populous and prosperous towns with each other, vast irrigations in a country where there is no lack of rivers, but where they are not better turned to account than the forests; the working of abundant mines of every kind of metal; an improved cultivation of lands acquired by Europeans in the regency, or even of the lands of the natives; the employment of the hot springs, which the Romans discovered and used. Tunis is, in general, very fertile, as the prodigious wealth of ancient Carthage sufficiently shows. Under the protection of France all the natural gifts of that country can be developed afresh, with all the energy and intensity of modern methods and practices. We may add that, if the Bey will trust us, the internal administration may receive not less necessary and certain improvements.

It is not France alone that would profit by all this progress, which the Regency may acquire if it wishes. All civilized nations would benefit by it, and there is nothing to prevent us from doing to Tunis, without conquest or fighting, what we are doing in Algeria, and what England is doing in India."

Now, he would ask the House whether the French Government, after what he had just read, were justified in saying that they did not mean to annex any territory? He should, moreover, like to know whether, considering its position, this country had no interest in the question whether Tunis was or was not to be an independent State? ["No, no!"] To those hon. Members behind him who cried "No!" he would only reply that there were in the Regency of Tunis 10,000 British subjects, while the Italians numbered 15,000, and the French only 1,000, and that Tunis was situated at the entrance of the channel leading to Malta, cutting off the whole Eastern Mediterranean, and commanding the passage by which all traffic must pass to Syria, Egypt, the Black Sea, Turkey, and the Adriatic. To those who wished to enter the Black Sea, the Adriatic, or were going to the East, was it, he should like to know, a matter of no importance that a great nation like France should place herself so as to command such a channel? What would be the consequence of her having done so in time of war? At the first threatening of war with France insurances would at once go up, and the whole carrying trade would be transferred from British ships to those of other neutral nations. Then traffic would be handed over from our vessels to those of other nations. Then he would ask the House to consider for a moment the position of Bizerta itself. His hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had informed him the other evening, in answer to a Question which he had put to him, that he was aware of its importance, though he certainly would have imagined that he was not, for he said that without the expenditure of a large sum of money it was almost impossible that it could be used as a harbour. He (Mr. Guest) would, however, refer hon. Members to a letter which appeared in The Times newspaper that morning from Admiral Spratt, in which he stated on his professional authority that for a sum of less than £250,000 all obstruction could be removed from the channel, and that Bizerta could be made at once a most important harbour. Moreover, in taking the position of Bizerta into account, it should not, he might add, be forgotten that it was the only commanding port in North Africa. When the present state of affairs was duly considered, it was only right that the House should bear in mind that in 1871 a Firman had been granted by the Sultan to the Bey of Tunis. The substance of that Firman was—

"1. That the Regency of Tunis shall form, as heretofore, an integral part of the Ottoman dominions. 2. That the Beys on their accession shall apply for and receive their investiture from the Sultan, their suzerain. 3. That the Hutba (Friday's prayer) shall be, as heretofore, said in the name of the Sultan [this shows the Sultan's spiritual supremacy]. 4. That the money shall be coined in his name [this shows the Sultan's administrative supremacy]. 5. That, in lieu of tribute, Tunis shall furnish a contingent of troops in case of war. 6. That, although the Bey might make Commercial Treaties with foreign Powers, he was entirely debarred from entering into political Treaties with them, or from yielding or ceding to them any part of Tunisian territory."

Now, having had it on good authority, he was, he believed, correct in saying that the Government of England had expressed their satisfaction to the Bey at that Firman having been granted, and that the Governments of Austria, Russia, and Germany had congratulated the Bey on the occasion. It was only the other day that he had put a Question to the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the subject, and he had been informed in reply that the French did not recognize the Firman. He would, however, refer hon. Members to the Circular which had been addressed by the Sultan to the Ministers of Foreign Powers, in which it was shown most distinctly that so late as 1863 this suzerainty over Tunis was acknowledged by the French. When had they, he would ask, ceased to recognize it? There was not the slightest doubt that the authority of the Sultan over Tunis had existed for a great many years, and that it had been acknowledged by Her Majesty's Government. Again, France had declared that Tunis was independent, and was perfectly able to make this Treaty with them; but if Tunis was independent in 1881, she was equally independent in 1871, and able to make the arrangement she had made with the Porte by the Firman of that year. What was the position of the Bey at the present moment? France had annexed the country, and he should like to know, in the event of any question arising between this country and Tunis not of a commercial nature, whether the Government would pay attention to the Firman of 1871, the authority of which they said they recognized, or to the Treaty which had just been concluded with France? For his own part, notwithstanding the high-handed proceedings of the French in overrunning a friendly country, he hoped the Government would stick to the Firman of 1871. He was aware that it was said that Lord Salisbury had made an arrangement with France in 1878. He would ask, however, what power Lord Salisbury had, after the Berlin Treaty, to make such an arrangement? Lord Salisbury had, he believed, denied that he had made any such arrangement as that attributed to him. ["Oh, oh!"] He was willing to abstain from going into the question whether Lord Salisbury had or had not made such an arrangement, because it was probable that the House would hear some authoritative statement on the point before the discussion closed. For his own part, he thought it was impossible that an English Minister could have agreed to hand over to the Government of France any portion of the Ottoman Empire. In any case, however, it had been thrown in the teeth of the Liberal Party that, in everything they had done since they had come into power, they had attempted to reverse the policy of their Predecessors in Office; and even assuming that Lord Salisbury had made the arrangement attributed to him, was it to be contended that on this question alone the present Government were bound to abide by and carry into effect the policy of their Predecessors? In his opinion, Her Majesty's Government were bound to protest against this high-handed—he was almost going to say this outrageous—attack which had been made by France upon Tunis. They had marched into a friendly country a force of some 30,000 or 40,000 men, and had taken possession of one of the most important ports on the Mediterranean, and had forced the unfortunate Bey of Tunis to sign a Treaty at the point of the bayonet. He recommended the Government to join Italy in making a most determined protest against the course that had been taken. He apologized to the House for having occupied so much of their time on this occasion; but he felt that the subject was one on which that House and this country should speak out, in order that the public of Europe might know what their feelings were in reference to it, and that France—with whom we were on the most friendly terms—should be made aware without delay that her proceedings in this matter did not commend themselves to us. The fact was that, led on by Germany and Prince Bismarck, France had fallen into a trap, although she was, for the moment, as proud as if she were marching on Berlin. He begged, in conclusion, to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Montague Guest.)

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it is not for me to animadvert upon the use which my hon. Friend the Member for Wareham (Mr. Montague Guest) has made of his power to move the adjournment of the House, nor on the rather full and animated and pointed statement which he has delivered upon that Motion, entering into the whole question of Tunis. But it is for me, in the responsible position that I hold, in the first place, entirely to associate myself with the answer which was previously given to the Question by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir Charles W. Dilke); and, in the second place, to represent to the House in the most earnest and strongest manner that justice, policy, and I would almost say decency, require that this discussion should not now be continued. On one point only can I refer to the statement of my hon. Friend the Member for Wareham, because it is an historical point which while confirming does not touch any of the matters which he probably may desire, and may very legitimately desire, to bring under the notice of the House. It is the statement which he has made that up to the year 1863 France recognized the connection between Tunis and the Ottoman Empire.

Mr. Montague Guest

Now, that point has been a subject for very many years of correspondence, if not of controversy, between the Foreign Office of this country and the French Government from time to time. I would observe, with regard to these recognitions, that they are made a good deal to depend upon convenience by this Power and that; and if my hon. Friend is prepared to go all lengths in the assertion of the measures which this country ought to take in consequence of our recognizing the suzerainty of Turkey over Tunis, whilst France does not recognize it, he will feel that we are open to the question whether we ourselves have acted upon that principle, and admitted the suzerainty of Turkey in cases where she has claimed it. I believe I am quite accurate in saying that Turkey claimed the suzerainty over Algiers, before the French came into the possession of it; but we, considering ourselves to have a cause of quarrel with Algiers, bombarded the town without asking leave of the Porte. It will, I believe, be necessary to consider the principle upon which we have ourselves acted in laying down the law for other people's grievances. In the view of our Foreign Office, this matter has long been a matter of correspondence and controversy, and the British Government has always contended that Turkey exercised a power of suzerainty over Tunis, while the French Government has as steadily denied it. Moreover, the French Government was supported in that denial by the Government of Italy down to a very recent period. Do not let the House suppose for a moment that I mention this as a point determining, or even having any bearing upon, the merits of this question; but I merely wish that the matter of fact should not be omitted or misinterpreted. I pass, Sir, to the earnest representation I have made, and for which I will now state the grounds. My hon. Friend the Member for Wareham has, undoubtedly, in the strongest terms, arraigned the policy and conduct of the Government of France. Well, let us consider what are the titles of a friendly nation upon our courtesy and consideration. France is a country with which for more than a generation of men we have been in close and unbroken alliance; and I must say I think it is not stating too high the obligations that we ought to observe towards such a country, and, indeed, I will say towards any country, that when we have very strong charges to bring against her policy and conduct, we should take care that the House is placed in possession of authentic information before we do anything in the way of bringing such charges. My hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State has stated that this information is being pressed forward with all speed, and that in the course, I hope, of two or three days, it will be in the possession of the House. I put it to the House, as the first of the two propositions I wish to make, that if there is a disposition, and evidently there is, in the mind of some—I now give no opinion upon the matter—to arraign the conduct of the French Government, it is but right and just—and I will add but decent—that we should have that authentic information which is on its way to us in our hands before we proceed to consider the form and extent of the arraignment as to their conduct. With regard to the other question, which is a most legitimate one for my hon. Friend the Member for Wareham to raise, the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, I have no doubt that conduct will be closely and carefully scrutinized, as it ought to be. My hon. Friend says that we have been hoodwinked and deluded, and betrayed into a false position. Well, those are assertions which I only name for the purpose of showing that if I do not now contest them, I may not be held to overlook them, or subscribe to them, or any other. But the claim I would make on this portion of the question—namely, the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, is really one that I would venture to place quite as high as the claim I have just made in respect of our obligations towards a friendly and neighbouring country. My claim is that you cannot judge the conduct of Her Majesty's Government until you have the Papers before you. Nay, more, you ought not to attempt so to judge it, even if it were true that this was a question on which their conduct had exclusively turned upon proceedings of their own. But it is right I should say that when the Papers are produced, the most important portions of the Correspondence that we shall lay before the House, so far as they involve the proceedings of this country, are portions which belong, not to the time of the present, but to the time of the previous Administration. My hon.

Friend the Member for Wareham has referred to something which he supposes to have been stated or done by Lord Salisbury. I am quite sure that my hon. Friend will feel with me that there could not be a more gross deviation from Parliamentary etiquette, and there could not be a more gross deviation from the rules of substantial justice, than I should be chargeable with if I were in general terms, and without the production of the documents, to enter upon a discussion of the conduct of Lord Salisbury. I state Lord Salisbury personally, because my hon. Friend mentioned Lord Salisbury; but I have not the smallest reason to believe—on the contrary, my belief is exactly the opposite one—that Lord Salisbury, with regard to these proceedings on this important question, was in any manner separated from the general action of the Government of which he was a Member. Under these circumstances, my hon. Friend and others will see that though the time may be very close at hand when this subject should be discussed, yet that it would not be right that we should attempt to discuss it in the absence of the Papers now in preparation. It would lead to no benefit whatever; it would conduct us to no solid conclusion; and I do not hesitate to say that it might be productive of very serious inconvenience and difficulty.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he felt very strongly the appeal by the Prime Minister to the House to wait for further information. At one time Her Majesty's Government professed to have knowledge on the subject. He admitted that the House ought not in a hurry to enter into a discussion; but, assuming that there was ground for the appeal, he thought the House ought to know what was the policy of Her Majesty's Government. Surely there could be no objection on the part of a patriotic Administration to inform the House what was their policy. They knew that some time ago Her Majesty's Government believed that the Regency of Tunis was an integral portion of the Ottoman Empire. Did Her Majesty's Government believe that, or had they given up their contention in the face of the arms of France? In fact, were they in the presence of another surrender? They knew it was a cardinal principle of Her Majesty's Government to defend popular rights and the rights of nationalities. Had they maintained popular rights at present? Surely the House ought to know whether Her Majesty's Government had assented to an annexation of Tunis. [Great interruption here ensued, upon which the hon. Member resumed his seat, saying he must decline to continue his speech.]

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I rise to Order, Sir; I beg to direct your attention to the fact that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) is interrupting the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) by incoherent cries.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I rise, Sir, to give a most distinct denial to that statement.

MR. O'DONNELL resumed by assuring hon. Members opposite that it was only from a conviction of the importance of the subject that he had ventured to address any observations to the House. Hon. Members had asked for information again and again. Had Her Majesty's Government made up their minds, or did they intend to spring a surprise on the House this day week? Could they have been in communication with the French Government all these weeks and months, and not have arrived at any policy on the subject? Had they consented to a hauling down of the British flag? Speaking as an Irishman, he thought he had a right to plead for a recognition of national rights.

MR. J. COWEN said, he quite agreed with the Prime Minister that any discussion of the Tunisian question at the present time would be inconvenient and unjust. They ought not to condemn the French Government until they had had an opportunity of being heard. But it was only fair to say that if his hon. Friend (Mr. Guest) had been precipitate in bringing the matter before the House, the French Government had been equally, if not a good deal more, precipitate in the course they had pursued. He feared there was little chance of their explaining away the action that had been taken. The English and Italian Governments had every reason to believe that the French simply meditated punishing the Kroumirs for their raids on Algerian territory. It was but too evident now that the Kroumir incursions had merely been made a pretext for an annexation that had long been contemplated. At least, that was the only view it was possible to take upon the case as it stood. He would be glad if subsequent intelligence justified him in altering his opinion. He had no desire to further prolong the discussion; but he wished to ask this question. The Tunisian Government owed a debt of some £5,000,000. A few years ago it was upwards of £6,000,000. The Bey was unable to pay the interest, and an International Financial Commission was established for collecting the taxes and taking charge of the Debt. This Commission consisted of one Englishman, one Frenchman, one Italian, and two Tunisians. It had been in existence now for some time, and its operations had been highly successful. The interest had been regularly paid, and the Debt had been gradually but substantially reduced. Now, he understood, by the Treaty just concluded, that this International Commission had been annulled, and a French Commission had been substituted for it. That was an important matter. A good deal of the Tunisian Debt was held by English people, and it was only right that they should be represented on the Commission. What he wished to ask the Government was, whether the Papers they were about to submit would enlighten Parliament on the part the French Cabinet had taken in destroying the old International Commission and supplanting it by a French Commission?

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked whether the Papers to be laid upon the Table would include the Treaty said to have been signed within the last few days; and, also, whether the Government would produce any communications which might have passed with the Italian Government with respect to the action of the French Government?

MR. BOURKE also wished to ask, whether any Papers would be included relating to Biserta Bay which were at the Foreign Office? He believed that there were some Papers at the Admiralty also, in relation to that matter, which the House would like to see.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply to the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen), said, there were points connected with the International Financial Commission on which information would be given in the Papers to be laid before the House. In answer to the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), he had to say that the Treaty would be given in the Papers. The communication with the Italian Government would be given. In answer to the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bourke), he thought his Question had better be put to the Admiralty.

MR. BOURKE gave Notice, that he would, to-morrow, ask a Question about the Papers to which he referred.

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST said, he was willing, after the statement of the Prime Minister, to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, with regard to a threat made by the French in 1864 to fire on any Turkish ironclads that might attempt to proceed to Tunis, upon which the honourable Member for Rochester asked for Lord Palmerston's answer at that time, if he did not say that "there was no answer whatever to it;" if he is aware that in 1864, on the arrival of the French and Italian Fleets in Tunis, Admiral Yelverton was ordered to that place with the English Fleet, and that the Porte sent likewise a squadron under Mustapha Bey, with the Sultan's Commissioner, Haidar Effendi; and, if he will lay upon the Table the Papers referring to that transaction?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) having asked me whether the French Government had threatened to forcibly prevent a Turkish naval force from visiting Tunis, I incidentally stated in my reply that the French Government had so acted in 1841 and in 1864. My hon. Friend the Member for Rochester (Mr. Otway) then asked me what answer Lord Palmerston made, and I replied that the French Government not having asked his consent to their proceeding, he had made none. My hon. Friend then observed that he had sent the British Fleet, and my hon. Friend the Member for Wareham (Mr. Guest) now asks me if that is so. On the former occasion, in 1841, the French Government despatched to Tunis a fleet carrying 438 guns. Lord Palmerston sent a far smaller force to protect British life and property, and with distinct orders "to take no part in the dispute." On the later occasion, in 1864, on the occurrence of riots in the Regency of Tunis, in the course of which the houses of some British merchants were pillaged, Lord Palmerston sent one large and one small ship to protect British life and property. When France interfered in the matter, a few weeks later, the French Government sent a large force, which was ultimately increased till it numbered five unarmoured ships of the Line, two iron-clads, and five other steam men-of-war; and the Italian Government, who had at that time an understanding with the French Government with regard to Tunis, sent four unarmoured frigates, one iron-clad, and one corvette, the Italian ships having also troops on board for disembarkation. There never were more than two British ships at Tunis at any one time in the course of 1864, and their mission was to protect British life and property.

MR. OTWAY asked, whether the Papers to be laid on the Table relating to Tunis would include the negotiations of 1868 and 1869 in regard to the Financial Commission?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said, that the Papers relating to Tunis were almost of incredible bulk, and it would be impossible to include in those about to be produced the Papers referring to the negotiations of 1868 as to the Financial Commission.

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in view of the concert stated to have been established between the Great Powers with the especial object of regulating the affairs of the East and maintaining the Peace of Europe, France consulted the other Powers who were parties to the said concert before invading Tunisian territory, and is now acting with their concurrence and sanction?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the French Government did not consult the Powers.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—IMPORTATION OF CATTLE FROM IRELAND.

MR. LEA asked the Vice President of the Council, If there is any justification for the alarm which exists as to the importation into this Country of cattle from Ireland alleged to be diseased, and which is acting so prejudicially to the interests of the farmers and graziers; and, whether any contagious disease exists amongst cattle in Ireland?

Sir Charles W. Dilke

MR. MUNDELLA, in reply, said, he had endeavoured in his former answers to state there was no justification for the alarm which existed as to the importation into this country of cattle disease from Ireland. The foot-and-mouth disease had ceased to exist in Ireland since October, 1879. There was the residuum of pleuro-pneumonia, but it was not much less than in this country. He only wished the English cattle were in as good a sanitary condition as the Irish cattle at present.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BANBRIDGE WORKHOUSE.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in view of the correspondence which has recently passed between the Very Rev. John O'Brien, of Banbridge, and the Local Government Board in reference to some orphan children, recently inmates of the Banbridge Workhouse, the Government will take steps to enable Boards of Guardians in such cases to exercise some more efficient guardianship over orphans, the custody of whom may be obtained from the Guardians by persons of a different religious persuasion?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the children in question were given up to a relative—the aunt, he believed—by the Board of Guardians. The Board of Guardians had already ample power to exercise sufficient guardianship over orphans. The 8th section of the 25 & 26 Vict. only required Guardians to give up orphans to relatives if the Guardians were of opinion the relatives were fit persons to be entrusted with the children.

CENTRAL ASIA—LORD DUFFERIN'S DESPATCH.

MR. NORTHCOTE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, On what day Her Majesty's Government telegraphed to St. Petersburg for permission to publish Lord Dufferin's Despatch of 8th March, and the Papers referred to in his speech of the 13th instant?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, Lord Dufferin's despatch of the 8th of March relating to a conversation with M. de Giers was received on the 14th of that month. Lord Dufferin was informed that it would be desirable to include a Report of this conversation in the Blue Book, and was asked in the usual terms, whether M. de Giers had any objection to his language being published? On the 17th, Lord Dufferin telegraphed that M. de Giers wished certain omissions to be made, and that a note of these omissions was being despatched by the messenger. It left St. Petersburg on that day, and reached the Foreign Office on the night of the 21st. I only became aware of its receipt on the day of the debate, as the despatch had to be seen by the Secretary of State and the Permanent Under Secretary of State before it reached me, and my recollection was that it had been received only on that day. The Secretary of State on the 22nd ordered the Blue Book to be immediately issued; but as it was found that it could not be got ready before the debate terminated, it was after the debate delayed to include a further despatch, bearing the date of March 26, which had been asked for in this House.

FRANCE—THE NEW COMMERCIAL TREATY.

MR. BOURKE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which I have given him private Notice, in regard to the French Commercial Treaty. It will be remembered that the Treaty expires on the 8th of November. I believe the French Chambers will be dissolved within six weeks or two months of this time; and, therefore, unless the negotiations are concluded between this time and the middle of July, there will be very little chance of any new Treaty being negotiated before the old one expires. I should like, therefore, to ask the Government, Whether, under the circumstances, they will suggest to the French Government the desirability of prolonging the existing Treaty for six months, after the 8th of November? I do not know whether Her Majesty's Government have made any communication with the French Government. If not, I think the present circumstances would justify their making it now.

MR. MACFARLANE: Before the hon. Gentleman answers that Question, I also have one which I should like to ask him—namely, Whether, in the event of the proposed French Tariff being adverse to this country, Her Majesty's Government will afford the House an opportunity of discussing the Treaty before any engagement of a permanent character is entered into; and, whether the Government will consider the desirability of freeing itself from obligations which will hamper this country in reference to its Customs regulations with out offering an equivalent advantage?

MR. MAC IVER said, he should like to know also, What was the present position of the question of the Sugar Bounties, and the Bounties on Shipping?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, in March last Her Majesty's Government foresaw the difficulties adverted to by the right hon. Member, and, as I have already on more than one occasion stated in this House, asked the French Government to prolong the existing Tariff for a period sufficient for all negotiations for a fresh Treaty to be carried on and concluded; but the French Government decline to agree to this suggestion. In reply to the Question of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Macfarlane), I would refer him to the replies which were given by me on the 7th of April and by the Prime Minister on the 28th of that month. In reply to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver), the sugar question is not under the Foreign Office, but under the control of the Board of Trade. The question as to the bounties on shipping will be brought forward again.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. M'COAN: I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland a Question of which I have given him private Notice—namely, Whether he is correctly reported in his speech at Bradford to have said that he believed the Land Law (Ireland) Bill would be passed without any material or substantial alteration; and, whether he desires to convey by that remark that the Amendments to be moved by the Irish Members will not be fairly, and so far as circumstances will allow, generously considered by the Government?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had not read the report alluded to.

Certainly, if he had stated to his constituents anything that would lead to the supposition that the Government meant not to give the usual consideration to Amendments, he did not intend to make such a statement; and he was perfectly sure that no such meaning as that was gathered by his audience. He believed that he had expressed a hope that the Bill would pass, and that it would pass in its main features. But, at the same time, he mentioned one important matter which he thought would be discussed very considerably in Committee, and, of course, he had no authority to preclude the discussion of Amendments, nor was he disposed to say anything so absurd. He trusted he should not be supposed to even wish anything of the sort.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR hoped that before the debate on the second reading closed, it would be stated what Amendments the Government would accept.

THE TRANSVAAL.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he wished to put a Question as to his Notice of Motion in regard to the Transvaal. He understood the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, on a former occasion, to have said that circumstances had somewhat altered in the Transvaal since the Easter Recess; and that, at that time, in his judgment, it would be contrary to the public interest that any debate on the subject should take place. Now, he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had not the least wish, in the delicate nature of the circumstances, to do anything which would prejudice the Public Service; but, at the same time, he was anxious that the discussion of his Motion should not be indefinitely delayed. He therefore asked the right hon. Gentleman, Whether, in his view, circumstances had not so far changed as to admit of such a discussion being taken?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the representation which I made with respect to the altered state of affairs in South Africa as bearing on the proposed Motion of the right hon. Gentleman had reference to the examination we had been able to make of the transactions at Potchefstroom; and on those transactions certain measures of the Government required to be adopted. Until those measures are completed, I cannot give any answer to the Question put by the right hon. Gentleman. The last telegram which I saw, and which is dated yesterday, would imply that we shall have the information speedily. But they are not concluded at present, and matters, strictly speaking, are as they were when I last spoke.

NAVY—DESTRUCTION OF H.M.S.
"DOTEREL."

MR. W. H. SMITH: I wish to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, If the attention of the Admiralty has been called to a statement in the "Daily News" of Saturday last, to the effect that information received from the Pacific station had come to the knowledge of the Government that Fenians were likely to blow up the men-of-war on that station, and that precautions were taken shortly before the disaster to the "Doterel;" whether it is in the power of the hon. Gentleman to give any information to the House on the subject; and, whether there is any connection between this information and the destruction of the "Doterel?"

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, it is true that information, early in last winter, reached the Admiralty from abroad, which their Lordships thought it right to communicate to certain of the foreign stations. At the end of the letter in each case the following paragraph occurred:—

"My Lords do not wish to attach undue importance to the information in question; but they desire to notify it to you, with the view of such precautions being taken to secure the safety of Her Majesty's ships and vessels under your command as you may deem to be necessary."

One of these stations communicated with was the Pacific, to which the Doterel belonged; and the Admiralty do not attach importance to what, with their present knowledge, they are inclined to regard as nothing more than a coincidence. With respect to the steps taken since the loss of the Doterel, I may say that the Garnet sailed for Sandy Point on the 6th from Montevideo; and on the 4th the sloop Penguin, with a complete equipment of divers and diving apparatus from Coquimbo. The Garnet must be before this at Sandy Point, and the Penguin should be there in a day or two. The Britannia, bringing the survivors, is expected at Liverpool on the 31st, where preparations have been made for their reception; and Commander Evans has been ordered to proceed at once to the Admiralty, while the others go on to Portsmouth, so that within a fortnight the questions as to the disaster will be cleared up as far as human testimony can clear them up beyond the point of theory and conjecture.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. PARNELL wished to ask, with reference to the reply given to his hon. Friend the junior Member for County Wicklow (Mr. M'Coan), that the Government would give reasonable consideration to Amendments moved by Irish Members in the Committee stage of the Land Bill, If the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland meant the same reasonable consideration which he gave to Amendments moved by Irish Members during the passage of the two Coercion Bills?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, what I meant to say was this—that the fullest consideration would be given to all bonâ fide Amendments.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Forster, Mr. Bright, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

[SEVENTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [25th April], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, while willing to consider any just measure, founded upon sound principles, that will benefit tenants of land in Ireland, is of opinion that the leading provisions of the Land Law (Ireland) Bill are in the main economically unsound, unjust, and impolitic,"—(Lord Elcho.)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I desire to apologize to the House for my having requested my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. W. M. Johnson) to permit me, instead of himself, to address it at this early portion of the evening—though not quite so early as I hoped it would have been. Various observations have been made by hon. Members, who appear to think there has been either a purpose or unnecessary reservation on the part of the Government with respect to some questions of interest raised in the Land Law (Ireland) Bill; and I have made up my own mind that it is well for me—though I do not see the justice of the objection—to do all that lies in my power to obviate its repetition. I have, therefore, determined to take advantage of the opportunity secured by my hon. and learned Friend, and to solicit the privilege of addressing the House tonight; and being somewhat indisposed, and not able to remain in the House throughout the evening, to venture to make a change in the arrangement as to the person by whom the debate is to be resumed.

Now, Sir, before I speak on the Bill, with the second reading of which we are concerned, I wish to refer to two words which we have heard often repeated in this debate. The first word is "confiscation," and the second word is "compensation." They are words that are, and ought to be, in close association together; for I certainly should be very slow to deny that where confiscation could be proved, compensation ought to follow. But, Sir, I must say that those words are used too frequently and too soon. They are almost the stock expressions of debate upon certain classes of questions. They have repeatedly, again and again, been urged with the greatest confidence where, in some cases, no proof has been shown, and where, in other cases, disproof has been furnished abundantly. I will not refer now in detail to the charges that were made upon the very limited measure that we introduced last year with respect to Compensation for Disturbance, because that remains as it was 12 months ago—a matter of opinion—having been nipped in the bud, and having been prevented from doing the extended evil which was anticipated from it by hon. Gentlemen opposite, or the great good which we, on our part, confidently believed that it would have produced. Hon. Gentlemen opposite know—I need hardly remind them—how this charge of confiscation was raised on the repeal of the Corn Laws; and how it was raised last year upon the very humble, though useful, measure introduced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department in respect to Ground Game. It is more to the purpose that I should remind them how freely it was raised when the Land Bill was under discussion in 1870. ["Hear, hear!"] It was used on that occasion by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin); but I had not intended to quote him in regard to it had he not invited me by his cheer. It was, however, used by others, who may be considered as representative men of the Party. Lord Salisbury described that Bill as bribing one class by plundering another. He said—"You are bribing one class and plundering another, and you are setting an example easily followed." Lord Cairns used much the same language. He spoke candidly, and said, "You allow me the option of purchasing my own property"—words which themselves imply confiscation. Indeed, he quoted with praise a declaration from a certain publication, that there would be no settlement of the question without something which would be called confiscation. ["Hear, hear!"] Well, I am very glad that I am not mis-stating anything as regards the case. "Confiscation" was the word applied to the leading enactments of the Land Bill of 1870. Did the Land Act, when it became the law of the land, confiscate the property of the landlords? Did it injure the property of the landlords? We affirm, on the contrary, and upon evidence, that it improved the property of the landlords. [Dissent.] A shake of the head is less authoritative than the Returns made of authentic transactions in Courts of Justice; and authentic transactions in an Irish Court of Justice from year to year show us two things. In the first place, the rents have increased under the action of the Land Act. I am not speaking now of undue increase; I would say rents have grown under the action of the Land Act. And, in the second place, upon the increased rents, with the larger rental, a larger number of years' purchase has been obtained where the property has come into the market. And that, Sir, has been the end of the charge of confiscation with respect to the Land Act.

But I humbly think there have been cases much more like confiscation than the Land Act. I find a case in my own experience in 1874, though it was on a more limited scale: I refer to the confiscation of the advowsons in Scotland under the Church Patronage Act. I mentioned it at the time, and I never knew a clearer case in my life. I allude to the confiscation of advowsons in the Church of Scotland under the Church Patronage Act. But that is a small matter. Confiscation has come nearer to Ireland in previous legislation. When, in a country where it is now admitted that the improvements upon the holdings are, as a rule, the work of the tenants, we allowed and encouraged the landlord to carry those improvements into the market and to sell them for his own benefit—then, indeed, there was something like confiscation. I never heard, Sir, on that occasion that the Members for the University of Dublin or anyone else belonging to their Party was scandalized at the proceedings of Parliament. It was a most unfortunate and deplorable business. I do not say, and I do not believe, that those who made the recommendations which led to it—the Members of the Devon Commission—were actuated by any evil motive. I believe it was a sheer error, arising out of a sheer want of regard for existing facts. But I want to point it out as teaching a lesson of caution and circumspection to those who so freely and so readily use these hard words and cast them at the head of men who also consider that to propose principles of confiscation would be a disgrace—a disgrace to the Ministers who suggested and the Parliament which would tolerate them for a moment.

I own that I go myself further than what I have stated with regard to the Encumbered Estates Act. By it we have established a system in Ireland, during the present century, which essentially altered the position of the Irish tenant without his permission—I may say without his knowledge. The old system of the Irish law made it hardly practicable for a landlord, without the greatest delay and difficulty, to put into force extreme measures against the tenant. I do not make that statement upon feeble or doubtful authority.

Mr. Gladstone

I make it on the statement of a Preamble of an Act which altered that state of things. The Act of 1816, which did that, recited in its Preamble that such were the expenses and delays of ejectment that it was entirely and absolutely impracticable as a remedy. We must not, therefore, refuse to look at the fact that if the recital of that Preamble be true, there was a permanence and security of tenure then attaching to the Irish tenant which you have since taken away. He has never acquiesced in that abstraction of such security which he possessed and enjoyed; he has maintained against it a continual protest; he has certainly not allowed it to lapse into abeyance. What I wish to say is that we are endeavouring, and it is time to endeavour, to establish the order of something like equal justice in Ireland in these matters; and that those who plead on behalf of landlords—and they have a perfect right to plead against anything that they think trespasses on those rights—should recollect what is due to others who have so long suffered from a course of legislation continued through generation after generation, endured too long without complaint, and now resulting in difficulties with which we are endeavouring to cope, and in the endeavour to cope with which I think we are entitled to some tittle of consideration on the part of this House.

Now, first, with regard to the charges of confiscation. I will only say that the Government cannot admit that they make any confiscation, or in any way approach confiscation, in this Bill, and are not prepared in consequence to admit any plea for compensation. The proof of confiscation—the proof of damage resulting from the action of the Legislature—is the very first step that must be taken and that must be established beyond doubt before the House can fairly be called upon to consider whether it will grant compensation or not. In 1846 the Irish landlord was not inconsiderably compensated at the time of the repeal of the Corn Laws, notwithstanding the enormous benefits conferred upon him by Sir Robert Peel in that measure. There was not a single commodity reared in Ireland for export that has not increased in price under the action of Free Trade, and yet for the change that brought about those results the Irish landlords were compensated by the transfer of a moiety of the charge for the Constabulary to the Consolidated Fund, a moiety which then, I think, amounted to £300,000 or £400,000, but now amounts to more than £1,000,000. I will now pass from the question of confiscation and compensation, and come to the Bill.

Now I wish to observe, Sir, that I have never known a case of so large a measure debated for such a length of time of which so few points have been brought into serious discussion. The points that have been brought into serious discussion, in very different degrees, are, as far as I know, these. We have heard much of fair rents, and we have had reference to the question of arrears. On the question of arrears I will say nothing, except that it is an important question; but there will be no advantage, indeed there would be a difficulty, in dealing with it in detail on the second reading of the Bill. In the same way, another bye-question which we have considered, and the result of which consideration appears in the Bill—but it may be worthy, notwithstanding, of further consideration—is the question of current leases. That also is evidently a question which, in my opinion, ought to be reserved for the Committee on the Bill. Another question, Sir, that has been repeatedly raised has been the apparent unfairness and hardship of refusing to the landlords, as it is said, the power to go into the Court. That is certainly an obvious and plausible question. If you permit the tenant to come into your Court, why do you not permit the landlord? That question seems to have caused much difficulty, and one hon. and learned Gentleman, the Member for Antrim (Mr. Macnaghten), was so struck with the force of that question that he said he should propose that the landlord should be permitted to go into Court. But how did the hon. and learned Member propose to do so? His speech was characterized by great critical and logical power. But he proposed to give an experimental proof of his constructive powers, and that was a much more dangerous task. He said it was a hard case that a landlord having 150 tenants should be liable to 150 suits. What he proposes is this—"I will let the landlord go into Court and exhibit to the Court the state of his rents, and get from the Court a certificate that his rents are fair. But the landlord must undertake not to raise his rents for a certain number of years." Did the hon. and learned Gentleman, who is a lawyer, propose that that proceeding should take place behind the back of the tenant? [Mr. MACNAGHTEN: Certainly not.] That is the answer I get. I am glad to find that the hon. and learned Gentleman, when under criticism, is not insensible to comment. He means then that there must be notice to the tenant. Very good. The consequence is that the hon. and learned Gentleman proposes, by way of giving favour to the landlord, that he shall have 150 suits on at the same time, in order that he may be rewarded by the privilege of having the rent established, which rent he must not raise for a certain number of years. I cannot conceive that the hon. and learned Gentleman was serious in making such a proposal as that the landlord should be allowed to come as a privilege into Court and raise the question of increasing every rent on his estate.

But, Sir, we have proceeded on an entirely opposite principle—the principle of disturbing nothing that we could avoid disturbing, and of leaving outside the Court and the action of the Court all those who are willing to be so left, in order that they may settle their affairs without the intervention of the Court. That is the frame of the Bill. The Bill does not open the Court to the whole tenantry of Ireland; it leaves the initiative of going before the Court to the landlord. But still that is not an answer to the question. Why not allow the landlord to go into Court? In the first place, you are entirely mistaken in the idea that the landlord has no power to go into Court. That is a mistake made by many hon. Gentlemen who have made eloquent speeches on the other side of the House, evidently without having read beyond the first page of the Bill. Now, Sir, what is the interest of the landlord in this matter? His interest, in the first place, lies in keeping up his rent to a fair and just standard. That interest is secured to him by giving him the power of raising his rent, and throwing it upon the tenant to go into Court in order to obtain a judicial rent against him. Some people say—"Why don't you allow the landlord to escape the odium of raising of rent by obtaining a judicial sentence from the Court?" They think—it is the first time I ever heard it—that any landlord in this country believes that he is diminishing the odium of some proceeding that he takes against a tenant in his own interest by founding upon it a lawsuit in which he involves the tenant. The fact is, that so far from diminishing odium, he would, in my opinion, largely increase it, when he mingles the action of the Court with his own pressure upon the tenant.

Then, again, there is the interest of the landlord, if he wishes to avoid the risk of having a tenant rack-rented, not only in his own rent, but in the tenant right for which he pays to the outgoing tenant. The landlord may fairly plead—at any rate, the Bill admits it—that the tenant right may rack-rent the incoming tenant as much as an extravagant rent. Be it right or wrong, we have provided in the Bill for that, and all that we have heard of successive sales of tenant right—rising one above another—is utterly inapplicable to the Bill. The 1st clause of the Bill provides for it. Hon. Gentlemen who have spoken on this subject have only read the first limb of the first sentence of the 1st clause. It says that the tenant shall be allowed to sell his tenant right for the best price that he can obtain. Hon. Gentlemen read so far, and no farther. But if they went on, they would find that the tenant is required to give notice to the landlord, and the landlord, on receiving that notice, may agree with the tenant on the amount of the tenant right that the outgoing man is to receive; and, if he cannot agree with the tenant, he may take him into the Court for the purpose. Thus the two items of the landlord's interest are secured—his interest as to the rent, by his power of raising the rent; his interest as to the tenant right, by his power of taking the tenant into Court. But it may be said—"Why don't you give him a wider power still, and allow him always to go into Court?" That is a fair question for discussion, and we have well considered it. But I think the House will probably agree in our conclusion that the wiser course is that which we have adopted. In the strange state of things which has prevailed in Ireland the Court has been looked upon as a sort of Paradise into which everybody would rush. That is not our view at all in the matter. We conceive that the action of the Court must impose considerable burdens on small owners who cannot undertake to pay the expenses of civil litigation; and the expenses of civil litigation, however you may control them, must be severely felt by the poor man and the small man. To the landlord the expenses frequently may be light; to the tenant they may be very severe. But, be it understood, it is in the indiscriminate power of the landlord to go into Court. Let that matter be argued in Committee if there is any question about it. We shall hear what is to be said, with perfect willingness to be convinced if good and sufficient reasons can be given; but we have not acted without reason or consideration in the course we have taken. I have shown also that it is totally inaccurate to say that the landlord has no power of going into Court, because, in the matter of tenant right, which he can check in no other way, this Bill authorizes him to go into the Court. [An hon. MEMBER: Where?] In the 3rd sub-section of the 1st clause it is stated that, on receiving notice, the landlord may purchase the tenancy for such amount as may be agreed upon, or, in the event of disagreement, as may be settled by the Court. The resort to the Court is there as clearly indicated as can be. [Sir R. ASSHETON CROSS: When is that power given?] When there is a change of tenancy. The 1st clause says—

“On receiving such notice the landlord may purchase the tenancy for such sum as may be agreed upon, or, in the event of disagreement, may be settled by the Court to be the value thereof.”

That contemplates most distinctly the case when the tenancy passes from one person to another; but I do not believe the words convey that it is to be a resumption of the land by permanent possession on the part of the landlord. The landlord may agree with the tenant upon the sum to be paid for the purchase, or he may have the sum fixed by the Court.

And now I will take the question of the constitution of the Court. I own this matter has received from one of the Members for the University of Dublin such discussion in detail as I have hardly ever known given upon the second reading of a Bill, and with a warmth and vehemence such as I have scarcely ever seen exceeded even by him. This is a matter necessarily of detail, for consideration and adjustment. The state of the case is this—I am bound to make an admission. In one point this Bill, for which, I think, the draftsman cannot be too much praised, whatever judgment its authors may deserve, does not exactly correspond with our intention. Our intention was to give an option of passing by the Civil Bill Court, if it was decided so to act; but it was also thought there should be power of going into the Civil Bill Court. The tenant, we thought, should have the power, if he pleased, of going to the Commission, or the agent of the Commission, at once. I put it respectfully to hon. Gentlemen, whether it is desirable to go further than that? I am not now raising the question of the arrangements to be made for the conduct of proceedings in the Civil Bill Courts; but I submit it would not have been wise wholly to pass by a body of gentlemen who have had an opportunity under the Land Act of acquiring a mass of experience such as is not possessed by any other body of gentlemen in Ireland. I will go one step further, and say I cannot for myself—it may be owing to my ignorance—think, upon the figures, that the result of actions in the Civil Bill Court have been very discreditable. Hon. Gentlemen who are lawyers will be able to form a much better judgment than I can in this matter; but I invite attention to these facts. For the four years previous to 1877—before that time we have no available account—we have the number of land claims which were entered before the Court. These claims were 1,688. The appeals tried from these cases were 212. The judgments confirmed were 140, and, so far as I can make out from the figures, there were 50 judgments which have been reversed, upon a total of 1,688 cases tried—that is to say, 3 per cent, which means that 32 out of every 33 men who came before the Civil Bill Court had justice done to them. I cannot suppose that will be considered a very unsatisfactory result. I can hardly think the Court deserves the severity of judgment which has been pronounced by some. Great fault is found with the Bill because of what it is said may be done by our Commissioner or by his deputy, and the most dreadful pictures have been painted of the consequences of placing power in the hands of incompetent men. We shall be very glad to hear in Committee of any safeguard that can be provided; but the House will bear in mind this fact. It is hardly possible, however, to forecast the details of the probable transactions under this Bill. No one can tell where they will rise—how they will rise—in what part of the country they will rise.

This leads me to another remark on the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Antrim. He complained that the Bill was not sufficiently elastic. How does he propose to make it more elastic in this matter of the Court? He said, Why do you not appoint two Commissioners for each Province? How do we know what will be requisite for each Province? In one Province there may be little or no demand. In Leinster and Ulster, for example, it is possible the demand will be very different from what it will be in the other Provinces. What we propose is, not that a multitude of public officers shall be created before we know whether there shall be any duties for them to perform, but that officers of the Court may be appointed as necessity arises and according to the measure of the necessity. So much for certain of the points raised. And as to the very important point of a fair rent, one of the Members of the University of Dublin condemns our proposal as undoubted confiscation tempered and flavoured with cowardice; while other hon. Gentlemen, more moderate in their mode of looking at the measure, think that the words we have used are defective and even dangerous. I see the senior Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) in his place, and I must pay him a deserved compliment. I do not think it was possible to submit arguments more calmly, clearly, or more fairly to the consideration of the House than he did.

Let me endeavour to go through the points of this question, and, in doing so, I shall make another more agreeable reference to the hon. and learned Member for Antrim. He made a remark with which I, for one, most cordially agree. He said the very terms "fair rent" conveyed their own meaning. They are really the charter of those who are interested in fair rents; but it is a question, and a very difficult question, to know how far we can go in development, in restriction, and in direction. I have to admit, however, that the Government are not very proud of their workmanship in this portion of their undertaking, and I hope it may be amended, and materially amended, in Committee. But, at the present moment, my wish is to draw in the clearest manner a distinction between that which is essential and that which is secondary and accidental in this clause. And here I must complain of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the late Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson). He holds that, according to the best legal construction, the proceedings of the Court would be carried on thus: a certain rent would be fixed, and then a tenant-right outside Ulster equivalent to seven years' rent will be deducted from that original rent. Now we protest altogether against that method of deduction; it is not the manner, so far as I know, in which these things are conducted in Ireland now. In this very difficult business it is some comfort to recollect that this subject of rents is not new to Irish lawyers and Irish Judges; in Ulster it has been before them for some time, and in other parts of Ireland it has come before them in cases of eviction under the operation of the Land Act. I must go a little further and complain that the right hon. and learned Gentleman not only put a construction upon the clause by interpolating words of his own into it that are not there, but he then went on to exhibit his own method in a supposed case, stating his argument on an altogether fallacious basis. He imagined a case in which he supposed the fair rent in the market was £24. The fair rent in the market! That was his starting-point in this great argument; but that starting-point is poisoned with a fallacy from the beginning. Our whole contention is, that these words, applied to Ireland generally—"a fair rent in the market"—are words involving a contradiction in terms, for the rent in the market is not a fair rent. Consequently, everything that the right hon. and learned Gentleman founded upon that fallacious assumption was as fallacious as the assumption from which he started. The essence of this clause really must be considered apart from particular words which one person or another may desire to add to the description of that essence. I believe we were right in requiring that the Court shall hear and take into consideration all the circumstances of the case. Beyond that, what we feel is this: there is one circumstance of the case so important, so paramount for every settlement of the question, that we must take notice of it, and that is the tenant's interest. We cannot leave that covered up by any general expression of "all the circumstances of the case." We are bound to point to the tenant's interest. Now no one can say, I think, that there has been any reticence on the part of the Government as to what the interest of the tenant is. My right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland said most truly that if you were to admit this doctrine of deduction it would be a deduction from the top market rent, and not from the fair rent. Now, supposing the case of a top market rent in Ireland, what does that include as a general rule? In the first place, it includes annual payment for the value of the tenant's improvements, and that is the first and the greatest element of legitimate tenant right. In the second place, it includes the excess which is found in open biddings for holdings in Ireland, in consequence of the scarcity of land as compared with the demand for it—just as in buying a curiosity in this country, simply because the article is rare, the buyer will go far beyond the intrinsic value in the price he gives, so, under the necessity of a much sterner order in Ireland in bidding for land, the bidder is ready to give more than he really ought to give, or can properly afford to give—and that excess in bidding for the land, owing to the scarcity of land in Ireland, is the second and remaining element of tenant right.

And here I come to the very fair and pertinent question of the senior Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket). I say that neither of these elements of value belongs to the landlord. Both of them form constituent parts of the tenant right, and those taken together may be said very fairly, in general terms, to constitute that which the tenant has to sell. Now it has been supposed to be absurd to make any reference in this matter to the compensation for disturbance and for improvements under the Land Act, and I admit, as the clause now stands, the words have too exclusive prominence given to them. They stand as if they were the only thing to be looked at outside Ulster, at all events, as requiring definite notice, whereas they are not. But, on the other hand, hon. Gentlemen must recollect that these words are most important and operative words under the Land Act of 1870. Under that Act, as it passed this House and went to the House of Lords, it stood thus—that no yearly tenant could be evicted from his holding without being compensated for his improvements and for disturbance, on a scale with a maximum of seven years. Well, the effect of that was that the Act, as it went from this House, permitted assignment, and that assignment constituted tenant right. I challenge contradiction to that statement. The place of a man whose holding was the means of livelihood was a thing worth paying for, and the people are willing to pay for it. The complaint is that they only pay too much; and when we said to the holders of land—"We will fortify your position by taking care that you shall not be removed from it," we gave them virtually the tenant right, and a real interest in the holding. But what was done in the House of Lords? A prohibition to assign. Although, however, the property was made inalienable, though the privilege of alienation was unfortunately taken away, yet the property itself remains; and upon cases of eviction how is the thing worked? I am not now speaking of eviction for non-payment of rent, but of those cases, happily, I believe, not very numerous, where the eviction has been of a more arbitrary kind. In those cases what happens is this:—The landlord has evicted, the tenant claimed compensation for disturbance, the landlord looked out for another tenant; that other tenant, and not the landlord, has paid to the outgoing man the compensation for disturbance; and that is the basis of the tenant right. Depend upon it, under the operation of the Land Act there have been at work causes which, gradually but surely, have tended to the distinct development of a system of tenant right in all agricultural holdings of Ireland; and not only so, but have tended to give to that tenant right a form, corresponding in the main to the compensation for disturbance and compensation for improvements.

I have explained, therefore, what the tenant has to transfer. I say he has to transfer these improvements; and if he is in a position fortified by compensation for disturbance, his holding being a means of livelihood, which it is worth another man's while to pay for, he has got this apart from the landlord; and it is perfectly fair and just that you should not interpose any obstacle. Therefore, in our view, the tenant right in Ireland is made up of elements neither of which belongs to the landlord, and which no landlord except an unjust landlord, and the case I trust is exceptional, endeavours to convert to his own profit. But an unjust landlord must be prepared to be interfered with. We will not undertake to respect the use he has made of the peculiar circumstances of the country, and of the long and favourable presumptions of the Legislature towards him, or allow his doing less than justice to those who stand towards him in the relation of social inferiors and dependents.

I trust, then, it will be understood that, in considering tenant right, these, and these only, are the elements which, so far as our views go, the Court will be entitled to exact. We assert distinctly and maintain that such is the legitimate basis of tenant right over and above improvements; but we assert also that that is an element which forms no part whatever of a landlord's legitimate rent, and which consequently is not to be deducted from the rent, and constitutes no interference with it at all. I will not enter into further detail on this question. We shall have other opportunities of doing so.

The principles of this Bill I have never heard once described in any speech from the opposite side of the House during this debate. Every observation that has been made has gone, as it has appeared to me, upon bye-points—for I call just and fair rent, however vital it may be, a bye-point. If we admit fair rent, you will, I hope, hold us to give a substantial meaning to those words; but it is a bye-point. But the principles of the Bill I have heard excellently described by those hon. Gentlemen who have studied the Bill on this side of the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton) perfectly comprehended it. The basis of it lies in the land scarcity of Ireland, and its principle is this—in the first place, a frank acceptance of the Irish custom, and especially this custom of tenant right. And now I am going to make an observation—not dogmatically; but I must say that, in my reading about land in Ireland, it has often occurred to me that the truly wise landlord in Ireland was the man who not only was liberal to his tenants, but who gave to that liberality a form and method of application adapted to the usages of the country. I do firmly believe that there are many wise, good, and enlightened landlords in Ireland, using those words in the general sense, who have freely spent money and parted with money for the sake of what they thought doing their duty, but who would have done their duty more profitably for themselves, and more advantageously to the country, if they had been less intent upon importing exotic habits into the country, and more inclined to allow the people to work according to their usages and traditions. At any rate, I hope hon. Gentlemen will see from our point of view that nothing is so plain as the duty of accepting the principle of tenant right. I cannot say with what satisfaction I listened to the able speech of my noble Friend the Member for Barnstaple (Viscount Lymington) upon this subject. His father, Lord Portsmouth, is one of those who tell you plainly, as I understand him, that he does not come before you in the character of a martyr or a victim. He does not say he has suffered by his practice to his tenants; but he has said that the frank allowance of tenant right has been most profitable to himself. That has been the result of universal experience in Ireland, and it is established by the experience of Ulster. Whatever you may say of the extensive and almost unintelligible prices which are sometimes obtained there for tenant right, it is undeniable that whereas, in general, rents in Ireland have grown much more slowly than in England or Scotland, the slowness of their growth is really to be attributed to the insecurity of the tenant. Equally undeniable is it that within Ireland itself, if you compare the growth in Ulster, where there was tenant right, to the growth in the other three Provinces, where there was none, it has been far more rapid in Ulster; and that is entirely owing to the fact and presence of tenant right.

Some hon. Gentlemen have referred to speeches of mine, and have put me back to what is a very unacceptable task — that of reading them over again—but I must say that there is only one important particular in my speeches of 1870—to which I will at present refer—which I do not strictly and literally abide by. The principles upon which we have proceeded are—first, a perfectly frank acceptance of Irish custom; and, secondly, what is undoubtedly a great departure from the principles of free contract—namely, the introduction of judicial authority to settle a grievance between man and man with regard to agricultural holdings. Sir, I do not for a moment disguise the magnitude of that proposal. It is, if I may say so, the one really Radical proposal in this Bill. It is the one and only proposal that involves a strong and sharp departure from ordinary principles for the regulation of private affairs. I do not disguise it. But I ask you to observe this—first, it is required by the circumstances of the country; and, secondly, it is limited by those provisions which we have introduced, and which, in every case, though you have not thought fit to take any notice of it, have left it open to parties to return, when they conveniently can, to the ordinary principles of contract.

Are we justified in introducing this Radical proposal for committing to a Court the regulation of these private and personal appeals? In presenting this Bill to the House I stated what were not the reasons which, in my opinion, would justify it, and also what the reasons were which would. The necessity which I pleaded was a necessity, in the first place, arising from the unprecedented position of Ireland with regard to the pressure of the demand for land as compared with the supply; and, secondly, the unfortunate but inevitable results of the conduct of harsh and grasping and even cruel landlords, who, though few in proportion to the whole, have it fatally in their power to compromise the best interests of other men. I also quoted authority—and I have heard no one from the opposite side of the House make any reference to the authorities under which we are acting—I also pointed out that the Commissioners had recommended the introduction of this great innovation. I will now refer to one Commissioner who sits before me—namely, the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin).

He is one of the fathers of this Bill. Far be it from me to say he has ever owned it, or even made the smallest confession. But in ascribing it to him I am doing him an honour. He is not aware of the extent of his connection with this Bill. I will also refer to two persons who, when the Land Act of 1870 was under discussion in this House, recommended the reference of these matters to a Court. One of them is a Nobleman who is still alive—I mean Lord Winmarleigh. The other was the eminent man whose loss you are—and I cannot wonder at it—now deeply mourning. In 1870, Mr. Disraeli said—

“If a man without a lease, and who had paid his rent, is evicted, let his case go before the tribunal you shall appoint; let the Judge investigate all the elements of the equity of the case; and let him come to a decision which on one side shall guard the tenant from coercion, and, on the other, preserve the landlord from fraud.” —[3 Hansard, cxcix. 1821.]

That, of course, is the object of the new Court. Therefore, you have in those words the substance of this tremendous proposal. I shall now read the words of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire, who has put his hand to this paragraph—

“Bearing in mind the system by which the improvements and equipments of a farm are very generally the work of the tenant, and the fact that a yearly tenant is at any time liable to have his rent raised by the increased value given to his holding, by the expenditure of his capital and labour, legislative interference to protect him from an arbitrary increase of rent does not seem unnatural, and we are inclined to think that by the majority of landowners, a measure properly framed to accomplish this end would not be objected to.”

I understand the hon. Gentleman to point to what I may call the preamble of the sentence. [Mr. CHAPLIN: Read the next paragraph.] I have not got it here; but the next paragraph treats of the three “F’s,” and we have not proposed the three “F’s.” I will come to that by-and-bye. The hon. Member is quite justified in pointing out that the preamble of this sentence has reference exclusively to improvements. That is quite true; but the enacting part has not. If the hon. Member had been content to say in his Report—“In consequence of the arbitrary increase of rent put upon the improvements of the tenant, we, the Commissioners, recommend that his improvements shall be protected by the intervention of a Court,” that would have been one thing. But that is not what he has done. He has recommended the intervention of the Court for the purpose of preventing all cases of an arbitrary increase of rent. But an arbitrary increase of rent is not limited to the tenant's improvements. It includes the swallowing up of the tenant's interest, and taking advantage of his property and the state of the market to get more than the commodity is worth. The hon. Gentleman, in recommending that the tenant shall be protected against an arbitrary increase of rent, without limiting that recommendation in the slightest degree to the particular case of improvements, has made himself responsible for the great and the only violent recommendation of this Bill.

I admit the Commissioners have said nothing at all excepting about rent. They have said nothing about tenant right; they have said nothing about security and fixity of tenure. Did the Commissioners really suppose that you could bring in a Court to determine rent and entirely refuse to take cognizance of the question of security of tenure? Is it possible to say—"A Commission shall determine the rent to-day, and the landlord shall, if he please, put out the man to-morrow?" The hon. Member will not rise and answer that question, although I paid him the compliment of ascribing to him the paternity of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman will see, if you authorize the Court to fix the rent, that it necessarily involves some duration of the rent. If you involve some duration of the rent you are fixing it, and between you and us the difference is only one of degree. We have not said rents shall be perpetual. We have introduced provisions by which they may be re-fixed from time to time, as circumstances would arise. In the same way with tenant right, I do not believe the hon. Member, and I feel sure that no Member from Ireland, will say that when a Court has fixed judicially the rent of a holding and given to that rent a certain term of years through which it shall exist indefeasibly, except by the fault of the tenant, the tenant's interest should not be an interest saleable in the market. These three things are inseparable. They are three strands of one cord, and they are absolutely indefeasible. We have largely qualified them all; but to have attempted to deal with one of them, and not made a consistent whole, would, in my opinion, have proved totally unworthy of the great question with which we have to deal.

We have, therefore, I admit, with reference to the very grave circumstances of Ireland, made this great departure from the principles of free contract. But with that great departure we have combined provisions to enable the parties to return to free contract when they may find it expedient to do so. And, lastly, one of the principles of the Bill is in a set of provisions intended to promote and further the acquisition of capital and of a permanent proprietary interest, and advances of public money for certain other important purposes. Under these circumstances, I must own it is with the deepest regret that I have observed the conduct of the Party opposite on this occasion. I am very sorry that the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) is not in the House. The Opposition are going to support him in the assertion that—

"The leading provisions of the Land Law (Ireland) Bill are in the main economically unsound, unjust, and impolitic."

My noble Friend delivered his speech with such good humour, and was himself so obviously pleased with what fell from his lips, that it became infectious throughout the House. I myself was not insensible to the charm of it; and, I must say, it was an excellent example of a speech, in which an experienced Member of Parliament showed that you may say very strong things without giving offence. He gave no offence to me; but I am sorry to say that he misapprehended and misunderstood the case, greatly, I think, to his own prejudice. Is it possible that any Gentleman on the opposite side of the House can think that he is promoting the interests either of his Party or of the country by representing that this Bill gives perpetuity of tenure, perpetual fixity of rent, and unlimited tenant right? As a matter of fact, the tenant right is limited; the judicial rent is rent only for a term; and the security or possession given to the tenant is not only defeasible in consequence of his own breach of contract, but also after the first 15 years, which, after all, is not perpetuity. It is also defeasible if the landlord is able to make out a reasonable and sufficient case for resumption. We may be right, or we may be wrong; but why begin the unfortunate course of inflaming and exaggerating your statement of the provisions of the Bill? Surely it was a case in which the public interest, and, most of all, your own interests, would make it desirable that you should understand everything in as favourable a sense as reason will permit you to attach to it.

So far as we are concerned, I am not complaining of what you have done; I am not at all sure that your conduct has been adverse to our Bill. Your censures and denunciations have gone forth through the length and breadth of Ireland as the strongest testimonials on behalf of our measure to secure to it the adhesion of the people; and I think it is very likely that you may have induced by your statements—entirely outstripping the fact—some persons in Ireland to think that the Bill contains what it does not contain. It is a very large and strong measure; it is a measure as large, I hope, as the necessities of that country demand. But we have carefully endeavoured to prevent its wanton or its needless enlargement, and to leave every ground and every opening for the maintenance of the present social relations in Ireland, and likewise for the return of that which we know to be the best system for the cultivation of land under all normal circumstances—namely, a system where its particulars are arranged by free discussion between one man and another.

That being so, what are the Party opposite going to do? The noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) has given Notice of a hostile Amendment. Everybody knows that the meaning of an Amendment on the second reading is not only opposition to the Bill, but it is the extreme form of opposition to the Bill. The noble Lord, however, who has been a Member of several Cabinets, has not only given Notice of an Amendment, but has announced that he is going to vote for the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho). I presume that he made that announcement on behalf of his Colleagues. In the Notice of the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire I perceive the first effect of the death of Lord Beaconsfield. If he had lived that Notice would not, in my opinion, have been given. I have had an experience of Lord Beaconsfield from a post opposite to me; but it has been a long experience; and you do not remain wholly ignorant of a man with whom, on a thousand questions, you are obliged, however unequally, to measure swords. When, Sir, a Liberal Government came into Office in 1868, and proposed the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, it would have been in the power of Lord Beaconsfield, if he had thought fit, to have prolonged the contest for years. On the contrary, I have not a doubt that Lord Beaconsfield thought that the issue was certain, and that for every interest—for the interest of the country, for the interests of his Party and his own—the sooner the goal was reached the better. He might have, I believe, taken the same course of prolonging the contest on the Land Bill of 1870; and that Bill, relatively to the circumstances in which it was introduced, was quite as great an innovation—quite as daring a measure of remedy—estimated with reference to what went before, as the present Bill when regarded with reference to the measure of 1870.

Well, what is intended to be done now? Do you who sit opposite think—is there any one of you who thinks—that this question will ever be settled by a measure smaller than the Bill before the House? And if by powerful combination, beginning below the Gangway, among a limited number, but still not of unimportant persons, and carried on elsewhere with stronger ties and ramifications—if you thus succeed in overthrowing this Bill, and the Government which attaches its fortunes to this Bill, and if you take their places, you will pass, not a smaller, but a larger measure. Nor am I the first person who has said this. I know not if the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) is in his place. [A VOICE: Yes.] I hold in my hand a speech which he delivered on the 6th of December last at Waterford, and which I read with great interest; but I am not going to quote from it for the purpose of making any charge against him. It was perfectly natural for him to say what he did. He began by predicting that if Mr. Gladstone should proceed to legislate on the Irish Land Question he would infallibly break up his Cabinet, “and that,” he added,

"would be rather unfortunate, or it may seem to be rather unfortunate, for us; but I do not think the event will prove that it is unfortunate for us." He goes on to say that for England it would be unfortunate; but for him, with his views, it would not be unfortunate. The meaning, Sir, is plain. The hon. Gentleman knows well that if the Party opposite came into Office they would, under pressure, as they have done before, bring in a larger Bill than this; and that the words "Fraud, force, and folly," as applied to the three "F.'s," would gradually dwindle and grow pale, and that the hon. Member might wave his flag of triumph over a measure passed by a Conservative Government of which, perhaps, some Conservatives would themselves be heard to say, the landlords scowling in the background—"How much more liberal a measure it is, after all, than that which was brought forward by the Liberal Party."

But hon. Gentlemen opposite are judges of their own conduct. The matter, however, is one of a serious character. We are playing with edged tools in the state Ireland is now in. There is not a step which we have taken in reference to this measure which has not been taken under an overwhelming sense of responsibility. We do not mean to trifle with that which we have taken in hand. You must judge of your own duty; we must judge of ours. We shall use every effort legitimately belonging to us: first, to pass this Bill; secondly, to pass it speedily; and, thirdly, to pass it in an effectual form. My right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) has been charged, I think needlessly—I do not see that his words give the slightest colour to the charge—with having given an intimation that we should haughtily refuse to discuss Amendments in the Bill. No, Sir, we have no such intention. I am not looking to one quarter of the House in preference to another. In proportion to our intense anxiety to be the bearers of some message of peace and good to Ireland is our willingness and desire to receive, from whatever quarter it may come, assistance in bringing the Bill as nearly as may be to perfection. We are not so vain as to think our first effort within the walls of the Cabinet room enable us to dispense with all the criticism, suggestions, and improvements which the intellect and ingenuity of this great Assembly may furnish. But permit me to say—and I hope I shall not be misunderstood—not on the ground of any will or decision of ours, but because of the logical laws of events, that nothing appears to me so unlikely as that the Bill should be to any great extent changed. Were it to be vitally and fundamentally changed, in the sense of the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire, the people of Ireland, it may be assumed, would reject it as one man. But there is another construction to be put on the suggestion of change, and I have to suppose the case of a fundamental alteration in the sense which a portion of the Irish Members may desire. In considering that matter, among other points, I cannot exclude from our consideration that the settlement of this question does not depend on the judgment of this House alone. There is another Assembly which we must confront, where we are in a small minority; but, which will claim, and is constitutionally entitled, to give its independent vote on the provisions of this Bill. If we hold by those provisions, I am so confident of their general character—I am so deeply persuaded of their general moderation, as well as efficiency—that I feel we can with a good conscience and with a sanguine hope address ourselves to whatever duties may belong to us for the purpose of the prompt passing of this Bill. But, if they see we are prepared to alter its character, in what is called the popular sense; and, having brought it in as one measure, to send it up to them as another; most justly might those who will have elsewhere to pronounce upon it say—"We are dealing with a set of men who do not know their own minds, and we refuse to defer to their authority."

I am therefore well convinced that the nature of this Bill, although it may be open, as I have admitted, to criticism in some particulars, is nevertheless of such a character that the ultimate choice of Parliament will be between the Bill in its essence or nothing; between the acceptance or the rejection of the Bill as it now stands. As I have said, we on this side will not shrink from the performance of our part, for if we did there would be no condemnation too severe to pass on us for our rashness and temerity. At this crisis I gratefully acknowledge the spirit in which this Bill has been generally received in Ireland. The landlords of Ireland showed in 1870 that they were not deficient in penetration. They were, I believe, at that time as much as they are now under the impression that their true interest is to have this question settled, and to have it settled at once. I gratefully acknowledge the generous reception which our proposals have received in Ireland. They have been received there as by men who have felt the force of the evils pressing upon them, and who were desirous of hailing the advent of whatever would give fair promise of offering a remedy. Let that generous reception in Ireland be met by a corresponding feeling on this side of the Channel, and within the walls of these great Legislative Assemblies. Then the year 1881 will not have passed away without adding to the Statute Book another great emancipating and redeeming measure, necessary alike for the prosperity of Ireland, the fame of Parliament, and the strength and solidity of the United Kingdom.

MR. FITZPATRICK said, in rising to discuss the measure before the House, he must explain that he considered that in that Bill there were three Bills:—1st, one having for its object the extinction of the landlord by creating a new law of land tenure; 2nd, a Bill for creating a peasant proprietary; and, 3rd, a Bill for the reclamation of waste land and the carrying out of emigration. In examining No. 1 Bill, the new law of tenure, he confessed to a natural nervousness in daring to discuss or attack a measure which, up to then, had apparently puzzled even its own foster parents, if not its originator; but as very little light could be thrown upon it by anyone, he must only conclude that it was a vast web of law, in which the unfortunate landowner was to be entangled and slowly sucked to death by lawyers, Land League, and statesmen, who would thus be enabled to buy up his property at a cheap rate so as to carry out Bill No. 2 without much cost to the Exchequer. If the Bill was really meant as a remedy for the state of Ireland he could only say that, as an Irishman, he felt a deep sense of shame and astonishment that any such antediluvian measure should be deemed necessary to insure the prosperity of their land. They had always been considered a shrewd, quick-witted nation. Their countrymen had always been supposed to be good hands at a bargain; and he, for one, believed they were so still; but the Bill before the House upset that theory altogether. It assumed that an Irishman had no knowledge of a bargain, no spirit of commerce or dealing. In point of fact, the Land Law (Ireland) Bill, with its three Judges, was to stand for the next 15 years in loco parentis to the whole nation. Now, possibly, this might, in some cases, be advisable. Some of their wayward fellow-countrymen did require guidance, and a check on some of the mischief done by their idle hands would be very useful; but why, might he ask, was that newly-created father not to take into equal consideration the good and the evil, the just and the unjust? The Premier had told them that the Irish landlords had stood their trial, and had been acquitted; but, at the same moment, and in almost the same breath, he mulcted the whole class he had just applauded to the amount of many millions. He said a few had not discharged their duties and had abused their rights. For their sins he would punish all. Did a just Government hang every man in a town because a murder was committed within its limits? That was not justice, it was not even expediency. It was merely the surrender of the moderate Liberal opinion to the wild Radical tail which was now the motive power in all Government actions. By the Bill before the House Government demolished piecemeal, and by studied legal devices the rights that had not only existed by prescription for centuries—his family had held the same land for over 900 years—but what was much more dangerous and unstatesmanlike, they confiscated boldly the rights, and actually a large part of the capital, which was paid for land under the Encumbered Estates Court, where an indefeasible Parliamentary title was given at each sale. What was the equivalent offered? The option of selling at a reduced rate to the Land Commission; that reduction being forced on the unfortunate owner not by a fall in the market value of his property, but by the action of the Bill itself, which, after fixing his rent on the most unequal scale, flooded the market with estates for sale. A Scotch Member of that House said, in an able pamphlet he wrote in 1869—

“The faith of Parliament is pledged to the purchasers under the Courts that they shall be sole proprietors, with all the rights of proprietors, and it will be breaking faith with those proprietors if the Legislature deprive them of any of those rights which it certainly would do if the demands of some people in Ireland were conceded.”

Those demands were now conceded, and the rights of those proprietors were now confiscated without any hint at compensation—the Premier himself having stated that there would exist, after the passing of this Bill, “a joint proprietorship in the soil.” They were told that this measure was framed to meet Irish views. They were advised to accept it, because it was one of the first true attempts of England to meet the desires of the Irish nation. But what were the true facts of the case? Again a price had been placed on the landlord’s head; a sufficient number had been shot; a good long reign of anarchy and agitation had paved the way to further concessions to the tenant, who had broken contract and renounced honest dealing; while the many landlords, who had done their duty throughout a dangerous and trying time, both by cause and country, were penalized without compensation, were condemned though acquitted. Did the Government realize what was the party to meet whose views that measure had been brought in? It consisted of all that was anti-English in Ireland, all that was violent and Communistic, and was numerically small. Were the opinions of the majority of real Irishmen not to be considered as well? Apparently not. At any rate, there was no trace of those opinions in the present measure, and even the strong, almost Radical, expositions of Mr. Stuart Mill and the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) were not represented. They, at all times, urged compensation for confiscation of the landlord’s rights and privileges, as well as compensation for disturbance for the tenant; and he had reason to believe such clauses for compensation were in the Bill in the month of January, if not later. Judge Longfield, in one of the best articles published by the Cobden Club, always incalculated the idea of paying for what was taken from the landlord by the action of the State. He said in that essay, referring to the continued concessions made to agitation and murder—

“Success acquired by such measures would not produce intended results. Riches acquired by fraud and outrage are not long enjoyed, for the qualities by which they are acquired are inconsistent with the qualities which are necessary to retain them.”

They had had the outrage for the last two years. In that Bill they had the fraud; and it merely required time to produce the effect he predicted. Tenants would mortgage and spend their stolen property; the banks, the loan funds, the gombeen or usurer would grow rich, the tenant poorer; another wild time of famine and murder would force some future Radical Government to confiscate again what might be left to the landowners of that day, were they fee-simple owners of large estates or peasant proprietors. Such would always be the case. They were told in Her Gracious Majesty’s Speech from the Throne that the Bill was intended as an Amendment on the Act of 1870. As he read the 1st clause, it was in direct antagonism to the spirit of the Act of 1870. In that Act the owner was incited to buy up his Ulster tenant right; in the Bill that custom was extended over Ireland. When he came to the institution of a Court to fix rents, he was met by the Premier’s own words, in his reply on the second reading of the Bill of 1870. First of all, he asked—“How are these rents to be valued? What is the test?” In 1881 they had the answer. By estimating and deducting from it the value that he proposed to carve out of the owner’s property by Clause 1, and by estimating, not the improvements done by the landlord, adding value to the holding, but by the amount of compensation for disturbance. He finished up with a sentence very appropriate to this Bill—

“Two persons have a vital interest in the land. One of them is the landlord, who regards the estate as a whole, and who is very largely concerned in the development of its general prosperity; the other is the tenant, whose position it is desirable to simplify as much as possible, in order that he may be able to devote the whole of his resources and his capital, if he thinks fit, to the prosecution of his trade. But if you once adopt this principle to which I am referring, you cannot retain these two classes upon the land; the man who becomes a mere annuitant loses all general interest in its prosperity.”—[3 Hansard, cxcix. 1848.]

The principles the right hon. Gentleman was there alluding to were free sale and

fixity of tenure, and he (Mr. Fitzpatrick) would confess those words were quite sufficiently sweeping in their condemnation. He had very ably also pointed out the dangers of free sale, now that a tenant could not employ his capital in benefiting his farm if he had used it in buying up the interest. And, finally, he proved that the existence of two persons on the land was impossible, once they had made the landlord an annuitant only. As that was effected by the Bill now before the House, all Irishmen who owned property must come to the conclusion that it was the object of the Government to get rid of them in a body. He had no doubt the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) and his satellites were satisfied with that issue; but they, even, did not seem to consider the Bill clear on that point. Why, might he ask, was there all that beating about the bush? If the State wished to get rid of the landowners of Ireland, compensate them, and let them go; but do not let it be said they were driven out by legal fraud and Ministerial trickery. Why, even a Railway Company gave compensation for what it took, and also for the rights it invaded or confiscated. Could it be that the State of Great Britain was more niggardly than the Railway Companies, whom it forced to pay for what they appropriated? But, even supposing the owners expropriated, what was to be done with the labouring classes, numbering 1,444,700 souls? Were they to be left to the tender mercies of the new peasant proprietary? Anyone who knew the rural districts of Ireland was well aware that the only permanent labour given was that of the owners of large farms and proprietors. The average tenant farmer never employed anyone except as a servant boy, and even him not permanently. If they swept away the landowning class and put in their places the peasant farmers, they would not only be doing an injustice to that class, but they would have, in after years, two evils to content with—either a famine, and rates at 12s. in the pound; or else a further agitation, and most violent feuds between the labourers and the peasant proprietors. Even during last year, owing to the unsettled condition of the country and the enforced absence and poverty of many owners, the labouring population was in a wretched condition. No class in Ireland except the landowners took an interest in the labourer; he was of no value to the agitator or priest, as he had neither vote nor money; and he was a continual source of annoyance to the farmer, being often a burden on the rates in winter, while in summer he naturally exacted the highest wages he could command. He could not here help expressing astonishment that no provision had been placed in the Bill to deal with the labourers' case; and he hoped before the second reading was over they would have a distinct undertaking from the Ministry on the point. He thought that everyone was agreed that some definite explanation for the introduction of the unjust Clause 1 and its conjunctive clauses should be made by Her Majesty's Government before the Bill was read a second time; and he confessed that unless some definite assurance was given that, in Committee, compensation clauses would be inserted to meet the injustice done to landowners by the clause, he should, to the utmost extent, oppose the second reading. He could not but say that there were many points in the Bill which met with his approval, and which, though radically opposed as they were to all laws of political economy, and though the Bill was completely opposed to the Bill of 1870, and not an amendment to it, as suggested by its promoter, still there was much in it that might prove of value if it was carried out in the proper spirit. Referring to Clause 1, he found that no allowance was made for the fact that many landlords had persistently prohibited tenant right on their estates by freeing every incoming tenant from any claim by the outgoing tenant out of their own pockets. They had done the improvements in many instances themselves, over £3,000,000 having been spent by landlords on improvements since 1840. They had kept their rents low for years in order that their tenantry might be thriving and prosperous. They had been acquitted, in the Prime Minister's own words; and yet, in the same breath, he mulcted them of a large portion of the value that their toleration, their kindness had conferred on the farms and their occupiers. He did not understand that injustice, unless it was that, in the hurry of compilation, a compensating clause was omitted. Let him take an example from an estate which he was best acquainted with in Ireland, and where he could produce documentary evidence to support what he said. The owner of an estate had expended in improvements during 40 years upwards of £25,000, and he had never charged interest or extra rent, except since the Act of 1870, and then only in about 10 cases out of 336 tenancies. He had paid in cash £16,000 to compensate tenants for improvements made by them, and to assist in emigrating outgoing tenants, so that no system of sales of tenancy might creep in. Lastly, out of 336 tenancies he had not raised the rent, except in 12 cases, during the last 20 years. The total value of that increase was £321 2s. 5d. out of an estate roughly estimated at £17,000 per annum. The owner had, as he had before said, never permitted the sale of interest by the outgoing tenant to the incoming one, as he had always considered it better for the farmer to have the capital in his own pocket instead of in that of a man who was off to America or the Colonies. Here they had the instance of a landlord who, to the best of his ability, did his duty. He had improved and reclaimed, and had never rack-rented. Now, what would be the result if this Bill became law as it now stood? Every farthing the owner had spent as capital invested in the land would go into the tenant's pocket, unless he chose to raise his rents or to force a sale under the Bill to obtain the value of his improvements. To exemplify his protest, he would take one case out of the 336 tenancies as it would stand under the Bill. A was the tenant, B the owner. A, the tenant, had held for 20 years, from 1860, at same rent. B, the landlord, at some period, say five years after the tenancy was created, provided A with improvements, buildings, drainage, &c., to the amount of £200. A enjoyed the interest of that £200 for 15 years at 5 per cent—say £150—and he held the land at the same low rent. This Bill becomes law. B, the owner, must either raise A's rent, which he may not desire to do, having no wish to disturb the friendly relations that have existed; or, what was worse, he might have to force a sale on A to obtain value for his improvements—£200. But, suppose no change were made, and things should go on as they were, then A, the tenant, might at any time sell his interest—namely, the £150 or more pound's worth which had accrued on the farm from B's moderation and good-feeling as to an owner's duties and rights. This was a particular case. Now, take the effect generally on the 839 estates tabulated by the Land Committee, where improvements had been done by owner and tenant; and on the 200 where improvements had been done by owner exclusively, making a total of 1,039 estates in all, with an area of 4,861,881 acres. To this could be added 466,610 acres, being estates of gentlemen who were known to do improvements, and to be kind landlords, such as Lords Fitzwilliam, Powerscourt, Monck, Portarlington, and others. This made a total of 5,228,491 acres, or over one-fourth of Ireland, in which owners had executed improvements. Rather a different result from the one-tenth, as stated by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. Again, if they added to that the uncultivated land—4,630,000 acres—they found that, roughly, one-half of Ireland was represented in the tables. Numbers of estates were not returned which might be managed admirably; and, as town parks, residential farms, demesnes, and pastoral holdings for one year and under were omitted, he had no doubt that the case could have been made more powerful than it was if all those types had been included. In any case, he would merely refer for his argument to the 4,861,881 of which they had data, and on which improvements had been made by the landlords in the majority of instances, and by tenant and landlord combined in some others. Next, he took the acreage on which rents had not been raised for 20 years. According to the same tables, that was on 3,500,000 acres. If he added to that the same estates as before, which was quite fair, from everyone's personal knowledge of those landlords, they found that on 3,966,610 acres, or, roughly, one-fifth of all Ireland, the rents had not been raised for 20 years. Taking £1 per Irish acre as a low rent, and 30s. as an average letting rent, not a competition rent, they found that for 20 years at least the tenants on 3,473,098 acres had been benefiting to the extent of 10s. per acre for 20 years, making a total value of £1,736,549. That was merely the result on the few estates scheduled by the Committee; but how many millions it meant all over Ireland it was impossible to calculate, there being 19,000 owners of land in Ireland. Those millions, whatever the amount, were handed over directly to the tenant by the Bill. Then, if they took the two classes of estates together—namely, those where rents had not been raised for 20 years, and where improvements had been made at large by the landlord, and, to a certain extent, by the tenant—they could prove conclusively the injustice and spoliation of the measure as it now stood. But some might say that the owners on those estates might have raised their rents, and that it was their look-out now if they lost the value. Well, that sounded to him a very queer argument. Because a man had done his best to help into a solvent and peaceful condition a country such as Ireland was 40 years ago, struggling out of misery and famine, and because he had denied himself and sacrificed his capital and his lifetime to insure that issue, they now, when the true pressure of poverty was gone, except in the far West and South, and merely acting under the coercion of lawlessness, penalized and fined that man, and forced him, by their Bill, to adopt a different course of action, or to expatriate himself from the country to which he had devoted all. He said they forced him, because, by the action of the Bill, the issue on estates of that type must be as follows. He would take the case of a holding where the tenant had given assistance in improvements, but where the owner had done the actual building and drainage, and had not raised the rent for 20 years or added interest. If the owner, finding that all amenities between landlord and tenant were done away with by the Bill, determined to raise his rent to the new judicial value, not a competition value, he was placed in one of these utterly unfair conditions by Clause 3. Under sub-section 1, supposing the owner desired to raise his rent and the tenant accepted the increase of rent, the rise in the rent might cover, in a retrospective manner, the interest on the improvements made by the owner; but at any time during the statutory term, 15 years, the tenant had the right to sell the interest in his holding—that was, he could sell the value of the money the owner had left in his hands for 20 years; he could sell the difference between the actual low rent paid for 20 years and the rent that might have been obtained.

But supposing the tenant did not accept the increase of rent, but sold his interest, what happened was this—He received the full value of the owner's money left out on the farm for 20 years, owing to the fact of its being a low rent, and, should the Court think fit, they could fine the owner 10 years' value of the increased rent he had demanded. That was, to his mind, the worst case. Then, supposing that the tenant did not sell, and did not accept the increased rent, but demanded compensation for disturbance. What was the effect? To show it clearly, he must refer to his first case. There the owner had a farm valued at over £100—say £150; he had effected £200 worth of improvements, had not raised rents during 20 years, and had not charged interest. The Court, in deciding the tenant's compensation, deducted, first, the £200 worth of owner's improvements from the compensation due—namely, £450. That was three times the rental, and he would add £50 as improvements made by the tenant, making £500 due to the tenant and £200 due to the landlord. The tenant, therefore, received £300 in cash after he had benefited for 20 years from the low rent asked by the owner, that £300 being in addition to the interest on the money which the owner had left on the farm for 20 years in the shape of a low rent. If that was calculated in the same way as before—namely, £1 per acre low rent, and 30s. the full letting rent, he found that on a farm valued at £150, and of 150 acres area, each acre let at £1, the dead loss was for 20 years £1,400, so that the tenant received that as well as the £300. But supposing that the tenant refused the increase of rent and took the owner into Court. A rent was fixed for 15 years, the improvements he had made were not taken into account, and he had to look forward to the day when the tenant might sell and receive compensation in some shape. The tenant meanwhile enjoyed the interest of the capital sunk by the landlord in the farm for 15 years, at any rate, and possibly for as many more. If that was true British justice and fair play he was much surprised. The people were at present demoralized, and a Court which might have worked pretty well two years ago would not work well now. The cry at present was "Griffith's valuation," and the cry in future might be, "Down

raising his rent. In that respect the Bill appeared to him to be a very one-sided measure; it certainly failed to carry out the arbitration contemplated by Mr. Kavanagh and other Commissioners. The Report went on to say—"We view the affording of such security as necessary," and what that meant was security against the capricious raising of rent; security against capricious evictions; security against the landlord taking advantage of the tenant's improvements; and security against the tenant's greed for land. The disease which prevailed in Ireland, and which had led to the injurious agitation which had prevailed, was a hunger, a greed for land; and, therefore, the security he spoke of in the Report was security against all the things he had just stated. With respect to the "three F's," they had been supported by many witnesses, but by none of them to the extent demanded by the Home Rule Party. It was very much a question of degree. The "three F's" might mean a great deal or very little. They might mean no rents or low rents, perpetuity of tenure, and perfect Parliamentary freedom to the tenant to do what he pleased with his land. On the other hand, the "three F's" existed already in the relations between English landlords and tenants. The tenants held at fair rents, they had fixity of tenure during the term of their leases, and they were entitled to something beyond the value of the improved rent they made the land worth by their capital and industry. The "three F's" had frightened a great many people; but they were not, he thought, so very formidable after all, when qualified so as not to do injustice to either party. But the "three F's" provided by the Bill went far beyond the recommendations of the Richmond or the Bessborough Commissioners, and even beyond what Lord Carlingford recommended, and that noble Lord was Chief Secretary for Ireland at the time of the passing of the Act of 1870, and in doing so it created a difficulty in the way of those who desired to assist the Government in this matter. The right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) spoke of the safeguards which the Bill provided; but he had not enlightened the House as to what those safeguards were. No attempt had been made to explain what the safeguards really consisted of, although the question had been asked from each corner of the House. Again, the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the "concessions" made by the Bill to the tenants. The Bill could make no concessions. What it did was to compel the landlords to make concessions, making them give up what they were unwilling to yield without some compensation. Later on the right hon. Gentleman said—

"The Bill is intended to guarantee to the tenant the value of his improvements, and that he should have a certain security in the defined value of his holding."

Why, that was the very thing as to which for seven nights the House had been asking an explanation. The security was uncertain and undefined at this moment. The brilliant speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister left them just as much in the dark as they were before. He (Mr. Rodwell) had been occupied a great many years in construing Acts of Parliament, in preparing clauses, and in dealing with clauses; but if asked his opinion as to that part of the present Bill, he confessed that his opinion would be worth nothing. The fact he had stated he could assure the Government created a difficulty in the minds, not of the opponents of the Bill only, but in the minds of its supporters as well. Tenant right was the turning point of the Bill, and on this point it was worth while referring to something which had been written by the Postmaster General in his treatise on political economy. He said that the whole question of justice or injustice, as regarded anything more than the remuneration of the outgoing tenant for any improvement he had made, turned upon the consideration whether the goodwill of the occupation belonged to the landlord or the tenant; and he added—"We think it is the sole property of the tenant." What did the right hon. Gentleman think of the tenant right proposed by the Bill? It was not defined; it was not pretended it was goodwill; it was an undefined something, an additional value to the property which might be owing to other causes than the capital or the exertions of the tenant; and the learned Professor said it belonged to the landlord and not to the tenant. One reason why he could not support the

Mr. Rodwell

Bill was that he could not support the provisions as to fair rent. He agreed with Lord Carlingford that in fixing a fair rent the Court should consider the buildings, fences, and other permanent improvements provided by the tenant, and that the Court should also take reclamations into account, unless the tenant had enjoyed them for a period or at a rent which had enabled him to recoup himself. But there was no such indication of fair rent in this Bill; and the late Attorney General for Ireland had discussed this question, adducing figures to show the injustice of the proposal which had never been met or grappled with. As to free sale, all the witnesses before the Commission broke down when they were pressed to support unlimited free sale, and, at the same time, justify the limitation of the rent which the landlord could get from a tenant. Professor Baldwin struggled hard, but ineffectually, to support his position on this point, and Major Robinson disagreed with the contention of Professor Baldwin. The point had not been sufficiently discussed in this debate. If it was wrong to encourage the landlord's greed by allowing him to extort what rent he could, how could they justify encouraging the tenant's greed by allowing him to sell the goodwill at a preposterous price? The system could tend only to make the worse form of rack rents, and to tempt tenants to borrow money from usurers at ruinous interest. Such a system was injurious to every interest; and, therefore, he thought the provisions as to free sale were the most objectionable part of the Bill. With these in it, he could not vote for the second reading. No doubt, there was land in Ireland which was not cultivated, or only partially cultivated, which would employ and feed a part of the population; and, though the Bill did not do all that might be desired to promote this object, it ought to have a chance of being made acceptable in Committee. There was evidence from a great number of landlords that some Bill was a necessity, and that legislation must take place. None could defend or wish to promote such relations of landlord and tenants as were admitted to exist in the case of the Portsmouth estates. Lord Portsmouth did not live on the property; he did not discharge the duties nor exercise the rights or privileges of a landlord; and when things were reduced to this state, and the landlord became a rent-charger, the sooner a sweep was made the better. The Prime Minister, in introducing the Land Bill of 1870, had loudly protested against such a calamity. The Bill ought to amend such conditions, and it ought not to bring them about. He could not shut his eyes to the gravity of the occasion. He would not take upon himself the responsibility of putting any impediment in the way of the Bill being read a second time; but he could not vote for the second reading. Free sale had been one of the causes of the mischief specified by the Richmond Commission, and he was asked to say it was to be one of the remedies; that was an inconsistency he could not be guilty of. He would endeavour to assist in amending the Bill in Committee, and in providing some of those safeguards to protect the interests of landlords which were hinted at in the first speech of the Prime Minister, but were not to be found in the Bill.

DR. KINNEAR said, he was anxious to put before the House what he believed to be the impression in Ireland in regard to this Land Bill, which was designed to remedy the evils from which Ireland was now suffering. They were all aware in that House that the demands for legislative reform of the Land Laws of Ireland had been very loud and very long; but now that this Land Bill had been introduced into that House there was a measure of satisfaction over the entire of Ireland, and especially over that portion of Ireland with which he was best acquainted. He shared in the feeling of gratification which was felt in Ireland at the introduction of the Bill, because he was fully persuaded that the peace and prosperity of Ireland entirely depended upon the legislative adjustment of this question. Intimately acquainted as he was with Ireland, he would go further, and say the firm conviction of his soul was that the loyalty of Ireland depended upon the legislative adjustment of this question. It had been no ordinary call with regard to the necessity of this Bill. Landlords and tenants in Ireland could not be left to settle this question among themselves. He could testify that the universal consensus of opinion in Ireland was favourable to legislation. He had been privileged to hold conversations with large numbers of intelligent gentlemen of the tenant farming class, and he had been privileged to attend some conferences upon the Land Question, and especially upon the question of this Bill, and in these conferences they enjoyed the fullest and frankest of thoughts and sentiments. He had had the honour of receiving a large number of letters from all parts of Ireland suggesting improvements, and suggesting where provisions might well be left out, and he was in a position to testify to the universal consensus of opinion in that country in favour of this Bill. It was desirable that there should be something like unanimity within the walls of the House, that they might frame the Bill when it got into Committee in accordance with the wants and requirements of Ireland. He had looked into this Bill with considerable attention. He had not been able to look at it with a legal eye as many hon. Members in that House had been able to do; but with the light of his own understanding he had looked at it from the standpoint of humanity. He had carried into the study of this Bill his feelings of common sense, and he had come to the conclusion that the Bill was framed in the most generous spirit, and that it honestly aimed at a full and adequate settlement of this question for Ireland. It was seen that this Bill had not met universal acceptance out-of-doors. What Bill ever brought into the House had ever received universal acceptance out-of-doors? One thing they knew—that it incorporated a principle of vast importance to Ireland, and it was a principle which formulated concessions of unquestionable value. He looked upon the Bill as one of the best boons that Parliament ever conferred upon oppressed Ireland. Now, he would not conceal it from himself, nor should he conceal it from that House, the conviction of his mind that there were defects in the Bill, and that some portion of the machinery was exceedingly cumbrous in its operation. There was a general desire from Ireland that when this Bill got beyond its present stage and into Committee all these difficulties would be more or less removed. There was very general satisfaction over the entire Kingdom of Ireland that these principles for which they had been so long contending were in some measure recognized by this Bill—that they had attained the prominency to which they had now reached, standing at the forefront of the practical politics of the day, patronized by a strong Government, and sympathized in by the whole Liberal Party of the British Empire. It was a compliment to the inhabitants of Ireland that all these principles conveyed in the term commonly known as the “three F’s” were in some measure recognized by this Bill. He should not enter into a discussion of the Bill at that hour, but would merely refer to the general satisfaction which was felt in Ireland over the facility that would be afforded by this Bill for the extension of the Bright Clauses of 1870 and the great principles of peasant proprietorship, which had been looked forward to with such great anxiety throughout Ireland; and there was a hope expressed that when this Bill got into Committee the Government would be induced to grant where required the whole of the purchase money, so that the peasant might arrive at this happy and triumphant stage. The tenant right already recognized by the Act of 1870 ought to be sufficient security for lending where required the whole of the purchase-money. He was opposed to the emigration clauses, and advocated migration from densely populated centres to unreclaimed lands, for the advantage of such a course to the British Empire would be indescribable. Thousands of homes would be created in this way, peasant labour would be utilized to a large and profitable extent, the national wealth would be largely increased, and he was convinced of it that the theory of an almost periodic recurrence of famine would be exploded. He regretted that in the Bill there was no attempt to deal with absentee landlords, who were draining the country of its thousands of the hard-earned savings of the people. He also regretted the absence of all reference to the London Companies and the anomalous position they occupied in Ireland, and begged to intimate that he would call attention to that subject in Committee on the Bill.

SIR JOSEPH M’KENNA said, he would admit that the Bill was framed with benevolent intentions towards the Irish tenant class, and not without a statesmanlike view of their case; but he denied that the Bill was adequate to the occasion, because it contemplated no subsidy whatever from the State to carry it into effect, while it purported to deal with the rights, without trenching on the pecuniary interests, of the landlords. What he complained of was, that the Bill did not trench upon the rights of the landlords sufficiently to settle the question, and did not compensate the landlords for rights it took away—a thing which ought to be done for the sake of the tenants themselves. He regarded this Bill pretty much as he would a Bill in Chancery designed for the protection of one party at the expense of another, and promoted by a third, who was the real offender; but who came forward, without any tender of restitution on his own part, with a scheme of settlement to get rid of disturbance. He would not speak in enigmas. The real offender in the case of Ireland was the English Government, not the present Administration, but the English Government in its wide and permanent sense, which left out of account altogether that it was bound to make restitution. By means of a fiscal system at once insidious and oppressive, it had, within the last 30 years, drained away from Ireland unjustly £3,000,000 a-year more than the proportion which Irish taxation ought to bear to the taxation of Great Britain. The sum in excess of her fair quota absorbed from Ireland during the last 30 years amounted to three times more than would suffice to settle this question on principles which would commend themselves to every just and impartial man in Ireland. Ireland was almost wholly an agricultural and a pastoral country, and all the burdens that had to be borne by her must come from the produce of her soil and the industry of her inhabitants. The amount which remained for the support of the tillers of the soil and the profits of industry could not be more than the value of the produce minus the amount carried away for rent and taxation. The radical difficulty and unsoundness at the bottom of the Irish Land Question was one of Imperial misgovernment. Yes, he repeated, the evil was one of Imperial misgovernment. Misgovernment by misadventure and from ignorance, he was prepared to admit, and not misgovernment of conscious tyranny. He would explain the case as it appeared to him. The difficulty on the surface was that the landlords of Ireland, under the terms of lawful contracts, in a considerable number of cases, claimed from their tenants higher rents than the tenants could afford to pay; and the exactions of the landlords, enforced by eviction or legal proceedings of some kind, were resisted by the tenants as inequitable, and opposed to natural justice. That was the difficulty on the surface. There was this also—sometimes the rent demanded was too high, but was not quite impossible of payment. The law, as it stood, said to the tenants—"You must pay your rent according to your contract, or give up your holding should the landlord desire it." This Bill proposed to meet such cases, and said there should be in future a new valuation, a new tenure, and a judicial rent superseding contract. He should observe this Bill would be wholly illusory if it did not, in a large number of cases reduce the rents which the landlords had been heretofore receiving, and might receive again except for the passing of this law. If they could convince the Irish people that the effect of the Bill would be merely to raise some rents and to lower others a little, and to give security of tenure for 15 years, subject to a new valuation, the Bill would not have found so good an acceptance as it had. A great deal more must be done for the tenants or the Bill would be no settlement at all. But, whatever they did for the tenants, if they trenched on the rights of the landlord, they ought to compensate him in some way for the rights they took away. It was probable that the landlords who had not raised their rents since 1852 would find themselves in no difficulty under the Bill, because the rents for 1852 were fixed on a scale of market prices much lower than the market prices at present. But the difficulty they had to contend with in Ireland was this—that, ignoring the process of impoverishment silently going on all the time, landlords had been increasing the rents, and tenants agreeing to pay those enhanced rents, without recognizing the fact that the conditions under which they lived were completely changed in consequence of the enormous additions to the taxation of the country. The valuation of 1852 was expressly based on a schedule of prices. Since that time prices had risen very considerably, as was shown authoritatively by the figures quoted in the Schedule to the Bill introduced by the Chief Secretary for Ireland in the year 1877. While prices were thus advancing, the landlords were raising their rents, solely on the ground that the value of agricultural produce was enhanced; and persons who were not conversant with the statistics of Irish taxation might ask why that did not afford a sufficient reason for the action of the landlords. He wished to settle that question, and, at the same time, to show that the English Government was the real defendant in the case. The apparently anomalous fact that the value of land had not risen simultaneously with the rise in the prices of agricultural produce was due to several causes. Everyone knew that a heavily taxed people were not able to pay very high rents, and it was equally notorious that the taxation of Ireland had enormously increased in the last 30 years. In fact, so greatly had it grown during that period that if the whole Imperial taxation of the country were converted into Income Tax, the amount would be 5s. 3d. in the pound, whereas a sum of 2s. 7d. in the pound in Great Britain would discharge the entire taxation. That was a grievance that had nothing to do with ancient wrongs and bygone days of oppression, but had grown up altogether in our own times. Actually within the last 30 years, the taxation of Ireland had been increased per head of the population in the proportion of 120 per cent, though the real increase was 75 per cent, the diminution of the population accounting for the difference for the remainder. On the other hand, the taxation of Great Britain had been reduced during the same time by 6 or 7 per cent. To put the case more cogently, the proportion of taxation that a country could bear was absolute, and not relative. The 2 rupees paid per head in India weighed more heavily on the population of that country than would the same amount on the people of France or Great Britain. And so, with respect to Ireland, the actual taxation of Ireland was not greater than that of Great Britain, but relatively it was quite as great. In order to take a proper view of the country in the present day, it was worth while to notice the normal taxation as far back as the year 1841. A Parliamentary Return epitomized his argument, and showed that in 1841 the taxation per head of the population of Great Britain was £2 9s. 9d.

Sir Joseph M'Kenna

and of Ireland 9s. 6d. Between 1841 and 1851 the great Famine occurred, and the population was very much diminished. The taxation during that decade remained about the same. In 1851 it rose to 12s. 2d. per head of the population, and he did not complain of that; but in 1861 it advanced to £1 2s. 1d., and in 1871 to £1 6s. 2d. During that period the taxation had been greatly reduced in Great Britain. In consequence of the increase of taxation in Ireland, the tenants were unable to pay their rents. The gross revenue raised by taxation in Ireland, which was less than £4,000,000 in 1841, had risen to upwards of £7,000,000 in 1871. The only reason why he had ever advocated a separate Parliament for Ireland on the Federal principle was that he believed it was impossible, in the absence of some system of Home Rule, to make a fair distribution of the means of the two countries. But the Government did not propose to review the system of taxation in Ireland. Instead of doing so, they affirmed what was not the fact, for they affected to say that this was a question between landlord and tenant. When the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster found travellers weary and stricken who had fallen among thieves, he did not treat them as the good Samaritan; he did nothing for them, not even giving them 2d. in the way of a loan. He contended that if justice was to be done to Ireland, it must be done in such a manner as to administer the taxes raised in Ireland just the same as if there existed an Irish Parliament. No matter how the subject was viewed, the same lesson was learned in the end—namely, that Ireland has been impoverished by Imperial taxation. ["No!"] He said "Yes." He maintained it was now the duty of the State to use the means which it had already drawn from Ireland in excess of her fair quota to take largely the landlords' right, and constitute a yeomanry with perpetuity of tenure, a moderate rent, and to indemnify reasonably the owners of property who had to surrender a portion of their inheritance for the public good.

MR. SPEAKER reminded the hon. Member that he must keep to the Question, which was the second reading of the Land Bill.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he would conclude his observations by repeating that, in order to settle the Land Question, the Irish people were entitled to a liberal grant from the British Parliament.

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, during the time I have had a seat in this House I have never felt so deeply the responsibility of addressing the House as upon this subject. I desire to explain in a few words why I and those who act with me think it necessary to vote against the second reading of the Bill. I must, in the first place, make the avowal that it is with some hesitation on my own part that I came to such a conclusion. I know perfectly well that misrepresentation is likely to be made upon the subject—I know the course I have indicated is open to the interpretation that we on this side of the House are not prepared to consider circumstances as they exist, and that we do not consider any legislation necessary. That is a view of which I cannot approve. On the other hand, it seems to many, who entertain, as I do, a strong opinion against both the wisdom and the expediency of some of the fundamental principles of the Bill, that it is more straightforward to vote against it at this stage than to allow it sub silentio to be read a second time under the tacit understanding that we accept it as something which may be turned into an entirely different creation in Committee. The Prime Minister, with a perfect fairness from the Parliamentary point of view, endeavoured to pin those who had spoken against the measure to the terms of the Amendment moved by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho). But I would point out that, under the Parliamentary conditions of the case, there are only three courses open to us—namely, to vote for the Bill, to refrain from voting altogether, a course which, I will venture to say, considering the magnitude of the question, is hardly consistent with decency, or, lastly, to vote against the Bill. I look at the Bill as a measure of administrative reform. I was very much struck with the manner in which the Prime Minister this evening plunged into a defence—or, rather, a repudiation—of the term “confiscation” as applied to this measure. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to find some consolation in the fact that that word has been used on other occasions, and particularly during the passage of the Land Bill of 1870.

Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to ask whether that Bill did, in point of fact, injure the property of the landlord? Well, I will give an answer to that question, and the witness I will call into court is one to whose opinion I believe hon. Gentlemen opposite will give full weight—namely, Judge Flanagan, one of the principal Judges of the Landed Estates Court. In examination before the Select Committee on the Land Act of 1870, Judge Flanagan was asked whether the value of land had risen or fallen since the Act had been passed; and his answer was that, taking price as a test of value, it had not fallen, but that if the Land Act had never been passed it would have commanded a higher price than it actually did, inasmuch as the price of beef, butter, and other commodities had in the interval greatly risen. From that opinion we may draw our own conclusion as to the effect which the present Bill will have upon the property of the Irish landlords. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that if the State found it necessary to take what are termed confiscatory measures, it was no more necessary to give compensation than it was in the case of the Church Patronage Bill which passed into an Act a few years ago. The right hon. Gentleman argued that confiscation in that case took place without compensation having followed; but how do the facts stand? If there was confiscation in the Scotch Church Patronage Bill, compensation was proposed in the clauses of the Bill; and, as a matter of fact, some of the lay patrons availed themselves of that compensation. We have had to-night some important admissions upon the point, in an explanation of which the House has been waiting for seven nights with some anxiety. I am not one of those who believe in what is easy to say and difficult to refute—that the Cabinet has been disunited upon that or upon any other point. I have heard Cabinets spoken of as disunited, which were entirely in accord, and it is difficult to prove such things, except that, in the present instance, we have actually the fact that one Member of the Cabinet has left them upon this measure. I have nothing more to say on that head; but I must call attention to one or two discrepancies with which I could not help being struck in the speeches which have been made during the debates upon the Bill. I think it would have been worth while for the Government to have spent some little time in agreeing upon some common course of argument, so that one Member of the Cabinet should not rest upon one part as the primary element in the Bill, and another upon another part. In the able and lucid speech of the Prime Minister, in which he had introduced the Bill, a great deal was said on the landlord and tenant clause of the Bill, and somewhat less on the clauses relating to emigration and the purchase of their holdings by tenants. This evening the right hon. Gentleman has spoken almost exclusively of the landlord and tenant clause, and referred to the other questions only by a passing allusion. The right hon. Gentleman went on to comment on the 7th clause; but even after the explanations of the right hon. Gentleman it is quite obvious that that clause will require to be cleared up, or at least considerably modified in Committee. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has fallen foul of my hon. and learned Friend the late Attorney General (Sir John Holker) for having said that the Bill is difficult to interpret, and that it has been designedly so drawn. The right hon. Gentleman said that he had never heard of such a charge in all his experience being made against a Government. I observe, however, as a matter of fact, that the right hon. Gentleman did not say that the clause might not have been drawn in a simpler form. I have, however, a sufficiently high opinion of the Government draftsman to believe that he could have drawn the clause in a much simpler form if he had been allowed to do so. The right hon. Gentleman had said that evening that the Government are not proud of the workmanship of that clause of the Bill. It is true that the draftsman might have found himself in many respects hampered by the declarations of the right hon. Gentleman in 1870 in arguments which are still unanswered and unanswerable, and it seems to me that it would not be an unfair compromise if we on this side of the House agree to make no reference to the right hon. Gentleman's speeches in 1870 on the understanding that the Government consent to the modification of the clause. I say that notwithstanding that the hon. Member for County Cork (Mr. Shaw) has said that he has been able to understand the Bill five minutes after perusing it. I am certainly not asking too much to ask, as that clause is to be the charter of the tenant and that by which the course of law is to be guided, that the clause ought certainly to be made perfectly clear, so as to leave as little as possible to the discretion of local Courts. I will say a word on the interposition of a Court in transactions which have hitherto been matters of free contract. I am not a holder of Irish land; but I have, in times past, been connected with property in Ireland, and from the knowledge which I possess I do not think that it would be otherwise than wise that the tenant should have some tribunal to which he can appeal. I think that in many cases it will be wise and right that there shall be a power of appeal to the Court; but what has been said of the Courts to be instituted under the Bill? It is quite true that the right hon. Gentleman told us, as I understood, there are clauses about the Courts which require to be materially altered. All I can say is that it is unfortunate that it was not thought of before the final revision of the Bill, which has gone through so many editions. The Civil Bill Court, as it stands in the Bill, has met with the disapproval of all concerned. One hon. Member said the Civil Bill Court was an old and dishonoured institution, and it failed to do the work of 1870. The hon. and learned Member for Antrim (Mr. Macnaghten) called it unsatisfactory, and said it was not unlikely to wreck the Bill. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) said that make the Court the sole arbitrator between landlord and tenant would be productive of nothing but disaster. But the unkindest cut of all was that the right hon. Gentleman himself came forward and said that under the provisions of the Bill, in many cases, it was intended to give the Civil Bill Court the go-by altogether. Then there is another point in connection with the Courts. I confess that I am one of those who, from personal knowledge of tenants, greatly fear an increase of litigation, though, on the property with which I was connected, we had so little trouble that I have known marriage portions to be assured upon a farm of which the tenant himself had only an annual holding. The tenant, by going into Court, has all to gain, and apparently has nothing to lose. I agree with the hon. and learned Member for Antrim that in many cases it would be wise to give a certificate, if it were possible to do so. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the objections which have been entertained to the refusal of the Government, under the present Bill, to allow landlords to go into Court, and he alluded to the certificate spoken of by the hon. and learned Member for Antrim, to whom we listened with so much satisfaction the other night. As I understand the hon. and learned Member for Antrim, his case is not that in all cases the bringing of cases into Court will be prevented, but that the granting of certificates will enable the proprietor of an estate to give an intending purchaser, so to speak, a clean bill of health for the estate; and, at all events, it will protect any person to whom he may sell his estate from a number of actions. The right hon. Gentleman spoke about safeguards being introduced in Committee, and used other terms of the same sort. I understand that it is possible that when we reach Committee some modifications may be introduced, and that the objection which is entertained to the Courts not being as open to the landlord as to the tenant may be remedied at a future stage of the Bill. I do not wish to take up the time of the House over the very vexed question of the 7th clause. It is a question which really, after all, can be dealt with equally well when the Bill goes into Committee. But it seems to me that some of the arguments which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister has used to-night and on a former occasion are somewhat extraordinary; and they hardly appear, to my simple understanding, to justify some of the conclusions which his superior intellect has drawn from them. Now, what are the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman? He said—

“Before the Land Act of 1870 the tenancy was determinable upon a certain notice at the close of each year, at the sole will of the landlord, and without any other consequence whatever. What the tenant had to assign was so small that the assignment was little worth giving or receiving. But in the Land Act—not, I must own, with a view to fortify the principle of tenant right, but simply with a view to defend the tenant in possession of his holding and to render it difficult for the landlord capriciously to get rid of him, we proceeded to enact a scale of compensation for disturbance, without which the tenant could not be removed. That being so, a valuable consideration was, by the Act of 1870, evidently tacked on to every yearly tenancy in Ireland.”—[Hansard, cclx. 902.]

That was very much the case, and a still more valuable consideration is now being again tacked on. The right hon. Gentleman goes on to say—

“And under the Act of 1870, whether we intended it or not, tenant right has become something sensible and considerable.”—[Ibid.]

Therefore, because you gave the tenant a right which you disowned at that time, and which you say you did not intend to give, or did not know that you were giving, and which the right hon. Gentleman, in the most distinct terms, disclaimed in 1870—because I say that right has been given, it is upon that ground, says the right hon. Gentleman, that you have established a right—it is a right that belongs to the tenant for ever, and it must now be deducted from the rights enjoyed by the landlord. My opinion certainly is that, as was said by the hon. and learned Member for Antrim, if you make your addition wrong and your subtraction afterwards, you are not likely to come to a generally accurate result; and I confess that I believe that if you go on with this process of subtraction the interests of the landlord will, in the end, be very greatly depreciated. I do not know whether I correctly understood the right hon. Gentleman; but I think he said that this is not by any means parting with the interest of the landlord. He said that the landlord might at any time resume the property. So he can resume it in the same way that he could go into a shop and resume any article that he saw there—namely, by paying for it. I may have read the Bill wrong, and, if so, I hope to be put right; but I confess I do not see that this resumption is a resumption unaccompanied by a money payment. Then the right hon. Gentleman says that the excess of the tenant right is provided against by the Bill. But, on the other hand, he says that the excess of tenant right is so provided against by the Bill that there is no fear of its unduly depressing that part of the property which may belong to the landlord, or producing the dangerous consequences which some hon. Gentlemen apprehend. But we have to consider, not what the right hon. Gentleman thinks or intends, but what is to be the interpretation of the Bill; and my right hon.

[Seventh Night.]

and learned Friend the late Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson) showed clearly enough that any lawyer called upon to pledge his professional reputation would tell us that this must be read in connection with other clauses, and that under Clause 7, sub-section 3, the Court, whether it pleased or not, would be obliged to take into consideration the interest of the tenant, and would be bound by the regulations of the Bill. There is another argument which I must notice in connection with this part of the Bill, and I beg the pardon of the House for being obliged to go into it at such great length at so late an hour. The right hon. Gentleman said there were two things which constituted the tenant right—there were the tenant's improvements, and there was also, as part of the tenant right, the excess in the price of bidding; and he instanced that by saying that land was in the position of a rare or very valuable commodity, and that the price given for it might be far greater than the intrinsic value. But the right hon. Gentleman, to the best of my belief, did not attempt to sustain, and did not sustain any reason whatever, why, in the case of an inherently rare and valuable commodity, you are to take away from the owner some part of the price which its rarity may have assigned to it. I wish now to say one or two words with regard to another subject upon which the right hon. Gentleman said a little—namely, the increase in the number of proprietors. That is a subject which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland gave comparatively little prominence to. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, following the lead of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, put it only as a secondary consideration of the Bill; but the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India put it as a point of vital importance; and, as far as I understood it, the whole speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was directed towards it. I think the House will agree with me that nothing could be more striking than the general concurrence of opinion there has been in the course of the present debate that it is wise to increase the number of owners of land in Ireland. To that doctrine we on this side of the House give as cordial an assent as you do yourselves on the other side, provided only that the increase is brought about by natural growth, and not by a violent disturbance or a violent political change. This is neither the place nor the time to discuss the direct or relative advantages of large and small farms. All I can say is, that in my own district, with which, I believe, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is pretty well acquainted—in the northern parts of Lancashire, Westmoreland, and Cumberland, there are a good many of the occupiers who are called "statesmen"—yeomen who hold their land by as good and as old a title as any Gentleman who has a seat in this House. Now, I am not one of those who wish to see the ownership of property divided into the proprietorship of house to house, and of field to field. Nor do I think that it is desirable, on economical grounds, that all the small properties should be absorbed by the larger and greater owners; but, as a matter of fact, and I regret it deeply, that these "statesmen" in the North of England are slowly but certainly disappearing, finding, as they do, that by embarking in trade and commerce they can realize 7 or 10 or 15 per cent upon their capital; whereas they find that by devoting themselves to the cultivation of the land they can only gain 1 or 2 per cent. It is said that this is a step in the direction of free trade in land. My right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) says that when peasant proprietors are created there will be an absolute free trade in land; and the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, as far as I understood them, went to the same extent. But is that the case? Not at all. As I read the Bill, you do not propose to exempt the new purchaser from any of the fetters or conditions you intend to attach to the ownership of land. It is perfectly true, as was described by the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand), that the Bill places restrictions upon the owners of land in respect of all but what they may choose to occupy themselves. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, speaking upon this matter the other night, disposed, in a few sentences, of the nonsensical idea that there could actually be a peasant proprietorship created without the proprietorship determining, in some instances, into a landlord ownership. Then, as to this free trade in land, after all, where is it? You are doing away elsewhere with copyhold. It is thought that it is not for the advantage of the public, and of the general good, that a copyhold tenancy should prevail. But although there is a Bill now before the House, and attempts have been made in past years to abolish these tenures, what are you doing by this Land Bill? You are really creating a more stringent and a closer copyhold in Ireland than any of those you are proposing to get rid of in England. Then, it appears to me that those who use the argument of free trade in land fail altogether in their propositions. To my mind, it only shows how the principles of political economy can be thrown aside at convenience in order to meet the political emergency of the moment. I will go now to another point. I have said that there was a certain amount of difference of opinion between Members of the Cabinet—I do not say that there actually was, but there appeared to be—as to the relative importance of the provisions of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, as we know, laid stress on the landlord and tenant portion of the Bill, and another Minister attaches great importance to a peasant proprietary. But the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India appears to take an entirely different view of the question, and we are obliged to look into these various opinions in order that we may have the greatest amount of light thrown upon the real intentions of the Government in bringing forward the Bill. In the course of an investigation which I made for this purpose, I came across a speech delivered recently by the noble Lord on a political occasion at the Fishmongers' Hall. The noble Lord said, in the introductory part of his remarks, that he had intended to excuse himself from attending the dinner—that he had not intended to go there—and, as far as that is concerned, I dare say from the comments which have since been made upon his remarks that long before this debate closes he will wish that he had not been induced to change his original intention. Now, the noble Lord, as we all know, always speaks to the point. He does not speak without consideration, and if there were anything to make his remarks especially important it was the fact explained by the noble Lord himself that he officially attended the dinner on that occasion as one of the Representatives of the Government in the unavoidable absence of the Prime Minister. The noble Lord, therefore, speaking in his capacity as a Member of the Government at a dinner of his political friends, and this great question occupying public attention at that moment to the exclusion of everything else, made use of these words—

“The evils of Ireland are too deep seated to be removed by any changes in the relations between the landlord and owner and the occupier. We believe, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy has so constantly urged that these evils will never be effectually removed until there has been established a great increase in the number of holders of property in Ireland, until the vast disproportion between the owners and occupiers has been somewhat diminished, and until a larger number of occupiers are placed in a position that would give them some participation in the rights of property.”

The noble Lord went on to say, in which I entirely agree with him, that our first object should be to do all in our power to enable the Irish people to become to a greater extent proprietors of the land, and that it is to such modes of legislation we must look for any ultimate improvement in the condition of Ireland. There are many other matters which require attention; but in the opinion of the noble Lord these are the true remedies to be applied, but it must take some time to carry them into effect, and they cannot be immediate. There is an interval, he says, to bridge over, and he tells us the modus vivendi must be discovered. He adds that Her Majesty's Government have endeavoured by their proposals to submit such a modus vivendi to the consideration of Parliament. According to the noble Lord, the arrangement now before the House is intended to bridge over the interval now subsisting between the landlord and tenant for a certain period. Then, why are we not told at once by Her Majesty's Government why these great proposals are put as the secondary parts of the Bill? I trust the noble Lord will believe me when I ask in no spirit of hostility why, if this is the case, the Government do not take the purchase clauses and the emigration clauses before they take the rest of the Bill? We have heard in general terms that it is intended to make an annual grant to carry out the emigration scheme and to aid in the purchase of estates; but we are told, on the other hand, that the amount of the grant is to be decided by an annual Vote of Parliament. It seems to me that we are left entirely in the dark on the subject, and that the House may be legislating in one direction while the Treasury may be acting entirely in another. Therefore, upon these points I think we ought to have a definite statement upon the matter. I may say, on many grounds, in regard to the purchase of land, that I share the feeling of my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) that it would be undesirable for the Government to undertake such purchase by their own direct agency. I confess that for many reasons I should very greatly prefer that the purchases should be made through the agency of something like a Land Bank. I do not know whether it is either expedient or necessary that I should touch further upon this part of the question; but, speaking generally, I may say that the proposals of the Government at the present moment seem to be somewhat illusory for the reasons I have already mentioned. When the creation of a Land Bank was first suggested the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw) remarked that no Land Bank could have the power of borrowing money at anything like the same rate of interest that the Government could obtain it. But if such a bank had the Government behind it so as to give a guarantee, either directly or indirectly, the money might be borrowed on the security of debentures issued upon property, or might be obtained in the many other ways in which property may be dealt with; and I must say that all I have heard, read, and seen, incline me to believe that there would be no practical difficulty in a bank of the character indicated being able to obtain ample funds, at a comparatively low rate of interest, to enable it to carry out the object of the Bill. There is, therefore, much to recommend the creation of a Land Bank, and certainly some of the arguments which have been stated against it are not of the same force as at first sight appeared. In the course of this debate one thing has struck me very painfully and very forcibly. During all the years that I have sat in this House I have carefully avoided anything in the nature of making a personal attack upon anybody, and certainly I am not going to begin making such attacks now. But I must confess that I was amazed, and almost ashamed to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, in the course of his remarks, make use of arguments which seemed altogether unworthy of him. I could scarcely believe that I had correctly understood the right hon. Gentleman until on referring to the usual sources of information I found that my impression was correct. The right hon. Gentleman was not afraid to import into this discussion—a discussion which his Leader asked the House to consider apart altogether from Party feelings, and as one which affects the interests of the Empire only—the right hon. Gentleman was not afraid, I say, to import into the debate arguments which I have certainly heard of as being used in tumultuous Party meetings, but which I have never heard used in places where questions were calmly deliberated upon—arguments calculated to arouse many angry feelings, which I, for one, had hoped, in the course of this discussion, would have been buried. The right hon. Gentleman did not think it unworthy of him to say, without qualification—

“The vast estates that are held in Ireland are estates that were created mainly at the time, and in consequence of the confiscations of which we read in Irish history.”

We have often heard the general proposition—“Ireland for the Irish,” and we have heard it asserted that Irishmen are the real owners of the soil; but it is convenient to leave out of the question the large number of Irish families who are still among the largest owners of the soil. Let me take a few names which occur to me at the moment. We are told that this Land Question has arisen because the estates have been created only in the manner spoken of by the right hon. Gentleman. But everybody knows that that is not the case. If the right hon. Gentleman is still under that impression, let me ask him if he has never heard of the estates held by the O’Conor Don, Lord Inchiquin, the Knight of Kerry, the families of Kavanagh, M’Dermott, the O’Donoghue, and many others, whose names may be easily made known to persons who care to inquire into the subject. Does he not know that the titles of these families as owners are long antecedent to any question of conquest or confiscation? Does the Land League make any such distinction as the right hon. Gentleman draws? In all the letters that have been written on the subject, and in all the speeches which have been made at public meetings in Ireland, have we ever seen any proposition to exempt from the operation of the Land League those landlords who held such an ancient or indefeasible title? But the right hon. Gentleman goes even further than that. He comments upon the fact of the land being in the possession of owners "who differ in religious convictions from the bulk of the people." But can the right hon. Gentleman really presume to say, in cold blood, that he is prepared to sustain the assertion that the question of religion has anything to do with the matter, or that there have not been just as fierce attacks made against Roman Catholic and Presbyterian landlords as against Protestants, notwithstanding the fact that the right hon. Gentleman is anxious to show that the occupiers of the soil claim a religious connection with Roman Catholics only. The right hon. Gentleman commented at some length upon this matter; but as I do not think his comments ought to go entirely unanswered, I have, to the best of my power, endeavoured to answer them. But the right hon. Gentleman continued his extraordinary statements. He went on to say that—"If you complain that the Bill gives too much to the tenants and takes all that it does give from the landlords, I should make this answer—If, at this moment, all that the tenants have done were gone, and all that the landlords have done were left, that is the sort of map I should very much like to see, for its publication would finish this discussion in five minutes. Well, if that were to take place, if all that the tenants have done were swept off the soil, and all that the landlords have done were left upon it, the land would be as bare of house and barn, fences and cultivation, as it was in pre-historic times."

Surely the right hon. Gentleman cannot have read the very able reports of the Commissioner of The Times, nor can he have read the statements in other newspapers as to the number of landowners who have improved their estates. Has the right hon. Gentleman never seen the pamphlet quoted with great propriety by his leader, the Prime Minister, called "Facts and Figures," in which it is shown from Returns correctly obtained from owners and occupiers, that since 1840, as far as can be ascertained, the amount expended by landlords in the improvement of the land occupied by tenants is not less than £3,500,000? Is he further unacquainted with the fact, and, if so, I will make him a present of the figures, which he will find in the same pamphlet at page 33, that in Leinster out of 608 estates, in 194 the agricultural improvements have been made by the landlords, 202 by the tenants, and 212 conjointly; but of a total number of 1,627 estates, in 839 cases contributions were made both by the landlord and tenant, and in 200 cases by the landlord alone. But in connection with this point an ad captandum argument has been used. It is said that—"Taking from the amount of money spent the sums borrowed by the landlords under various Acts and securities, you will find that they themselves have spent but a very small portion of the whole amount." That is a plausible argument; but it is also true that it is covered by the fact that the tenants have not paid interest on the borrowed money. And, further, if the landlords have contracted loans without charging any additional interest to the tenant, undoubtedly we have a right to claim on their behalf that they have not been backward in effecting improvements. We know of an instance in which out of £30,000, £13,000 only was passed through the private account, the whole of the remainder being spent on the estate; and I am certain that the properties to which I have alluded more than once in the course of this debate have been dealt with in a similar spirit. I know of one case in which an amount, exceeding the whole rental of the property, was actually expended upon it in many years. The question in the minds of many persons stands thus. They say—"We are quite willing to consider fairly this question of tenant security; but, after all, is this measure intended merely to meet the evils which it is proposed to redress, or are you, under the guise of remedial legislation, entering upon a course of political change which you are unwilling openly to avow?" I cannot think the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant can be very much obliged to his Colleague at Bradford, who, the other day, connected so closely the questions of English and Irish land tenure, more especially as we have had it admitted in the course of the debate that there was an essential distinction to be drawn between the English and Scotch and the Irish systems of land tenure, inasmuch as on this side of the water the buildings, and so forth, are almost without exception the property of the landlords.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: The right hon. and gallant Gentleman altogether mistakes my meaning, in saying that I was trying to attach the question of land tenure in England to the Irish question. I said that the settlement of the Irish question was only secondary to the English people as contrasted with the Irish people.

COLONEL STANLEY: I was not present when the hon. Gentleman made the remarks to which I have referred, and I am very glad to hear him now make a public recantation of what has been erroneously attributed to him. We are, on our part, pleased to take note of that fact.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: I made no recantation at all. I simply offered an explanation.

COLONEL STANLEY: I said "recantation of what had been erroneously attributed to the hon. Gentleman." We are now, upon the second reading of this Bill, considering the principles which underlie its action; and I have pointed out, perhaps at undue length, why we on this side are obliged to take a course of opposition to it at this stage. We know that the two main sources of this measure have been the "earth-hunger" and the agitation which has of late been too prominent a feature in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government has said he had every reason to be thankful for the manner in which this Bill had been received in Ireland. But has the spirit in which the Bill has been brought forward been responded to? Has it caused the Land League to diminish one whit of its teaching, or have those who have acted, as they think, in obedience to its commands, abated one whit in their violence? The Government have conceded much to agitation; depend upon it, that agitation will demand more. The right hon. Gentleman asks, will this question ever be settled by a Bill smaller than the present one; and "Echo" from these Benches replies—"or by any Land Bill?" You wish to establish confidence, and you take means that, to a great extent, tend to banish all capital, except that which is tied, from the country. You wish to create ownership, and you deprive it, as one of your ex-Colleagues has shown, of one of its most necessary attributes. The right hon. Gentleman speaks in the spirit of one of the ancients, whom he is so fond of quoting, and seems to say—"Let us go where fortune, kinder than a parent, may take us." He may be prepared to embark on a course that may, to a certain extent, allay agitation, but which can only succeed in attaining that object by drawing a Bill, so to speak, upon futurity, which posterity will have considerable difficulty in discounting. If the right hon. Gentleman does not know to what this course of concession tends, I suspect there are many hon. Gentlemen on the Benches below the Gangway who can tell him. I would venture to say that if this legislation is not conducted upon sound and right principles it must inevitably sooner or later come to naught. The right hon. Gentleman has endeavoured to throw upon us the responsibility which might attend any miscarriage of this Bill, and I think I am rightly interpreting his expressions as applied, not only to a determined opposition, but to an undetermined Party. Hon. Gentlemen on this side were, he said, judges of their own conduct; and he asked us if we were amongst the number of those who were anxious to decline to carry a message of peace to "another place," adding that he looked both to this House and the House of Lords with considerable anxiety for the fate of the measure. He said, however, that the other House had always well considered questions of this kind; and it seemed to me that the sole argument which the right hon. Gentleman left out was that in which he might have asked us, in consideration of the great questions which he believed to be involved in the Bill, to take away all impediment to its course and make it as near as possible perfect, in order that it might be presented in "another place" in its best form. However tardily, it is well to find that the principles of our great Leader now departed are recognized by the right hon. Gentleman. But he added that the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) was the first notice of a change in position which had occurred in this House owing to the death of our late Leader. The great question before us may have presented some difficulties; but, as a humble Member of the Conservative Party, I will not allow that statement of the right hon. Gentleman to remain uncontradicted one moment longer than I can help. I say that with reference to a Party led in this House by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon since Lord Beaconsfield left us for the House of Lords—a Party, united as it is, the right hon. Gentleman was not justified even by implication in the conclusion which he drew. I have endeavoured to point out some of the main objections which I hold to the fundamental principles of the Bill, and why the holding of those objections have influenced me to vote against the second reading. This, however, I would say—nothing is further from the intention of many of us who take this course than the tactics of obstruction or delay which the right hon. Gentleman feared the Bill might meet with in its progress. We agree entirely with him in thinking that the sooner the goal is reached the better, for it is not well that this question should be dangled before the public and made the incessant theme of agitation in Ireland. Nor is it well that by new concessions to public clamour, or undue concession to foregone conclusions or Party prejudice, the measure should be damaged in its progress. Although we have thought it right to protest against the Bill at this stage, I trust that it will meet, when the practical work in Committee is reached, with the same consideration and the same temperate criticism as we have endeavoured to extend to the second reading.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had never risen to address the House with feelings of deeper depression than at that moment. Whatever prolongation of the debate on the second reading had taken place, it was not due to the speeches of hon. Members with whom he generally acted, for they had abstained from intruding themselves in the discussion until the air had, so to speak, been cleared by the sense—or non-sense—which might come from various parts of the House. The opinions he had formed on this Bill, after long and painful consideration, were opinions not merely of a minority of Members of the House, but of a minority of a minority, for he had reason to believe that his views with regard to this measure were not shared by even the majority of Irish Members. Under those circumstances, he must claim particular indulgence from the House, and would endeavour to earn it, by abstaining from a single expression that, by its heat or intemperance, might injure the cause he had at heart. Accordingly, he passed by the many hard, bitter, and unjust things which had been said by both English and Irish Members, not only with regard to himself, but also the action of the Land League in Ireland. He did not believe a Minister had ever introduced to the House a Bill of equal magnitude, or dealing with a problem of greater complexity. The Government had reason to be satisfied with the reception it had met with; for it had been praised alike by Radicals, Whigs, and Ministerialists, and by one of the ablest exponents of Irish Conservatism on that side of the House. It had also received the praises of those Irish Members who were Ministerialists first, and Irishmen a very long way afterwards. An old proverb told them that when rogues fell out honest men came by their own. When he saw Whigs and Conservatives joining together, he thought it was high time for the policemen to look after the pockets of the Irish tenants as affected by this Bill. He was not much affected in his judgment of the Bill by the predictions which came from hon. Members on the other side of the House as to its results. Was there ever an Act ushered into existence amidst so loud a chorus of approval as the Land Act of 1870; and had ever an Act gone to its dishonoured tomb amidst so little expression of even the decencies of burial? All the history of the past legislation with regard to Ireland, all the history of the land legislation that had attempted to regulate the joint interests of landlord and tenant in the soil, all the past examples of history in that respect in Ireland, and in every other country, was a lesson of warning and a beacon to those who had the interests of the tenants at heart; for nothing had been more clearly proved by the history of land legislation than that on paper everything the tenant wanted, or could fairly demand, was given, but that when the Act came into operation the tenant might be left in almost a worse position than he was before. He would not go over the stale ground of the Act of 1870; but he would take the predictions with regard to that Act on three main points. One of the predictions—which came from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the senior Member for the University of Dublin—was that that Act would take £120,000,000 from the landlords and put it into the pockets of the tenants. Another calculation was that the 600,000 tenants in Ireland would obtain £100 each for improvements, and £100 each for disturbance. Those were the predictions; but what were the results? In the three years 1871, 1872, and 1873, the total amount awarded by the Land Court was £461,149; and the average awarded to the tenants was not £100 for improvements and £100 for disturbance, but £27 5s. That was the manner in which £120,000,000 were taken from the landlords and put into the pockets of the tenants. Then it was said by the hon. Member for Tralee, with regard to the effects of the Act of 1870 on evictions—and the hon. Member in the same speech uttered many wise warnings against some defects in the Act, which were not attended to—that if the Bill passed he believed it would be next to impossible for a landlord to evict a tenant, unless he had such reasons for doing so as everybody capable of discriminating between right and wrong would sanction. How tragic was the contrast between that prediction and the 1,060 decrees executed in 1877, the 2,888 decrees executed in 1880, and the 2,500 decrees which, according to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, had been issued at one Quarter Sessions in the present year! He would not go in detail into the other predictions and the contrast between them and the result; but it was said that the Bill would stop rack-renting, and rack-renting had gone on in Ulster since 1870 with a frequency and relentlessness never before paralleled. It was said that the Bill would stop emigration; and last year there was a larger emigration from Ireland than in any of the preceding 26 years. It was said by the Prime Minister that the Bill might reasonably be considered a final solution of the difficulties in Ireland; and here to-day they were face to face with the difficulties in a more threatening and more wholesale manner than in any previous period. Therefore he said there was a yawning chasm between the predictions of 1870 and the realities of 1881. Allusion had been made by the right hon. and gallant

Gentleman (Colonel Stanley) to the very remarkable speech made by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India with regard to the intentions of this Bill. The speech of the noble Lord was far away the most encouraging speech he had heard from the Ministers—it was far away the best speech on this question that had come from Englishmen, because it was the most Land League speech delivered on the question. The noble Lord said the ultimate solution of the land difficulty in Ireland was a peasant proprietary. That was what the Land League said; and the first portion of the Bill, according to the noble Lord, was in no sense a final attempt at solving the question, but was merely a modus vivendi to fill up the interval between the present condition of the tenant and the halcyon period when every tiller of the soil should be its owner. He should like to see those words repeated and emphasized from the Treasury Bench, because, if that was the view of the Government as to the operation of this Bill, it proved that this was a Bill which the Land League of Ireland would be justified in gladly accepting, and nothing would more encourage the Ministers than that the Lion of the Executive Government and the Lamb of the Land League in Dublin should lie down together. The first portion of the Bill was defined by the noble Lord as a modus vivendi. He wished he could accept that definition as accurate. He had so long forgotten the study of the classics that he did not know whether he should be right or wrong; but he should rather call the Bill a modus moriendi for the tenants, and not a modus vivendi. He believed he should be able to clearly prove that, whatever might be the benefit from the Bill to the tenantry, it was a remote thing, but that the injury to the tenant was very clear and very near. What was the position of the Irish tenant? The hon. Member for Roscommon a few days ago put a Question to the Chief Secretary as to whether or not the evidence of the hon. Member for Kilkenny, the evidence of Colonel King-Harman, and the evidence of several witnesses before the Bessborough Commission did not agree in stating that the condition of a large number of the tenants in Ireland at the present moment was a condition of indebtedness which in many parts amounted to absolute bankruptcy. If hon. Members would look through either the Commission over which the Duke of Richmond presided, or that presided over by Lord Bessborough, they would find that both the tenant farmer and the landlord, both the official, like Professor Baldwin, and the active politician agreed in representing that indebtedness as existing. There were three facts acknowledged by everybody. It was acknowledged that the Irish tenants had gone through three bad seasons recently; that a large portion of those tenants would have been face to face with famine but for almsgiving from all parts of the world on a scale of gigantic generosity; and the state of the Irish tenants through their past indebtedness, approaching to bankruptcy, received its final seal of acknowledgment by the introduction last year of a Compensation for Disturbance Bill, the main effect of which was to alter by law existing contracts with regard to rent. Therefore, he called the Ministers themselves to witness. His chief testimony was Ministerial utterances—that the condition of a large number of the Irish tenants was a condition of large indebtedness amounting almost to bankruptcy. His charge against this Bill was that the people for whose benefit the Compensation for Disturbance Bill was brought in last year were left utterly, entirely, and completely unprotected by this Bill. Do not let there be again any of the miserable excuses which the Government gave for their conduct on the Bill of last year. It was their statement that unless they carried that Bill the task of governing Ireland would be difficult, and well-nigh impossible. A large portion of the tenants were threatened with eviction, which, as the Prime Minister had said, came very near to a sentence of starvation. Those amounted to nearly 15,000 in number; and because of the rebuff of another Assembly which they were now trying alternately to bully and cajole—to hold up as a bugbear and a Paradise alternately—the Government left those 15,000 sentences to be carried out, and left the government of the country difficult and well-nigh impossible. And when the Land League took up the work of government which the Government could not fulfil, and gave that protection which the Government could not extend, they were thanked by having their leaders dragged through the mire and the mud. He hoped the lesson of the Compensation for Disturbance Bill would not be lost on the Government; and if, having introduced this Bill, they left the tenants still unprotected, the Irish people would know what to think of the friendliness of the present Government. The tenants were in arrear; and, supposing the Bill passed in its present shape, how did the tenant in arrear stand? The landlord did not find the collection of his rents very easy just now. He would go to the tenant and say—"Here is a Bill given by the Liberal Ministry; by the friendly hands of the First Lord of the Treasury, and by the Chief Secretary," whose humanity was now a bye-word in Ireland. Here was a Bill which was approved of by the hon. Member for the County of Cork, a displaced but still adored leader; here was a Bill approved of by several hon. Members who were supposed to be extreme advocates of the tenants' cause. Surely the tenant could not object to a Bill introduced under such beneficent auspices. The landlord would say—"You owe me three years' rent. You have the right of free sale. Here is this magnificent measure; this final, this generous, this gigantic boon to you and all your fellows. Go into Court and get £30. I will take what you owe me, and the shopkeeper whom you owe for meal will try to take his £30." The solicitor would try to take £2 or £3, and how much of the £30 would remain to the tenant, upon whom this Bill was to confer such benefits? The shopkeeper might make a composition, and the landlord might give up his right of precedence; but all that would be left to the tenant might be as much as would take him to the nearest emigration ship, so that he might leave his home. What, then, was the position of the tenant? It was this—his farm gone, his house broken up, and not a penny left in his pocket. And what was the position of the landlord? The old tenant gone, and a new and a better tenant in his stead; or, if he employed the right of pre-emption, he would have the farm back in his own possession without paying anything for it, because the compensation to the tenant for disturbance would be swallowed up by the arrears. The landlord either took the farm back himself, or gave it to a new and better tenant, and the latter had to pay the compensation for disturbance which, but for this Bill, the landlord would have had to pay. Further, the landlord got payment of his arrears. This magnificent Bill was a magnificent Bill, the good results of which were all on the side of the landlord, while the bad results were on the side of the tenant. Then, with regard to emigration, the tenant would be at a double disadvantage. There would be the landlord shoving him out through what was called "free sale" at the door, and at the door was the emigration agent—under the emigration clause—with a free pass, bidding him go to that land in the West, where an Irishman had some chance of success. So that there was a double agency for eviction going on. What, therefore, did this part of the Bill mean? It meant, with regard to something like 100,000 or 200,000 tenants, eviction, vast, huge, made easy and profitable to the landlord, and expensive to the tenant. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the generous reception which this Bill had received in Ireland. It had received a generous reception; but the generosity had, he thought, rather overcome the prudence and good sense of the people. What made the case in regard to the tenants worse? They were in arrear of rack rent; they were in arrear of rent which was acknowledged by hon. Gentlemen opposite to be an unfair rent. Cases of rack-renting had been given over and over again in the House. In one case the rent was increased at one stroke from £530 to £790 a-year. Professor Baldwin had told them that in the case of one farm on Lord ———'s estate, the rent had been increased by 95 per cent in a few years; in 1860 the rent was £6 10s. 6d., and it was increased, year by year, until in 1869 it was £12 13s. 2d. Now, what were they going to do with a case like this, which was simply one of monstrous injustice? According to the Bill no one was going to be driven out of his house and home because he could not pay an unjust rent. But mark this, they had carefully made, with the exception of one clause to which he would presently refer, the whole effect of the Bill prospective. Hon. Gentlemen talked of compensation to landlords. He could meet them by the claim of restitution to the tenant. But there was nothing about such restitution. The Bill was almost entirely prospective in its operation, because, when the landlord and tenant went to the Court for the purpose of fixing the rent, the rent should be deemed to be rent payable by the tenant from the period of the next succeeding rent day. There was not a word with regard to the past. It was only with regard to the future that the Bill came in, and accordingly the Bill would help the landlords to evict between 100,000 and 200,000 tenants for arrears of rent, the injustice of which the Government themselves admitted. He now wanted to deal with the general facts, and subsection 4 of the famous Clause 7. There were some hon. Friends of his who were under the delusion that this section was going to make a large and general reduction of rents in Ireland. They were under that delusion, in spite of the most express admissions from the Treasury Bench, for when the ex-Attorney General for Ireland stated that the effect of the Bill would be to leave rents pretty much as they now stood, up rose the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to confirm and emphasize that declaration. The right hon. Gentleman said that, in his opinion, in nine cases out of 10, the rent would remain exactly where it was. What was the position he and his hon. Friends took up with regard to the renting of Ireland? It was this—that unless they had a very general and almost wholesale reduction, the tenant farmers of Ireland would be utterly unable to compete with any success, under the changed condition of agriculture with American competition. ["Hear, hear!"] An English Member cheered that observation. Why was that? Because those who represented the agricultural and landed interests had been taught, within the last two or three years, to believe that if the farmers of England were to be able to compete with America they must be required to pay smaller rents; and if lower rents on a large scale be demanded in England, with how much greater force ought they to be demanded in Ireland, where they had no capital but their spade? If any of his hon. Friends were under the impression that this Bill was going to largely reduce rents they could never retain that impression under the words of disillusion which had come from the Treasury Bench. If, intrusted with the interests and hopes of the Irish tenants in his constituency; if, raised by no merit of his own to be one of the executive body of their tenant organization, he were to deceive them with the false hope that they would be saved from eviction, that they would get free sale and have their rents largely reduced, what would be his position when they had had experience of the operation of the Bill? He would be very probably regarded as a deceiver of those who had put trust in him. This Bill conferred no new property on the tenant; it conferred no property on the tenant that was not already acknowledged in the Act of 1870. It provided different machinery for the protection of that property it was true, and the new machinery was no better than the old; in fact, it was the old machinery re-furnished, and no tinkering could make the machinery of the Land Act of 1870 good machinery. It conferred no new property on the tenant. It left the question of the tenant's property in the land exactly where it stood in the Land Act of 1870. The average value of the tenant's property in the land was fixed by the Land Courts under the Act of 1870 at £27 5s., and the Irish tenants might now be rejoiced to learn that the present Bill would not increase that value. [An hon. MEMBER: And after a law suit.] Yes, after a law suit; and this magnificent measure, which was to stop agitation, which was to break the reign of Saturn—he thought he had better say Satyr—this Bill, which recognized the property of the tenant in the soil, valued that property at £27 5s. each. But in order to get this recognition of property in the soil a law suit was necessary. He was delighted to hear the Prime Minister emphasize the fact that law was much more offensive and dangerous to the tenant than to the landlord. The Prime Minister well knew that the tenant was poor and the landlord was rich. What did the declaration of the Prime Minister mean? They would find the declaration would be repeated on many Land League platforms within the next two or three years, because it meant that the tenant, being poor, had been simply impotent against the landlord, and it was only by combination that his poverty could be put upon an equality with the richness of the landlord. He should take care, when he went to any Land League meetings, to emphasize that advice which he had been giving consistently for the last 12 months. Litigation was made absolutely inevitable. What was the evidence of the Commissions on the question of litigation? It was to the effect that a large number of the tenants of Ireland dreaded going to law. It was said the Irish were litigious. His hon. Friend the senior Member for the City of Waterford (Mr. R. Power) told him that in Ireland it was unusual even for tenants to go through the legal process of making a will. The man would get a Poor Law Guardian to draw up his will, it was signed or not, and the whole thing went on by a quiet understanding. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) could say that to the ordinary Irish peasant nothing was more appalling or abhorrent to his imagination than the prospect of litigation; and he boldly asserted that many of the tenants went without, over and over again, compensation for improvement and for disturbance rather than face the uncertain risk of a suit at law before a landlord Judge. He had incidentally alluded to the question of emigration, and had endeavoured to show the House that emigration was a powerful ally of eviction. He wanted to show that emigration was the deadly enemy of migration. There was plenty of work for every Irishman on Irish land, and Ireland was quite able to support a much greater population than she had at present. What did emigration mean? What was meant by a family leaving Connaught for the United States? It meant, from the very lowest point of view, the exportation of the wealth-producing machine. Why was America anxious to get the Irish emigrant, and why was Canada willing to pay his passage? Because they knew that farmers who were brought from Ireland and put there would produce not only his own food, but would also very largely increase the general wealth of the community. Every emigrant who was shipped to America was lost to Ireland. Too many had left already, for there was plenty of land in Ireland on which to employ them. Until the population was congested there was no need to send Irishmen to America or Manitoba. Let them be sent on the 2,000,000 acres of unreclaimed land, and in a few years' time the present waste land of Ireland would be amongst the most productive land in the country. They wanted to break up the grazing farms in Ireland. The lands which now formed grazing farms were lands held from the people. Let the Government give their Commission, as they had the right, power to expropriate these lands at a fair price, and relegate them to the surplus population in Connaught and other agricultural districts. But what was his great objection to emigration? If they were to put emigration in the one, and migration in the other scale, which would overbalance the other? Migration was a difficult process, emigration was an easy process; migration required care, emigration meant that they had only to give the emigrant a ticket and he was disposed of. The temptation to the authorities to get rid of disturbance in Ireland by the short, and summary, and easy process of sending people out of the country was overwhelming. It was evident that the emigration clauses must be struck out of the Bill. They must ask the Government to give their Commission larger powers than it had at present; they must ask the Government to make their plans of migration more definite and better. He did not think they would have much difficulty in getting leaseholders included in the Bill; and they ought to ask the Government to deal at once with the position of the agricultural labourer. They were tired of agitation in Ireland; they wanted some peace, if the English Parliament would let them have it. They did not want any more tempestuous agitation in order to educate the mind of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and accordingly they asked that the Bill should deal at once in a large and generous spirit with the agricultural labourer. These being his views with regard to the Bill, he would be actually stultifying himself if he voted for the second reading. He did not want to say anything unpleasant; but, between the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) and the Amendment of the ex-Postmaster General (Lord John Manners), it was evident confusion and obstruction were in the Conservative camp. The principles of the Bill were principles which no one seriously contested at this time of day. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) had said of the House of Lords—"If you do not pass this Bill, worse will come." They were accused of embarrassing the Ministry; of damning the Bill in the eyes of "another place;" but when the Prime Minister requested them to do nothing to imperil the measure in "another place," he would reply to him that that which did most harm to the Bill came from himself and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. The Prime Minister had said that if the present Ministry were put out of Office, and they were succeeded by a Conservative Ministry, they would have not a small but a large Land Bill. Well, he (Mr. O'Connor) was not a Conservative; he bore no love to the Conservative Party, but, on the contrary, looked on the principles of its opponents—the Liberal Party—as those of progress and humanity. He should regard the accession of a Conservative Ministry as a great misfortune for England and the world generally; but he came there not as an English Member, not as a Member for the Universe, but as an Irish Representative, and it was his duty, his desire, and his intention to watch most carefully the interests of his constituents. There were other people to take care of the interests of England and of humanity. When, therefore, they were told by the Prime Minister that if they could only get him out of his place, and secure the appointment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) in his stead, they would get a better land measure for Ireland, there was a considerable thaw in his principles, and he felt very much inclined to do what he could to assist the Conservatives to power rather than to lend his effort to maintain the Liberals in Office. The Irish people came not here as mendicants asking for the smallest concession, but they came asking Parliament to give its sanction to the conquest that they themselves had gained without Parliament, and in spite of Parliament. What was his duty as a Representative of what were called the extreme views of the Irish tenantry? It was not his conception of his duty to speak the soft sawder of the hon. Member for Cork and of the hon. Gentlemen who went with him. They stood face to face with this grim reality, that either the landlords or the tenants must go down. Neither could survive the struggle. [Loud laughter.] He claimed his right to occasionally vindicate his nationality by making a blunder of that kind; but what he had intended to say was, that both could not survive the struggle. He was an advocate of the eviction of landlords. He agreed with the Secretary of State for India (the Marquess of Hartington) that the eviction of the landlords was the final solution of this question, and he was not going to vote for a Bill which impeded rather than accelerated the final solution as to which he and the noble Lord agreed. He should be making bankrupt the hopes of the Irish tenants, playing false to their interests and betraying their trust, if he told them that this Bill gave them a victory for which victory they had still to fight, and he was more afraid of deceiving them than of offending the present Ministry. He would be no party to bringing them into the Fools' Paradise, where hopes would be excited only to be bitterly disappointed by-and-bye.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

(Mr Attorney General for Ireland.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MAJOR NOLAN said, this Bill was down for second reading for the first time; and, under the circumstances, he believed it was competent for him to block it. He did not wish to block it for himself, but on behalf of the hon. Member for Louth; and he should not continue to do it when the hon. Member, who was at present absent, returned to London. The hon. Member had telegraphed to him requesting him to block the Bill.

MR. P. MARTIN said there were three or four Notices to block the measure.

MR. GORST was sorry it was the desire of some hon. Members to discuss the measure, but hoped they would not persevere in pressing it on. The Bill was only printed on Saturday and delivered this morning, therefore there had been hardly any time to consider it. The matter, altogether, was one of little moment, and should not be brought on for discussion at that hour of the morning—1.30 A.M.—therefore he would formally move the adjournment of the debate, which would enable the Attorney General for Ireland to speak now without interfering with his right to address the House on the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Gorst.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, the measure was identical in terms with the Bill which had already been before the House five times, therefore he thought it was unreasonable to stop its progress on the ground that it was too late an hour to discuss it. If this were the first time the Bill had been submitted to the House, he would not have objected to the course taken by hon. Members; but such was not the case. The subject was introduced by Lord Cairns when he brought in the Irish Judicature Act of 1876; and the noble and learned Lord, drawing a contrast between the Bankruptcy Law of England and Ireland, pointed out that there was a Bankruptcy jurisdiction in every County Court of England, whilst there was only one Bankruptcy Court in Ireland, and said that it was desirable that Bankruptcy Courts should be established in some of the principal centres of industry in Ireland. He thought it desirable that a measure should be passed as soon as possible, and in 1878 the Irish Attorney General brought in a Bill—

MAJOR NOLAN: I rise to Order. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to have your decision on this point. The first time a Bill is put down for second reading, is it not competent for an hon. Member to block it?

MR. SPEAKER: This is an Order of the Day; there is no Notice of Opposition on the Paper, therefore the right hon. and learned Gentleman can go on.

MAJOR NOLAN: It is the first time the Bill has appeared on the Paper.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, the measure was first of all brought in in 1878, again in 1879, next in the first Session of 1880, a fourth time in the second Session of 1880, and now, for a fifth time, it was brought in this Session; whilst the measure had been four times passed by the House of Lords, being approved of by the late and present Lord Chancellors of Great Britain, as well as by the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland. A number of hon. Members representing the commercial centres of Ireland had been anxious to see the measure pressed forward last Session; but there had been the same kind of opposition to it then as there seemed to be now, and at the close of the Session the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant withdrew it, as he (the Attorney General for Ireland) believed, on the understanding that it would be brought in again this Session, read a second time, and referred to a Select Committee. The large Provincial towns of Ireland wished the measure to be passed, and he thought the House was inclined to favour it; and the Government were prepared, directly the present stage was passed, to send it to a Select Committee, as arranged last year. He hoped the House would not yield to the opposition sought to be raised by a few lawyers, who resisted the measure merely on professional grounds.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. P. MARTIN, so far as he personally was concerned, desired to deny that this proposed measure was opposed on professional grounds. He objected to the measure because he believed it wholly overlooked the interests of small traders and farmers in all other places in Ireland except the centres named in the Bill. The Bankruptcy Code in Ireland was in a very confused and unsatisfactory state. A most desirable opportunity now presented itself for the permanent reform of the system in Ireland in the Bankruptcy Bill for England before the House. They ought not to have one Bankruptcy Law for England and another for Ireland; but there should be one complete and perfect Code for the two countries. He (Mr. P. Martin) said that everyone should know that one of the great disadvantages of the Irish law at this moment was that, in point of fact, by the Bankruptcy Amendment Act passed in 1872, the local jurisdiction theretofore vested in the Chairmen of the several counties in insolvency matters was taken away, so that small creditors in the different Provincial towns of Ireland were deprived of the means of recovering debts under jurisdiction analogous to the Law of Bankruptcy. In England there were Provincial Bankruptcy Courts, and he thought that the Attorney General would do well to introduce a Bill which would facilitate the recovery of debts and arrangements with creditors in the several counties in Ireland by conferring on the present County Court Judges a jurisdiction limited in amount and extent. This Bill enforced no such principle. The Government sought to perpetuate an old and vicious system, and, in seeking to do that, they would purchase the silence of Belfast by giving it a local Court of Bankruptcy, and in the same way they sought ingeniously to deal with Cork, and to silence its opposition by giving it, also, a Court of Bankruptcy. But the people of the greater part of Ireland were to be deprived of the means of getting their debts, to please, forsooth, the merchants of Belfast and Cork, with whom the right hon. and learned Gentleman, it appeared, had made some sort of arrangement, for the purpose of facilitating the passing of the Bill. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman's own constituents and the Cork merchants would deem it convenient to have a local Court in which to settle their little difficulties, and to aid them in the process of whitewashing; but he hoped the House would not listen to their one-sided appeal. Let the right hon. and learned Gentleman devote a little of the time at his disposal, either to the preparation of a Bill such as he suggested, so as to extend, for the general benefit of Ireland, such of the provisions of the new Bankruptcy Code as were valuable, and to amend the present complex and confusing Acts in force in Ireland. If a Bankruptcy Act was to be passed its benefit ought to be extended all over Ireland. Therefore, he trusted that the House would not allow this Bill to be hurried through that night, and that it would accede to the Motion he now made.

Mr. BIGGAR said, in rising to second the Motion for the adjournment of the debate, he did not intend to go into the merits or demerits of this particular measure, inasmuch as it had only been delivered to him that morning.

The Attorney General for Ireland

Indeed, he had been informed by one hon. Member interested in the question that the Bill had not even then been delivered to him. For that reason alone, he thought they were fully justified in asking for an adjournment, and that no further Progress be made until there had been time sufficient for full consideration of the measure. He found that the Bill proposed to create a number of new offices out of money to be voted by Parliament. That was a question which concerned both English and Irish Members. Then it proposed to give compensation to certain parties in Dublin for any part of their business taken from them by the operation of the Bill. It seemed to him preposterous that large monetary engagements should be entered into at half-past 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning, without the slightest explanation whatever being afforded by the right hon. and learned Gentleman who moved the second reading of the Bill. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had pointed out that similar Bills had been introduced in former Sessions of Parliament; but he took very great care not to give the least hint to the House with regard to the creation of the new offices which he asked to be created under the Bill. It appeared to him a very curious thing that the House should be asked, as a mere matter of form, to commit itself and the country to a very large expense. He, therefore, cordially seconded the Motion for adjournment.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 —(Mr. Patrick Martin.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that certain representatives of large trading interests in Dublin had waited upon his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland and himself with reference to this subject. They had pointed out that there were no Bankruptcy Courts in the large towns in Ireland, and that all Bankruptcy business had to be transacted at great inconvenience and expense in Dublin. A stronger case, in his opinion, could not have been made out. The hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin) had also pointed out that other towns were similarly situated, and it was precisely that argument of the hon. Member that made the Government think that the Bill could be very properly sent to a Select Committee. The hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) said that very little notice had been given of the Bill. But he ventured to say there was no Gentleman in the House interested in the question who did not know the Bill by heart. The hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) had opposed the Bill rather strongly last year, but seemed to welcome the idea that it would be considered by a Select Committee. The Government were sometimes taunted with not considering Irish interests; but it seemed to him they could not show their wish to do so better than by saying—"Here is a Bill which has been brought forward year after year, it is very influentially supported in Ireland, and all we ask is that it should be placed in a position that will enable it to be fairly considered by a Select Committee representing the different interests concerned." He did not see how any proposal to remedy what had been alleged to be a grievance in Ireland could be more fairly made; and he trusted that hon. Members opposite would allow that consideration to weigh with them.

MR. HEALY thought the proposition of the Government a very reasonable one. He had not given the Government a vote since he had been a Member of the House; but, with mixed feelings of pain and pleasure, he should do so on the present occasion.

MR. R. POWER said, he rose to oppose the Bill because it did not apply to Waterford. He was at a loss to understand why Londonderry, Galway, and Limerick should be included and Waterford omitted from the Bill. The latter had quite as much claim to be inserted as the other places; and he objected to its exclusion in favour of Londonderry, amongst other reasons, on account of the Representatives which Londonderry returned to the House. But he objected to the Bill on higher grounds. It really meant the establishment of unequal laws. The Government proposed to bring in one Bill for England and another for Ireland. Both were entirely different in their character, and the result of this legislation would be that a few years hence there would be agitation amongst the people of Ireland, and Irish Members would come to that House and ask for equalization of the laws. If Her Majesty's Government proposed to establish Bankruptcy Courts in Londonderry, Galway, and Dublin, why, he asked, did they not also propose to place them in every large town in Ireland? But he was quite prepared to admit that a Bankruptcy Bill was most necessary in Ireland at the present time. The opposition which the Bill had met with from lawyers was certainly a very significant fact. For his own part, he looked with a certain amount of suspicion upon any Bill that was entirely opposed by lawyers, and especially by Dublin lawyers. The present Bill would, of course, put into the hands of the lawyers in the towns named therein the practice and fees of the lawyers who resided in Dublin. The opposition of the latter was, therefore, perfectly intelligible to him. He had already stated his reason for opposing the second reading of the Bill; but he trusted that Her Majesty's Government would render further opposition unnecessary by including Waterford in its provisions.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he rose simply for the purpose of supporting the second reading of the Bill.

MR. P. MARTIN begged to oppose that Motion on the ground that no Notice had been given.

BILL.—[BILL 41.]

(Mr. Litton, Mr. James Richardson.)

COMMITTEE.

(In the Committee.)

MR. BIGGAR pointed out that the Amendments upon the Paper to this Bill were of a very important character, and required examination at the hands of hon. Members, especially those who represented Irish constituencies. Among other things, he observed that the Bill raised the question of pensions, which the Petty Sessions Clerks were to receive. That was a matter which deserved full consideration, and it was utterly impossible to deal with it in a satisfactory manner at that hour—2.5 A.M. He trusted that hon. Members in charge of the Bill would not persist in proceeding further in Committee that night.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. LITTON said, he should be the last person to ask the House to proceed with the Bill before hon. Members had fully considered its provisions; but the Amendments on the Paper were of a formal nature, and these, he thought, might very well be taken. When the Superannuation Clause, to which the hon. Member for Cavan objected, was reached, if the House thought proper, and the hon. Member deemed it right to renew his objection to the clause, he (Mr. Litton) would not object to report Progress.

MAJOR NOLAN thought the present a favourable opportunity for passing the Bill. There were so few chances of getting Irish Bills into Committee that he trusted the hon. Member for Cavan would withdraw his Motion.

MR. BIGGAR was willing, after the appeal of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway, to agree to the formal Amendments being taken. He should feel it his duty, however, to renew his Motion to report Progress when the Superannuation Clause was reached.

MR. R. POWER asked what had become of the Amendments which had stood in the name of the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon)?

MR. LITTON said, they had been included in the Amendments which he was about to move by arrangement with the hon. and learned Member.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1 (Salaries of clerks of petty sessions in Ireland not to depend on amount of fines or petty sessions stamps), agreed to.

Clause 2 (Provisions for securing Petty Sessions Clerks Fund from variation).

On the Motion of Mr. LITTON, Amendment made, in page 1, line 20, after "salaries," by inserting "and retiring allowances."

Mr. HEALY thought the hon. and learned Member for Tyrone should give the Committee an explanation as to why the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. De La Poer Beresford) had not been moved.

Mr. LITTON said, the Amendment in question had been put down to meet certain objections which had been raised by some of the Town Commissioners in Ireland. The hon. Member was now satisfied that the Definition Clause with regard to "local authorities" rendered it unnecessary for him to propose his Amendment.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. LITTON, the following Clauses were added to the Bill:—

"It shall not be necessary for a Petty Sessions Clerk to enter into a new bond with sureties on each occasion of increase in his salary, nor, except when by reason of the death or insolvency of his sureties or for other sufficient reason the Lord Lieutenant may consider such to be necessary, shall a new bond be required, but the original bond as against the original sureties shall remain of full force and effect notwithstanding such increase of salary.

(Definition Clause.)

"'Local authorities' shall mean the treasurers of counties and treasurers of boroughs to whom the surplus moneys arising from the sale of licences are payable under 'The Dogs Regulation (Ireland) Act, 1865,' and any Act amending the same.

"'Petty sessions clerks' shall include the registrar of petty sessions clerks and his clerks."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Litton.)

Motion agreed to.

CHURCH PATRONAGE (No. 2) BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Laws relating to patronage, simony, and exchange of Benefices in the Church of England."—(Mr. E. Stanhope.)

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the hon. Gentleman opposite to explain the nature of this Bill.

Mr. E. STANHOPE pointed out that the proposed Bill contained exactly those proposals which the Prime Minister had said would meet with the support of the Government. The other portions of the former Bill would stand over for further consideration. As soon as leave was given to introduce the Bill, he should move that the former Order be discharged.

Mr. ILLINGWORTH rose to Order. He wished to know whether it was competent for an hon. Member, having already one Bill before the House, to introduce another upon the same subject before the original Order was discharged?

Mr. SPEAKER: The procedure of the hon. Member is quite regular.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had given his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Illingworth) his assistance on a previous occasion in dividing against the former Bill. He hardly knew what course his hon. Friend was about to pursue; but if he intended to persist in obstructive action, as formerly, he should give him his cordial support.

Mr. DILLWYN asked whether the Motion should not have been brought before the Committee of the Whole House?

Mr. SPEAKER: I see no ground for that course being taken.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Tillet.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he thought the course proposed was somewhat discourteous to the hon. Gentleman opposite, who was simply asking leave to introduce a Bill which the Prime Minister had intimated would receive the support of the Government.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON thought the other Bill should be withdrawn before leave was given, otherwise there would be two Bills running at the same time.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, it was quite impossible for him to accede to this suggestion. The moment he received permission to bring in the second Bill he should withdraw the first. He was much indebted to his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for the manner in which he had urged the House to agree to his Motion. One of the chief objections raised to the first Bill was that hon. Members opposite were in ignorance as to the clauses which would be proceeded with. They then considered that a new Bill should be introduced, and now opposed him in carrying out their own suggestion.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at a quarter
after Two o'clock.

NAVY—WIDOWS OF SEAMEN AND MARINES—THE COMMITTEE.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH rose to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, what progress was being made by the Committee appointed by him to inquire respecting the pensions of seamen's and marines' widows; and whether any Report on the subject would be laid on the Table of the House? It was 18 years since this question was first brought before the Board of Admiralty, and 10 years since it was first brought under the notice of the House. In 1864 a Memorial on the subject was addressed by seamen and marines to the then First Lord of the Admiralty. A favourable reply was given to it; and subsequently a Memorial of a similar kind was addressed to the late Mr. Ward Hunt when he was First Lord. He was afraid that, owing to financial reasons, any favourable suggestions which might have been made by First Lords had not been well received by the Treasury, because nothing had been done to carry out the views of the Memorialists. The subject was one of the highest importance, and its importance had increased since it was first pressed on the Admiralty. The risk of accidents to seamen and marines had increased since then; and, as he showed on a former occasion, on successive appeals there was a decrease in the amount subscribed by the public to the widows and children of the victims. He thought that seamen might fairly feel that while every attention was given by the country to the widows of soldiers and Civil servants, the same could not be said in their case. The fact of the sailor being a married man was almost wholly ignored; but great numbers of them were married men, and very many of them had large families dependent on them. The seamen had fixed their eyes on one or two items of saving which came into the hands of the Admiralty, and thought that they had a claim to those savings, as, to a certain extent, they were their own property; but in the event of the Admiralty establishing a Pension Fund they were willing to have deducted in aid of that fund a certain portion of their day's pay. One of the items of saving to which he referred was the difference between the amount paid by the Admiralty for certain articles and the allowance made to the sailor when he did not use them. Then, if a seaman had confinement for six hours, a day's pay was stopped from him. That was another item of saving to the Admiralty. Those savings might be trifling in individual cases; but in the whole they amounted to a considerable sum. He was not asking for any increase in the seaman's pay; but as the seaman's life during peace was a much less comfortable one than the soldier's, and as the improvements in naval science and projectiles had increased rather than diminished his risk of accidents, it was not unreasonable that he should be treated as well as the soldier. It was stated that the old non-commissioned officers were fast disappearing from the Army, and their places being filled by young corporals and serjeants. If such a thing should come to pass in the sister Service, then the personnel of the Navy was doomed, for there was nothing on which young sailors so much depended as the petty officers. Most of these men were married, and there was no better way of attaching them to the Service than by providing for those they left behind them. Secure of that, they were ready to incur every risk. He should be the last man to stir up agitation among the sailors, for the rule among them was to refrain from all political agitation; but he thought that in again bringing this question under the notice of the First Lord and their Lordships' House, he was doing nothing beyond advocating a legitimate desire.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, he could assure the House that the Admiralty were not indifferent to the question. Three months ago, when the noble Viscount brought it forward, he (the Earl of Northbrook) stated that the subject was one of considerable importance, but one requiring careful inquiry, which he was resolved it should have. He did not at that time hold out to the noble Viscount the expectation that it could be dealt with within a very short period. When the Report of the Committee upon Pensions was made, he would consider if it might properly be laid upon the Table of the House. As to the question itself, he thought it was not satisfactory that in such cases as that of the loss of H.M.S. Doterel, which happened the other day, the aid to be given to the sufferers should, to a certain extent, depend on an appeal to the public. He had already had some communication with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War on that subject, and they had been in consultation with the Royal Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund, with the view of establishing some system of dealing with such cases. At the same time, he must say that he did not think the noble Viscount gave quite sufficient credit to the country for the assistance that was now given in such calamities as that which occurred the other day to the Doterel. According to the regulations in such cases, a gratuity of one year's pay was given to the widow of each man who lost his life; and in the case of a man who did not leave a widow, a similar gratuity might be awarded to his children or aged parents dependent upon him. Besides that, the children of sailors who met with their death in the way mentioned were educated at the expense of the Greenwich Hospital Fund—the boys at the Greenwich Hospital School, and the girls at certain private schools selected for the purpose. It was his impression that the widows and children of soldiers were not so well treated. He did not think it was well to mix the pension question up with that of the savings between the cost price of articles and the allowance made to a sailor when he did not draw them. When the noble Viscount introduced the latter subject on a previous occasion, he (the Earl of Northbrook) gave an explanation which it was not necessary for him to repeat now. He did not suppose it was suggested that the Government should undertake to pension the widows of all seamen. He thought a provision of that kind ought, as a rule, to be made by the seamen themselves out of their pay; and he was glad to be able to state to their Lordships that the seamen seemed disposed to make it. Savings banks had recently been established at the Naval ports, in addition to those on board ship; and His Royal Highness in command of the Naval Reserves had told him that a large number of the Coastguard insured their lives. He could only repeat what he had said before—that, in his opinion, there were certain funds which might properly be set apart towards providing assistance for the widows of sailors who lost their lives by drowning or other accident; but he hoped the House would allow him to say that any attempt to increase the expenses for the non-effective portion of the Navy ought to be viewed with much jealousy in "another place." Those expenses had grown from £360,000 to £560,000 within 10 years. In his opinion, all the money that could properly be saved in other branches of the Service ought to be expended on the effective or fighting portion. The question of provision for exceptional cases would, however, continue to receive his careful attention.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH thanked the noble Earl for his statement, and said, that he did not suggest that any provision should be made in respect to any other than the exceptional cases referred to.

ARMY (THANKS OF PARLIAMENT).

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

THE EARL OF POWIS moved for a "Return of the officers of the Army who have received the thanks of Parliament by name from 1813; showing the date at which and the rank in which they would have been retired from the Army under the proposed rule of five years' non-employment, and the appointments they may have held subsequent to that date; how many officers of distinction would have been excluded from employment by the proposed five years' regulation, and the nation thus deprived of their services."

The Return would be confined to those who were thanked as General Officers, as officers of inferior rank were not mentioned by name in the Votes of Parliament.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he would be the last person to demur to giving information to the House on any important questions relative to the Army when he considered the information really useful, whether in favour of or against the scheme of Army Organization; but he submitted that this Return would serve no purpose whatever, because the conditions under which the officers who would be included in the proposed Return served would be entirely different from the conditions under which officers would serve in the new scheme. Had the rule which would in future enforce retirement after five years' non-employment been in force in former days, it was more than probable that many, if not all, the distinguished generals referred to by his noble Friend would have been retained by employment on the active list. He would point out that the effect of keeping a large number of officers of high position on the active list would be to keep younger men out. Those who had not been employed for five years, and who were not likely to be employed for some time, should go off the list, in order that the promotion might not be blocked. He hoped the noble Earl would not press for the Return.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he had heard of Returns being refused because the information which would be contained in them was difficult to be arrived at, or because they would be so voluminous and expensive; but he had never before heard of their being refused because their production, in the opinion of the Minister, would not furnish cogent arguments against a system of which he approved. It was obvious that the motive of the noble Earl (the Earl of Powis) in asking for the Return was that noble Lords who were not so well acquainted with military matters as he was himself might have put before them in precise and intelligible terms the argument against this five years' rule. Upon the cogency of that argument, he (the Marquess of Salisbury) did not desire to express an opinion. In the opinion of his noble Friend behind him, it was a valuable and an effective argument; and he thought that to withhold information from the House simply because the noble Earl opposite did not agree with him was a very unusual course.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he did not altogether agree with the noble Marquess opposite. What his noble Friend (the Earl of Morley) said was not that the argument to be founded upon the Return would not be cogent, but that no argument could be founded upon it at all. Suppose a Return was asked for which had no application to the subject, he should say that was a reason for refusing the Return. No argument of any importance could be founded upon the Return asked for. However, as it would be neither voluminous nor expensive, his noble Friend would not resist the Motion if it were pressed.

LORD DENMAN (not having heard the speech of the noble Marquess) said, that the noble Lord who made this Motion had pointed out that Viscount Hill and Viscount Hardinge could not have been employed as they were if this proposed system had existed in their time. He (Lord Denman) wished to point out the fact that the rule as to colonels retiring at the age of 58 had been re-considered; and as the Minister for War might refrain from employing a general for five years, and so dismiss him from active service, it would be an injury to the Profession if this regulation, or anything approaching to it, were established. Lord Lynedoch was 40 years old before he joined the Army. If he had been a general on retirement, he could not have again been employed—though vigorous till 80. This and other schemes for forced retirement were caused by the sudden abolition of purchase, without regard to the majority of 80 in their Lordship's House, who desired, on the Resolution of the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon), that a sound system of retirement should be established before the sudden revocation of the Royal Warrant. He looked upon the five years' rule of non-employment as a system of enforced retirement which was most objectionable.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, till Thursday next, half past

QUESTIONS.

VACCINATION ACT, SECS. 29. 31.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the fact that the Warrington magistrates recently fined six persons £1 16s. 6d. each (including costs) under section 29 of the Vaccination Act, which section applies only to children under twelve months' old, whereas the children in question were from three to six years old; whether this is not illegal and, whether he will direct that the fines be remitted?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he only received this morning the facts of the case. It appeared that, as his hon. Friend stated, the conviction took place under the 29th section of the Vaccination Act, instead of the 31st, and the conviction, considering the age of the children, was, therefore, irregular. He would inquire into the matter, and see what was to be done with reference to the fines.

STATE OF IRELAND—LANDLORDS' PROPERTY DEFENCE ASSOCIATION.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the attendance of paid officials of the Government at meetings of the Landlords' Property Defence Association or Emergency Committee has the sanction and approval of the Irish Executive; and, if not, what notice has been taken of the presence at such meeting of Mr. Eaton, Resident Magistrate, Mr. Rice, Crown Prosecutor, and Mr. Fleming, Sub-inspector, at Fermoy, county Cork, on the 7th instant?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he understood that neither Mr. Eaton, Resident Magistrate, nor Mr. Fleming, Sub-inspector, attended any such meeting as the hon. Member alluded to. Mr. Rice, Crown Prosecutor, informed him that, as a private individual, he attended a private meeting of gentlemen interested in the Property Defence Association. He did not think the matter called for the attention of the Government.

INLAND NAVIGATION DRAINAGE (IRELAND)—THE UPPER BANN.

MR. RICHARDSON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, in the course of an inquiry now being held on "Inland Navigation and Drainage in Ireland," it has been found that the powers of the Commissioners do not enable them sufficiently to investigate the complaint laid before them, in regard to the serious damage caused by the flooding of the Valley of the Upper Bann, and the lands adjoining Lough Neah and its tributaries; and, whether he will advise Her Majesty to enlarge the scope and powers of the Commissioners, and provide the Commissioners with the assistance of a competent hydraulic engineer for the purpose of reporting on a proposal placed before them, to discharge the surplus water by way of Newry?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: The Commission referred to in the Question of my hon. Friend was appointed to inquire into the Northern inland navigations of Ireland and their effect upon the drainage of the country. In a preliminary Report, the Commissioners asked for fresh powers to examine into the practicability and expense of a new plan for improving the drainage of the Valley of the Upper Bann entirely independent of the navigations. This proposal appeared to the Treasury to be outside the scope of the inquiry intrusted to the Commission, which, in itself, is large enough to be likely to occupy much time. It further appeared that the proposal was one which should rather be dealt with under the General Drainage Acts. It was, therefore, decided not to extend the scope of the inquiry intrusted to the Commission.

PURCHASE OF STORES (INDIA).

MR. W. H. SMITH (for Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) asked the Secretary of State for India, If it is true that the permission given in 1878 by the India Office to the Indian Government to obtain by open tender in India the necessary stores for the Stationery Office for the Bengal Presidency have been suddenly cancelled from England; and, if so, upon what grounds?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The permission which the noble Lord probably refers to was intended to encourage the purchase in India of articles manufactured in that country, or usually procurable in the local market, of satisfactory quality and price. But when stores are of such a nature that they have to be purchased in England, the demand should be forwarded to and dealt with by the India Office. More precise instructions to this effect were sent to India in May, 1880, and were adopted by the Government of India in a Resolution dated November, 1880. No other instructions on this subject have recently been sent to India.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—ARREST OF — CLARKE AT MULLINGAR.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is a fact that a man named Clarke was on Thursday May 12th arrested without warrant at Mullingar on a charge of carrying an alleged illegal placard; if four magistrates at once proceeded to sentence the man to a month's imprisonment unless he found bail for good behaviour for six months; if it was only on the protest of Mr. Downes, prisoner's solicitor, that the magistrates consented to remand the charge to petty sessions; if the magistrates had power to adjudicate as they proposed out of sessions; and, if they they had not, will he take steps to insure that justice shall be done in similar cases in which prisoners may not be able to provide themselves with legal defence?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am informed that this case was disposed of at the Petty Sessions. I am also informed that the magistrates have jurisdiction to ask for sureties for good behaviour; but, as this is a legal point, perhaps the hon. Member, if he wishes for further information, will ask my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: I will do so.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—THE GOVERNOR OF LIMERICK PRISON.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (for Mr. O'SULLIVAN) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland Whether the present Governor of the County Limerick Prison is the same Governor whose conduct was brought before this House in 1869 (by the late George Henry Moore) for insulting and persecuting political prisoners under his charge; and, if so, why the County Limerick Prison was selected for the same purpose on the present occasion?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The Governor of the Limerick County Prison has held that office since 1862; therefore I imagine that he was Governor when the late Mr. Moore brought forward his Motion in 1869. The prison was selected—firstly, on the ground of the general convenience of the situation; and, secondly, because of its suitability in the way of internal accommodation.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the right hon. Gentleman whether the present Governor was not the same person who was Governor when the hon. Member for the county of Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan) underwent atrocious treatment in the prison?

MR. W. E. FORSTER requested the hon. Gentleman to give Notice of his Question.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the right hon. Gentleman knew very well that it was the same person. ["Order!"]

Lord Frederick Cavendish

NEWSPAPERS FOR POLITICAL PRISONERS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, as it is not denied that Colonel Valentine Baker after his conviction of a far graver offence than any which the Irish coercion prisoners are merely suspected of, was not prevented from receiving such English, Irish, Colonial, and Foreign newspapers, illustrated or otherwise, as he chose to pay for; and further, as it is not denied that English prisoners charged with offences however grave are while awaiting trial allowed to receive such papers as are sent to them, the Irish prison officials will in future be instructed not to stop such publications as the "Echo," the "Newcastle Chronicle," the "Graphic," the "Illustrated London News," the "Nation," the "Irishman," when they are forwarded by friends to the political prisoners in Irish goals who are merely detained on suspicion; and, if he will state by whose orders these papers have hitherto been stopp'd?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I can only repeat what I have before stated in answer to this Question—namely, that the Irish Government have given orders that prisoners detained under the Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act shall be allowed to receive the Dublin daily papers and the papers sent them from their own localities. I do not think there is any necessity for modifying that rule.

MR. HEALY: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will answer the latter part of the Question.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I really have answered it. Of course, my answer implies that it is by our sanction. In fact, I am quite willing to state that it is done by our orders.

FRANCE AND TUNIS—THE TREATY.

MR. M'COAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government regard the Treaty extorted by General Bréard from the Bey of Tunis on the 13th instant as consistent with the declarations of M. Saint Hilaire previously reported to this House as to the intended object and limits of the French Expedition to Tunis; and, if not, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to protest against so grave a violation of International Law as this forcible imposition of a French Suzerainty on the Regency indisputably constitutes; and, whether the said Treaty, so extorted, will in any way, and to what extent, affect the rights and privileges secured to Foreigners residing in, or trading to, Tunis, under the existing capitulations and Treaties between the Sublime Porte and the European Powers?

The following Question on the same subject also stood on the Notice Paper in the name of the Earl of BECKFORD:—To ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, seeing that if Her Majesty's Government considered Tunis to be under the suzerainty of the Sultan, and no final Treaty could therefore be entered into by the Bey without ratification by the Sublime Porte, Her Majesty's Government, in accord with the terms of the Berlin Treaty and the Anglo-Turkish Convention, would prevent the insertion of clauses in any French Treaty with the Bey which might undermine the authority of the Sultan, or interfere with the rights of other nations under Treaties with the Ottoman Porte, or its suzerain the Bey; also to ask, if Her Majesty's Government will protest against the permanent occupation by the French of the Ports of Bizerta, Susa, and Gabes, inasmuch as such occupation would menace our communications with the East; if Her Majesty's Government will protest against any terms being forced upon the Bey which would interfere with the proper representation of British and Italian interests in the composition of the International Financial Commission which at present exists at Tunis; and, if Her Majesty's Government will take steps to prevent the imposition of a protective tariff in Tunis against the introduction of British manufactures which at present constitute the principle European import trade in that Country?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I conclude that the Questions of the hon. Member for Wicklow County and the noble Lord the Member for Westmoreland were put on the Paper before the conversation yesterday on the affairs of Tunis. I then stated that it appeared the more convenient course to defer any discussion of particular points until the whole of the case was submitted to this House in the Papers which will shortly be laid before Parliament, and in this view the majority of the House will no doubt agree. If hon. Members are not satisfied with those Papers, they will then have the opportunity of submitting a Motion upon the subject. With regard to the noble Lord's Questions, I would point out that the Anglo-Turkish Convention contained no reference to the dominion of Turkey in Africa, and we have not heard that the French troops are in the neighbourhood of Susa or Gabes.

MR. M'COAN asked how far the existing Treaties would be operative?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I do not wish to be drawn into further answers by further Questions. We have not yet got an official communication of the text of the Treaty; but we have been informed by the French Government that they have exercised the utmost care that the rights and privileges secured to foreigners under existing Treaties shall continue to exist.

THE EARL OF BECTIVE asked for an answer to the third paragraph of his second Question with regard to preventing the imposition of a protective tariff in Tunis against the introduction of British manufactures?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: That paragraph is partly covered by the answer I gave. The existing Treaties with Tunis will undoubtedly continue in force.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked whether the Capitulations would continue in force?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I must ask the hon. Member to give Notice of his Question.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I will put the Question on Thursday.

MR. RITCHIE: May I ask on what footing the Treaty with Tunis stands?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Perhaps the hon. Member will give Notice of the Question.

THE EARL OF BECTIVE: Perhaps the hon. Baronet will inform the House whether there is any truth in the statement that General Bréard on the 15th instant occupied the city of Tunis with a large body of troops under the direct orders of the French Government that he was to remain there until His Highness the Bey had distinctly stated that his protest to the Porte, to the effect that he signed the Treaty under protest, was revoked?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: We have not heard of any occupation of the city of Tunis by French troops; but they are just outside.

ARMY—COAST BRIGADE ROYAL ARTILLERY.

MR. CREYKE asked the Secretary of State for War, If the officers of the Coast Brigade Royal Artillery, by the abolition of the lieutenant-colonelcy of the brigade, have been debarred from rising in the regiment beyond the rank of captain; if, on the recommendation of Lord Morley's Committee, one majority only is proposed to be granted to the whole of the brigade; and, whether, taking into consideration the fact that the Coast Brigade is the only opening for master gunners and superior non-commissioned officers to the combatant commissioned ranks in a regiment numbering 34,000 men, he would, before the publication of the new warrant, be prepared to consider the concessions sought by the officers of the Coast Brigade, viz.:—The granting of four majorities, inclusive of present establishment (the proportion granted to the Royal Marine Artillery); and the revival of the lieutenant-colonelcy?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to the Question of my hon. Friend, I really must appeal to him to consider whether it is desirable that specific proposals for increase of establishments, involving large additional expenditure, should be pressed on me by an independent Member in the House of Commons. I should not so much deprecate a general Question asking me if I had inquired into the organization of any particular corps; but it is very difficult to exercise economical control in these matters in the face of elaborate claims of this kind put forward in Questions to Ministers. As to the particular case of the Coast Brigade, I have to remind my hon. Friend that the officers and men are under the orders of the officers commanding the Artillery of their respective districts; and I can see no reason for granting to these particular officers, who have not received a scientific education, like the other officers of Artillery, higher ranks than that now enjoyed. We are, as my hon. Friend's Question shows that he is aware, adding one majority to the establishment, which, since 1872, has consisted of captains and lieutenants.

PASSENGER ACTS—EMIGRANT SHIPS.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he will cause inquiries to be made as to the sufficiency of the boat and life-saving accommodation supplied to emigrant ships sailing from Queenstown and other ports for America and Canada?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I have made inquiries on the subject of the Question, and I find that the size and number of life-boats and the character of the life-saving apparatus in emigrant ships are already prescribed by statute. I have no doubt that the provisions of the statute are strictly observed in every case, and I believe that no emigrant ship leaves port until after inspection by an emigrant agent, as well as by a representative of the Board of Trade. As to the sufficiency of the statutory provisions, I can only say that, so far as I am informed, they are sufficient and, in fact, as extensive as would be practicable or desirable in all circumstances.

MINES REGULATION ACT—THE PEN-Y-GRAIG EXPLOSION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he has had his attention called to that portion of Mr. Wright's Report on the Pen-y-Graig Explosion, in which he states the following with respect to Moses Rowlands, the manager of that colliery, viz.:—

"The nominal manager of the colliery is Moses Rowlands, a nephew of one of the proprietors. He has had no experience in the working of steam coal, except for a short time as a boy of 10 or 12 years of age. The following is his history:—Born in 1843, he from 10 to 12 years of his age cut coal at Aberdare and Rhondda; then he did clerk's work at Gwendraeth Colliery for about five years (1855 to 1860). He was then at a national school for some time. He was then at a house coal (not steam coal) colliery at Pen-y-Graig belonging to his uncle for 13 or 14 years (1861 to 1873) as a clerk, storekeeper, and measurer, principally at book work, and, as he expressly stated, not engaged in the practical duties of mine managing. In 1873 he went to assist his father, the certificated manager of another house coal colliery at Pen-y-Graig. He remained there five years, holding no regular office as manager, overman, fireman, or otherwise. In 1878 he came to the Naval Steam Coal Colliery (where the explosion now in question occurred), of which his uncle was and is a proprietor; and he has been the certificated manager from then till now. He obtained his certificate, not by examination, but by a certificate under section 31 of the Act, signed by the Secretary of State, to the effect that he had 'within five years before the passing of this Act (the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872) acted for not less than 12 months in the capacity of a manager of a mine.' This certificate, if the foregoing history as told by him is true, was entirely false, and he must have known it to be false, inasmuch as according to his own showing he did not begin to act in any capacity as manager of a mine, even as his father's assistant, until 1873; and the proprietors of the colliery, or some of them, must have known it to be false. This manager appears to have brought himself within the provisions of section 38 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, by which the use of a false certificate with knowledge of its falsity is a misdemeanour punishable with two years' hard labour. The proprietors of the colliery are equally liable to punishment if they were accessory to the nephew's offence. One at least of the proprietors (the manager's uncle) took an active part in the affairs of the colliery;"

and, whether, considering that the Commissioner charges him with fraudulently obtaining his certificate, and for such offence he is liable to two years' hard labour, he will direct that his certificate be at once withdrawn, or he be tried for an offence in the ordinary course of Law?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that he had been in communication with Mr. Wright on this subject, and the hon. Member was aware that the Government had carefully considered what course should be taken in regard to it. A prosecution had been instituted against the manager with a view to revoke his certificate for misconduct and negligence. The prosecution failed, and he was absolved. In those circumstances, considering the whole character of that case, he did not think it would be right to go back to anterior proceedings six or seven years ago, and institute another prosecution, which he did not think was likely to succeed. The Government could not undertake a second prosecution in that case. He had, however, given instructions that a special inspection of that mine should be made, and a particular Report be made to him as to the present management.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PROCLAMATION OF THE QUEEN'S COUNTY.

MR. LALOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, For what reason the Queen's County has been proclaimed under the Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act; and, if it be true that Patrick Meehan, Patrick Doran, and John Redington, of Maryborough, in the Queen's County, have been arrested under the provisions of the said Act; and, if so, on what reasonable suspicion?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the only answer he could give to that Question was that, after very careful consideration, the Government had acted on their responsibility, and had thought it necessary to proclaim that county for the prevention of outrages. The hon. Member asked him on what reasonable suspicion certain persons had been arrested. He could not give the precise words of the arrest, and he would not like to make any mistake. Of course, the Papers would be laid on the Table in the usual form; and if the hon. Gentleman wished him to read the warrant, of course he should do so.

MR. LALOR said, that he wished to make a few remarks on this subject, and would therefore conclude with a Motion. He was well acquainted with the inconvenience of these Motions of Adjournment; but he was compelled to take the course which he was now doing in consequence of the Chief Secretary having refused to state the grounds on which the Queen's County had been proclaimed. He had a Return in his hand from which it appeared that within the last four months there had only been six agrarian crimes in the Queen's County. There was no other county in the British Empire where there had been less crime committed than during the last four months in the Queen's County. To show the manner in which the Coercion Act was now worked, he would only refer to one case, that of a burning which took place in his own neighbourhood a short time since. For that a man named Lalor was arrested on suspicion, although there was not the slightest evidence against him to go before a Court. The very fact of this man's arrest would establish the fact that the burning was a malicious one, and would thus play into the hands—

MR. R. N. FOWLER rose to Order. He wished to know whether the hon. Member was in Order in debating a question on a Motion for Adjournment, when he had raised the same point on a similar Motion two or three days ago?

MR. SPEAKER: When the hon. Member spoke on this question, the Motion before the House was that the House do now adjourn. That Question was disposed of, and I am not prepared to say that the hon. Member is, strictly speaking, out of Order now, although, as I have often said, this is a most inconvenient course to pursue.

MR. LALOR said, that the proclamation of the Queen's County was playing into the hands of the landlords. He was very well aware—and in the Queen's County they were very well aware—on whose recommendation the Queen's County had been proclaimed. It was on the recommendation of the magistrates, and he would give the House a sample of those gentlemen. In January last, six respectable young men who were collecting subscriptions for the Land League were summoned before the magistrates at Petty Sessions, and although the persons whom they had solicited swore that they had not been intimidated, the magistrates disregarded the evidence, and convicted the accused. The assistant barrister reversed the decision on appeal, and now two of those men had been arrested merely to vindicate the magistrates' unjust decision. These men were respectable merchants in Maryborough, and yet the police went to their houses at 2 o'clock in the morning, broke in their doors, and only gave them five minutes to dress before they took them to gaol. One of them had a large sum of money in the house, and he had no time to secure it before he was taken to the station and conveyed to gaol. He asked was that right or honourable treatment for respectable men? He said it was unjust and cruel. On what grounds were these men arrested? The right hon. Gentleman had refused to answer that question; but he would tell them he had a copy of the Warrant, which he would read.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I submit, Sir, that the matter which the hon. Member is placing before the House has nothing to do with the Motion for Adjournment; and I hope the House will not allow any important matter such as this may be to be introduced when the House itself has no opportunity of expressing an opinion thereon.

MR. HEALY: May I ask, Sir, is it not the fact that the hon. Member for Wareham (Mr. Montague Guest) moved the adjournment of the House yesterday on the question of Tunis, which was a much more important matter than that now under consideration? I would also ask you, Sir, whether the hon. Member for London (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) is entitled persistently to interrupt the hon. Member, at the same time skilfully endeavouring to conceal the fact by putting his Notice Paper before his mouth?

MR. SPEAKER having made no reply,

MR. LALOR, resuming, denied that these three gentlemen had ever committed a breach of the peace of the kind alleged against them. He challenged the right hon. Gentleman to go down to that place and hear the case, even from the policemen and magistrates from whom he was getting his instructions in this matter. He challenged him to bring the matter to trial, and he would find that he was thoroughly deceived by the local authorities in Maryborough. He believed the arrest of these men was intended by the right hon. Gentleman as a blow at the Land League; but the best weapon the right hon. Gentleman could make use of against the Land League would be the introduction of a good Land Bill, which the Bill at present before the House was not. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not entitled to refer to the Land Bill, which is not now before the House.

MR. LALOR said, he did not intend to refer to it any further; but he would advise the right hon. Gentleman and the Government to be cautious. There were men in Ireland connected with the Land League who were anxiously waiting for the time when the present leaders should be removed. These men were not the friends of the landlords or the friends of the Government; but they were men who thought the present leaders were not sufficiently advanced, and who would be more likely to give trouble to the right hon. Gentleman than the men who now guided the movement. He would advise the right hon. Gentleman, before he made further arrests in the Queen's County, to go down there and inquire, not from the landlord side of the question, nor from the officials from whom he was getting information, but to hold an inquiry in public, where he could have the members of the Land League and their accusers face to face. He begged to move the adjournment of the House.

MR. MARUM, in seconding the Motion, wished to bear testimony to the fact that there was not a particle of evidence against the men who had been arrested to sustain the charge of intimidation. The case had come before him and his brother magistrates on appeal, and was investigated with the greatest care.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Lalor.)

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN wished to state his belief that the number of arrests which had taken place in Ireland, and the character of those arrests, were creating not merely irritation, but exasperation in that country. He wished to tell the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Forster) that if he went on in this line of action he and the Irish landlords would produce an insurrection in Ireland.

Question put.

CENTRAL ASIA—THE PAPERS.

MR. NORTHCOTE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he was aware on March 14th that the consideration of a Motion involving the whole question of Ministerial policy in Central Asia was fixed for the 24th of that month; if so, if he can explain the reason of the delay from March 14 to March 17 in requesting the assent of the Russian Government to the publication of the important papers contained in Parliamentary Paper (Central Asia, No. 3, 1881); if he can explain the delay between March 21st and 24th in communicating the Russian assent to such publication to the Under Secretary of State directly responsible to Parliament for the conduct of Foreign Affairs; and, if he can state to the House the reasons, if any, which precluded the communication to Parliament of the intelligence conveyed in the last two Despatches of that Parliamentary Paper in time to place the House in possession of the information used by Her Majesty's Government in the discussion of the Motion relative to the retention of Candahar?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I gave very full information upon this subject yesterday to the House. My answer must be that there was no such delay as that with regard to which the hon. Member asks. I stated yesterday that the document reached the Foreign Office on the night of the 21st, and that it was seen and the immediate publication of the Paper ordered on the morning of the 22nd. It then, as I explained, had to start on its usual round before it came to me. When he asks me the reason which prevented communication to Parliament of the last two despatches, I must reply once more that no reason whatever prevented it, that every possible haste was shown, and that no haste would have produced the last despatch in time, as it was only written after the debate was over.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE BASUTOS.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked whether any further news had been received from Basutoland?

MR. GRANT DUFF: In reply to the hon. Member for the City, who has always taken so strong an interest in the Basutos, I am happy to say that Sir Hercules Robinson has now telegraphed that Letsea, Lerothodi, and 10 others have accepted his award. Masupha did not sign the letter; but we do not know that he has declined to accept the award.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THAMES RIVER BILL.

MR. RITCHIE asked if it was the intention of the Government to press forward this Bill to-night, and why it was placed on the Paper every day, including those of private Members, which was a most inconvenient course?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN considered the course referred to an inconvenient one; but it had appeared to him necessary in the circumstances of the case. The Bill had first been introduced as a Private Bill, in the hope of saving the time of the House. In deference to opinions expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House, it subsequently was introduced as a public measure. The re-introduction of the Bill was, however, deferred for three weeks in consequence of the Notices of opposition of the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton); but having managed to catch the hon. and learned Member napping, he at last succeeded in introducing the measure. The second reading might have been taken on Friday; but in deference to the wishes of hon. Members opposite he undertook not to begin the discussion after 12 30. The Bill was then put down for Monday, and Notices of opposition were at once given by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) and the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Alderman Lawrence). There was, therefore, no other course for him to pursue than to put down the Bill in the Order Paper day after day. If the opposition to the House being called upon to give a verdict on the measure could be overcome, he would put the Bill down for an evening that would be convenient to those interested.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Under the circumstances stated by the President of the Board of Trade, I will agree to remove my block to the Bill.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—ARRESTS UNDER THE ACT—THE CASE OF MR DILLON.

MR. J. COWEN said, he wished to ask the Speaker a Question respecting the privileges of an hon. Member of the House. The Speaker had ruled that Mr. Bradlaugh's expulsion—notwithstanding the Resolution that was arrived at on the 26th of April, declaring that he could not take an oath, and notwithstanding also the Resolution based on the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) that he must be prevented entering the House—could be made a question of Privilege. The hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) had raised the point, and it had been held that he had a right to do so. Now, Mr. Dillon was a duly qualified Member of the Legislature. He had committed no offence. He had not been put upon his trial; he had not been condemned: he had simply been arrested on suspicion. He was apprehended, too, while on his way to take his seat in Parliament. What he wanted to know from the Speaker was, whether Mr. Dillon's case stood in the same category as Mr. Bradlaugh's, and could be treated as a question of Privilege? He knew the Speaker had ruled that the essence of Privilege consisted in its urgency; but he begged to remind him that immediately the fact of Mr. Dillon's arrest was made known to the House, the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) and other Irish Gentlemen started a discussion on the subject, and they only abandoned it when the Government gave an undertaking that there should be an opportunity for debating the whole question. That opportunity had not been afforded; and what he wished to know was, whether the matter could be recurred to in the way that Mr. Bradlaugh's case had been recurred to, and be brought up as a question of Privilege?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: With regard to this question of the arrest of Mr. Dillon, the Government has been guilty of a distinct breach of their own promises. On Notice being given by an hon. Member, calling attention to the arrest, the Government declined to give us any opportunity of bringing it forward. ["Order!"] I think I am speaking to the point raised by my hon. Friend—namely, that this remains a question of urgency to us because of the action of the Government, for when we brought the matter forward in an irregular manner the Government challenged us to bring it to the test of a Motion. Yet the very day after that distinct statement of the Government, when my hon. Friend asked for facilities, the Government took advantage of the Forms of the House again. Accordingly, if we have not been able to bring it forward as a matter of urgency, the responsibility is on the Government, not us.

MR. PARNELL: I also wish to ask whether it would not be greatly for the convenience of the House that the Government should afford some opportunity to the Irish Members of discussing the question of the arrests made under the Coercion Act? I certainly regret very much that the question should have been raised in an irregular way, as it was yesterday, and again today, but I cannot wonder that this should have happened; and I would ask you for some expression of opinion as to whether it would not be a desirable step to take, with the view of preventing irregular debates from springing up, which it was natural should spring up in the absence of any means of bringing these very important matters before the House, for the Government to give once for all one day to the Irish Members, for the purpose of bringing up the whole question of the 100 or so arrests made under the Coercion Act?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for the City of Cork has put to me a Question in reference to my opinion upon a matter not now before the House. The hon. Member must be aware that it is not for the Chair to express an opinion except upon points of Order. With regard to the Question of Order put to me by the hon. Member for Newcastle, I have to say this—that Mr. Dillon, one of the Members for the county of Tipperary, has been committed to prison for some time under an Act of Parliament passed this Session, and I am asked whether any Motion on that matter would be treated as a question of Privilege? I have no hesitation in saying that any Motion bearing on Mr. Dillon's arrest, seeing that he has been for some time in prison, and that urgency does not apply, could not, according to the practice of the House, be treated as a question of Privilege. Any Motion brought forward on that matter must be brought forward in the ordinary way.

PARLIAMENTARY OATHS—MR. BRADLAUGH.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he would on Thursday next ask the Prime Minister, Whether, seeing that Acts of Parliament had been passed for the purpose of relieving two noble Lords from the penalty which they had incurred last Session for having sat in the House of Lords without having taken the usual Oath, it was the intention of the Government to propose a similar measure of relief in the case of Mr. Bradlaugh?

SIR WILFRID LAWSON wished to put a Question to the Speaker with reference to the proceedings of the House. He desired to know, Whether, acting on the precedent which had been set by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) in the case of Mr. Bradlaugh, it would be competent for any hon. Member to make a similar Motion for the purpose of ascertaining the orthodoxy of the theological views of Mr. Thomas Collins when he presented himself at the Table to take the Oath?

MR. SPEAKER: The Question put to me is on a point of Order which has not arisen, and, therefore, I decline to answer it.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—RESOLUTIONS.

MR. DILLWYN rose to move the following Resolutions:—

“That the present Standing Orders be abrogated, altered, or amended, in so far as they may be inconsistent with the following New Orders:—

1. That Debate on a Bill shall be confined to the following stages: Second Reading; Committee; Consideration of Report; Third Reading.

2. In the course of any Debate it shall be competent for any Member, the consent of Mr. Speaker having been first had and obtained, to move that the Question shall be put forthwith, and the decision of the House shall be at once taken without further Debate; if resolved in the affirmative, the Question before the House shall be put forthwith; if resolved in the negative, no similar Motion shall be allowed on the same Question before two hours have elapsed. Provided always that not less than 150 Members shall vote in the majority.

3. If during any Debate a Motion be made for Adjournment, Mr. Speaker may decline to put the Question thereupon, if in his judgment the Motion is made for purposes of obstruction; or if he think fit to put such Question, he may put it from the Chair forthwith.

4. When a Motion is made for the Adjournment of a Debate, or of the House during any Debate, the Debate thereupon shall be strictly confined to the matter of such Motion.

5. Mr. Speaker may call the attention of the House to continued irrelevance or tedious repetition on the part of a Member, and may direct the Member to discontinue his Speech.

6. On Motion made, the House may decide that any Bill shall be resumed in the ensuing Session of the same Parliament at the same stage at which it stands at the end of the current Session.

7. Any Member suspended from the service of the House, in accordance with the Order of February 28th, 1880, shall be suspended from Moving and Speaking for a week at the first offence, and for the remainder of the Session at the second, but shall retain the power of voting.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

It shall nevertheless be in the power of the House upon Motion made to reinstate such Member in the full service of the House, but such Motion in respect of any Member shall be made only once in the course of the Session.

Paragraphs 2, 3, 4, and 5, shall apply, mutatis mutandis, to proceedings in Committee of the whole House.

In Committee.

8. Amendments not on the Notice Paper shall only be moved by a Member in charge of the Bill.”

In commending the Resolutions to the House, the hon. Member said, that there was an impression abroad, and even among Members, that year after year the House of Commons was growing less and less able to grapple with the accumulation of Business upon it, and a feeling was getting up in the country that the House of Commons was becoming incompetent for the work put upon it. He regretted that feeling should exist with regard to this Legislative Chamber, in which he had spent the best part of his life. Various suggestions had been made with the object of affording the House some relief in the discharge of its duties. Among other proposals that had been made was one by which the Business was to be apportioned under certain heads and handed over to Special Committees; but that was an objectionable course, in his opinion, because he thought that the Business of the country should be done by the Representatives of the nation, and not by mere Committees. He was satisfied that by a mere alteration in the old Standing Orders of the House, which had remained unchanged for years, they would be able to get through their Business easily. The hindrances to satisfactory legislative progress arose, in his opinion, from three main causes—first of all, that they had too many unnecessary Forms in which they allowed questions brought before the House to be debated; second, useless and unnecessary discussion, due perhaps to the increased interest taken in Parliamentary proceedings by the constituencies, and Members being anxious to show that they were “somebody” in the House; and, third, and paramount of all, the abuse of the Rules instituted for the purpose of protecting the rights of private Members. Instead, however, of those Rules being used to enable the minority to protect their own rights, they had enabled the minority to prevent the majority carrying out measures which they deemed to be necessary, and, in fact, to wage war with the country through the Forms of the House. He admitted that he had on occasions taken part in obstructive tactics; but that was at the end and not at the beginning of the Session, because, in his opinion, that which was Obstruction at the beginning and at the middle of a Session sometimes became a duty at its end, when Bills could not be properly considered. Tracing the recent development of Obstruction, he referred to the "All-night" Sitting in 1877 over that very important question, the Confederation of South Africa—a measure which his hon. Friends the present Under Secretary for the Home Department (Mr. Courtney), the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Sir Charles W. Dilke), and his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain), did their best in assisting the Irish to obstruct. If they had succeeded in throwing out that Bill, he believed that many of the evils which had since arisen in South Africa would have been prevented. He and they, however, did not then carry Obstruction to the extent of going on with it all night; and he believed that the angry feeling engendered by the obstruction of certain Members who persevered in it prevented the fair consideration being given to the objections urged against that measure which they would otherwise have received. The course of procedure which was adopted in that Session resulted in the appointment of a Committee to reconsider the Rules which regulated the procedure of the House. This Committee made several suggestions, some of which were adopted; but they had not proved sufficient to restore perfect order to the debates in that House. Notwithstanding the fact that the House in the present Session had been sitting since early in the month of January, hardly anything had been done in the interest of the country; indeed, no measures had been passed except such as were, speaking in general terms, thoroughly and heartily disliked. The Government had proposed certain measures in reference to the state of Ireland, and he had great faith in the wisdom of the Government; but he saw little chance of their measures passing at an early period as long as the present method of conducting the Business of the House was maintained. For the reasons which he had stated he asked the House to pass a series of Resolutions, the first of which would have the effect of limiting the occasions on which any measure could be discussed and, if any hon. Member thought fit, obstructed by the methods with which the House had become acquainted. The second Resolution was an important one. If passed, it would enable any hon. Member, with the assent of the Speaker, to move that the question should be forthwith put and the decision of the House be forthwith taken; and it provided that, if resolved in the affirmative, the question should be then put, provided that not less than 150 Members should vote in the majority. He put the number at 150 with a view to prevent a small majority at the end of the Session, when the House was weary and few Members were in town, being possessed of undue power. The requirement, however, that 150 at least should vote in the majority would, he thought, secure a sufficient expression of opinion to justify the carrying out of the Rule. The next three Resolutions had already been in operation. They had been framed by Mr. Speaker as "Urgency" Rules, and he thought they might well be incorporated with the Standing Orders of the House. The sixth Resolution might be regarded as an innovation; but he thought its adoption would lead to a practical and important improvement in their procedure. His principal object in framing that Resolution was to enable Bills to be passed which never could be carried in any other way, at least as perfect measures—he alluded to Bills relating to Law Reform, to Merchant Shipping, and such like. Measures such as these were either dropped altogether, or were hurried through the House at the end of the Session without much consideration. The House would, he thought, agree with him that it would be far better that such measures should receive full and free discussion before they were passed, and that could not be secured without some such provision as he suggested in his Resolution. It would, he was sure, lead to better legislation than they were able to secure under the present system. The seventh Resolution provided that a Member suspended from the service of the House should be suspended from moving and speaking for a week at the first offence, and for the remainder of the Session at the second, but should retain the power of voting. It was, he considered, unfair to his constituents to deprive an offending Member of the power of voting. The Resolution then provided for the re-instatement of the Member in the full service of the House upon Motion made and carried, such Motion, however, in reference to the same Member to be made once only in the course of the Session. The eighth and last Resolution provided that Amendments in Committee which did not appear on the Paper could only be moved by a Member in charge of the Bill. Its adoption would prevent the passing hurriedly and without due consideration of Amendments in Committee. There would be some guarantee obtained that the Amendments of which no Notice had been given were really improvements of the Bill if the hon. Member who had the Bill in charge approved of them. Such were the Resolutions he proposed; and he did not doubt that the result of their being agreed to would restore to the House the power of prosecuting the Business of the country which they had, he might say, lost. They were now, practically, unable to carry out the views of the majority in the country, because it was in the power of a small minority to thwart their efforts to do so. He trusted the Government would accept the proposals he made. They had the power in their own hands of doing so. He did not say that the Resolutions were perfect; but this he could assert—that he had heard far more objections to their not going far enough than he had to their going too far. He was convinced that if they could restore to the House the power it formerly exercised over its own Business, they would have done a good and an important work.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Debate on a Bill shall be confined to the following occasions: Second Reading; Committee; Consideration of Report; Third Reading."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

MR. RYLANDS, in rising to move the adjournment of the debate, said, the House would no doubt be of opinion that the subject of the alteration of their Rules was one of serious consequence, and ought not to be agreed to without very grave consideration. He had always been of opinion that any alteration of the Rules of the House should be the subject of careful inquiry by a strong Select Committee, or that Her Majesty's Government should take upon themselves the responsibility of recommending alterations of the Rules to the House. He moved the adjournment of the debate for this reason — that he thought the Government in such a case as the present might reasonably and properly be looked to to guide the House; and that, if they saw the necessity for alteration, it was for them, after due consideration, to propose to the House such Rules as they thought were required for the better conduct of their proceedings. A short time ago, in reply to the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), the Prime Minister truly said that there had been a number of Committees on the subject, and that in their Reports and the Evidence they had taken there was all the information that was required for dealing with it. He gathered from the answer that, when the pressure of Business was somewhat diminished, the Government were prepared to submit some proposals; and he therefore moved the adjournment of the debate, in order that they might wait to hear what the proposals of the Government were. He was, however, surprised at the transformation exhibited by the hon. Member for Swansea, recollecting the course he pursued on this subject when sitting on the opposite Benches. He was disappointed that the virtue of the hon. Member had not been sufficient to resist the disposition to give to a Liberal Government and majority powers he refused to concede to a Conservative Government. For himself, he did not look at the question at all in that light. It was a curious psychological study to watch the hon. Member coming forward as the apostle of Rules far more stringent than had been proposed before, but occasionally betraying that leaven of sympathy which still existed in his mind with the usages of an active minority in Opposition. In his Resolutions he had taken a course entirely different from what might have been expected of him. It might have been supposed that he would have based his Resolutions on the Report of the last Select Committee, which had only one fault, and that was that it was too representative of the Front Benches. But they had the advantage of hearing the views of the Speaker and of the Clerk at the Table, and they recommended various modes of improving the Business arrangements of the House. The hon. Member had adopted the recommendations they did not make, and had ignored those they did make. Therefore, to adopt his proposals would be to vote want of confidence in the Committee and in preceding Committees. Immediately after the inquiry of the Select Committee of 1878, the Leader of the present Opposition submitted several Resolutions which, for the most part, followed the recommendations of the Committee, and exhibited patience under criticism and Obstruction, one of the main Obstructionists being the hon. Member for Swansea. He said he would not offer Obstruction at the beginning of the Session, but it was justifiable at the end. But the right hon. Gentleman submitted his Resolutions at the commencement of the Session. The object of one of them was to prevent Motions on going into Committee of Supply, which often interfered with the progress of Public Business; but the hon. Member for Swansea objected strongly to it, and he had not included it among his proposals. The hon. Member, however, had submitted what he called a qualified clôture; but, if it were a qualified clôture, he should like to know what an unqualified clôture was. In the Committee of 1878 it received the support of two Members against 13, the two being Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen and Mr. Sampson Lloyd. If it had been proposed in the last Parliament, he would answer for it that the hon. Member for Swansea would have sat up all night opposing it; and he would have done the same, but he had not altered his opinion because he sat on the other side of the House. He could not understand such a change of opinion on the part of Members who appreciated the fact that great questions had to be fought out by minorities—[Mr. BIGGAR: Hear, hear!]

—and that the public mind had to be educated by discussions, often of interminable length, such as occurred in the struggle for Free Trade. His hon. Friend asked the House to pass a Resolution which would, in fact, strangle minorities. Now, why did his hon. Friend propose these Rules? Because they had in their midst Members who were amongst them, but not of them. So long as the Forms of the House were used by Members representing English and Scotch constituencies, subject to the public opinion of this country, there was no danger of those Forms being pressed beyond the point which could be considered as justifiable; but there were on the Benches opposite a number of Members who did not represent the public opinion of England. They represented the public opinion of Ireland; they came here as a hostile body; they were prepared to stretch the Forms of the House because they were not concerned in maintaining its reputation and arrangements; it was a House they had no sympathy with, and, therefore, they were prepared to abuse its Forms as far as they could. A great part of this Session had been spent in withdrawing the liberties of the people of Ireland and in accordance with the desires of the Opposition. Could it be wondered at that a minority of Irish Members, representing a people uncontrolled by English public opinion, had strained the Forms of the House to resist what they considered an attack on their liberties? As coercive measures went on, we should have still further evidence of the fact that we had exasperated a hostile class in Ireland. But let the House be careful lest to meet a temporary emergency they sacrificed arrangements and Forms which had been shown by years of experience to be the safeguards of the rights and liberties of minorities. His hon. Friend urged that the Business of the House was increasing; but was it not worthy consideration whether it was not increasing in a way which could be remedied? Centralization had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished. It was telling materially upon the time of the House, and he should be glad when they had the opportunity of considering a definite means of decentralization, so as to relieve their shoulders of a large amount of the work at present cast upon them. His hon. Friend seemed to think that the House had lost the respect of the people; but there never was a greater mistake. The greatest attention was paid to their proceedings. There were even, in some towns, mimic Parliaments held, in which those who took part in the debates assumed the names of favourite Members of that House. One was known, for instance, as the Member for Woodstock, and, no doubt, some sturdy, independent representative would call himself Member for Swansea; but after his present proposals he feared he would have to call himself by some other constituency. The proposals of his hon. Friend were not the only alternatives to be considered by the Government. There was the proposal of Grand Committees. A large Committee would, no doubt, much abridge the time devoted to the Civil Service Estimates, and be of great advantage to the country. He also thought the American rule as to the length of speeches might be usefully adopted. In great debates there might very well be some limitation as to the length of speeches. Though he was willing to consider any proposal for saving the time of the House which would not unfairly press upon the rights of minorities, he hoped that the House would resist any means intended to meet a temporary emergency which would have the effect of removing the security of those rights. He moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR, in seconding the Motion, observed that the House had just witnessed a painful scene. The hon. Members for Swansea and Burnley had formerly long stood shoulder to shoulder in defending the rights of private Members, and carried on in more than one hard-fought battle the work of scientific Obstruction; but their long political union appeared at length to have ended. The nearest parallel he could find to this tragic breach of friendship was when, in the House of Commons, Mr. Fox and Mr. Burke finally separated in regard to a great question of public policy. On this occasion he was bound to say that his sympathies were entirely with the hon. Member for Burnley. He had kept in a straight path, and the hon. Member for Swansea had been the backslider. He had been a little puzzled during part of the speech of the hon. Member for Swansea to know whether he was attacking or defending Obstruction. He dwelt with obvious gusto on all the means of Obstruction, and he specially recommended Obstruction at the end of a Session. But he remembered that no longer ago than the end of last Session they looked in vain for the assistance of his hon. Friend to put some term to the efforts of the Government to pass legislation, at a time when, by his own admission, no legislation should have been allowed. With reference to the Resolutions themselves, his main objection to them was that they threw too great a burden upon the shoulders of the Speaker. The responsibility of closing the debate was too great to be thrown on the Speaker. The experience of last Session showed that even the duty of naming a Member was difficult to exercise. The modified clôture would practically rest entirely with the Speaker; and the time might come when the minority, however much in the wrong, might accuse the Speaker of lacking in that impartiality which had always distinguished the Chair. No doubt, the power of moving adjournments at Question time was greatly abused; but could any one doubt that in a great public emergency it was most important that it should be exercised? It was not always sound policy to remove a right because it was abused, or was liable to abuse. These Rules, whether good or bad, ought not to be entertained by the House unless they were brought forward by the Government of the country. He therefore deprecated coming to any decision upon them at present, and begged to second the Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
(Mr. Rylands.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Whatever may be the opinion of the House as to the consistency of my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), who has been so severely attacked, but who is quite capable of defending himself, and whatever the opinion of the House as to the Rules which have been moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, I think there can be no doubt that he is entitled to the thanks of the House for the care and attention he has given to the subject. I do not desire, for reasons I will shortly state, to discuss the Resolutions of my hon. Friend in great detail. I think, perhaps, my hon. Friend, if he wished to introduce an effective change in our proceedings, would have done better if he travelled over a less wide field, and had confined himself to one or, at most, two or three, important alterations, instead of presenting what really amounts to a whole new code of proce-ture. As to the 1st Resolution, it seems to me that, practically, it would make very little difference in the existing state of things if it were adopted as it stands on the Paper. But my hon. Friend has explained that he proposes to alter the Resolution in such a way as to exclude discussion on the bringing in of a Bill. Though, like other things, the right of debate on the introduction of a Bill is very often abused, it would, in my opinion, require a great deal of consideration before the House should adopt the Resolution. There may be occasions when the most legitimate mode of dealing with a Bill, the character of which the House is perfectly acquainted with, is upon its introduction in the early part of the Session, when the House has not much Business before it, instead of waiting until the second reading at a later period, when the House may be very fully occupied. Besides, legislation may be proposed which ought not to be embodied in a Bill at all. I will pass over, for a moment, the second and most important of the Resolutions — that which deals with the power of closing a debate. Upon the 3rd and 4th Resolutions I only wish to say that I think they are entirely in the right direction; and when the House has time to take up this question it will probably be disposed to adopt some proposals of the nature pointed out by my hon. Friend. As to the 5th Resolution, I also entirely agree with my hon. Friend that the power possessed by the Speaker under the Rules of Urgency was not attended by any inconvenience; and I think, after some further experience of its working, the House may very properly be asked to consider the adoption of the Rule. The 6th Resolution seems to me to open a rather wider question—a question which appears to go beyond the scope of the proceedings of the House with which my hon. Friend proposes to deal. It is hardly a question of procedure with which it deals, but with some more vital principles which affect our legislation. As to the extension of the Order of the 28th of February, 1880, several of my hon. Friends near me and I myself expressed our opinions, when the Order was passed, that if anything was to be done at all the Resolution should be made more effective. We did express our opinion that the Resolution as proposed was not sufficiently strong, and would fail of any satisfactory result. I am, therefore, entirely in agreement with my hon. Friend as to the principle of the Rule which he proposes. But the most important of the Resolutions is, no doubt, the second, which gives the majority of the House the power of closing a debate. It is a question entirely open to doubt whether, as stated by my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley, any alteration of a restrictive character, such as is now proposed, would really meet the evil of which we have complained during the last few years. The inconvenience to which the House may be subjected, as was pointed out by the hon. Member for Burnley, does not rise altogether, or even mainly, from the deliberate Obstruction to which the House is sometimes exposed. Besides the inconvenience from that cause, it does sometimes suffer from having a great deal more work to do than under the present regulations it can perform. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley that we ought not to look only to legislation of a restrictive character; we should also see whether some proposals with regard to Grand Committees and other proposals of that kind which would assist the House could not be made, and whether the House could not be relieved of some of the Business which it now takes up. But, while I entirely agree with my hon. Friend in that proposition, speaking for myself personally and not as representing the Government, I hold with equal conviction that the converse proposition is true, and that whatever proposals we may make they will not be sufficient until the House does take into its own hands a greater control over its own proceedings and its proceedings in debate than it now possesses. My hon. Friend referred to the proceedings of the Committee which sat upstairs on the Business of the House, and stated, I think, somewhat too broadly that the question of the clôture was considered and altogether rejected by that Committee. My hon. Friend ought to have mentioned that the decision of the Committee was couched in very guarded terms, and certainly did not amount to a rejection of the principle of the clôture. A Resolution was proposed by Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen that the power of formally closing the debate was one which, with certain restrictions, might be beneficially exercised by the House. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Dodson) who sits near me moved as an Amendment that the proposal of formally closing a debate is one which the Committee is not prepared to recommend for present adoption by the House. A division was taken on the word "present," and the word was adopted. The Resolution as finally passed was that the power of closing a debate was one which the Committee was not prepared to recommend for the present adoption of the House. That is a Resolution which could not be fairly said to amount to an absolute rejection of the proposal for closing a debate. Speaking my own opinion on this question, I have held for some time very strongly that the arguments in favour of some such power are, on the whole, convincing and conclusive. Such power, no doubt, may be open to abuse; but I should like to know what power the House can assume which, in certain circumstances, may not be liable to abuse. No doubt it is conceivable that an intolerant majority might make use of such a power to suppress the rights of a minority. But, in the circumstances in which we now find ourselves, an intolerant minority is practically able, not only to prevent the House from discussing particular questions, but to prevent the majority of the House from discussing a great number of questions at all. By absorbing the whole time of the House in discussions upon one or two subjects, it is quite possible for a minority abusing its powers to prevent the majority from discussing any question whatever except those immediately before it at the moment; and if a tyrannical use is to be made of the Forms of the House I must say that it is more reasonable and the evil would be less if arbitrary power should be exercised by the majority who might be assembled at the time, and who probably represent the majority of the people, than that such intolerance should be practised by a minority. These are my own opinions; and I have no doubt that, sooner or later, the House will be compelled, in some form or another, to adopt this power. Almost every Legislative Assembly in the world has been compelled to adopt it; and I do not know why we, who have at least as great an inclination as other Assemblies fully to discuss Public Business, should alone be able to dispense with it. I think that, sooner or later, the great power of the clôture will have to be placed in the hands of a simple majority; and I believe that, with one exception, no restrictions will have any practical value. The only restriction required is that the power shall be exercised by a certain quorum of the House; and it must be borne in mind that in placing this power in the hands of a majority you place upon them at the same time a great responsibility, the sense of which will make the abuse of power exceedingly rare. I have thought it possible to express my own opinions on this subject, but I am not prepared to commit my Colleagues to the adoption of this principle; and I must point out that all proposals affecting the conduct of the Business of the House are shown by experience to be measures of a very important character—measures which the House has never been disposed to adopt without very full discussion, and which have always demanded far greater consideration than we can give to them to-night. Such proposals naturally involve much debate; but it has often struck me that they have generally produced more discussion than was absolutely necessary. The fact is that some hon. Members interest themselves in one subject, and some in another; but every hon. Member who takes a prominent part in the Business of the House thinks himself a great authority on the subject of our procedure; and it is quite true that there are many hon. Members whose experience does make it desirable that we should hear their opinions. This circumstance alone makes it quite impossible that any change should be effected without the most careful deliberation. We may assume, then, that these proposals of my hon. Friend require for their consideration much more time than he has at his command. Speaking for the Government, I have to say that they cannot find time for the discussion of these questions, and that, if they promised their support to the Resolution of my hon. Friend, the only practical result would be to aggravate the pressure of the Business of the House. Still, both we and the House generally must feel grateful to my hon. Friend for the attention he has paid to this subject, and must sympathize with him in his endeavour to facilitate the progress of Business, and to improve the procedure of the House. Personally, I agree with many of his conclusions, and hope that some of the changes he advocates may some day be carried into effect; but the Government cannot, in the present state of Public Business, undertake a task that is too considerable to be successfully accomplished in the course of this Session. I should be inclined to vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), which is in some respects preferable to the Previous Question as a way of disposing of a subject. I am glad that my hon. Friend has called attention to this matter, and I hope that the House may have another opportunity of resuming the discussion before the end of the Session; but at this moment I must support the Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

MR. DILLWYN said, he had always considered that this question ought to have been brought forward by the Government; but he had thought it his duty to prevent it being lost sight of. Thanking the noble Marquess for the kind reception he had given to his proposals, and hoping that the Government would be able to bring the subject before the House themselves, he would ask leave to withdraw the Motion.

MR. DAWSON observed, that the Irish Members could hardly overlook the pointed reference that had been made to them in the course of the discussion. Arguments had been used in favour of the clôture; but the Papers on the subject that were in the possession of the Government had not been laid on the Table, because they showed that outside the British Empire countries in the position of Ireland had separate Assemblies of their own, and the Imperial Assemblies had not under their consideration a vast mass of topics to make confusion worse confounded. Ours was the only Assembly that had to deal with so incongruous a collection of subjects as Ireland and India, Tunis and Telegraphy, Bradlaugh and Basutos. Home Rule was the real remedy for this state of things; and he could only recommend the noble Marquess to consider whether a better way could be found out of the difficulty.

NATIONAL EXPENDITURE.

RESOLUTION.

MR. H. H. FOWLER, in rising to move—

said: On the night that the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his Financial Statement I ventured to call the attention of the House to the omission in that Statement of the subject of this Motion; but the right hon. Gentleman then pointed out to me that I had made my remarks at the wrong time, for in Committee of Ways and Means was not supposed to be an occasion for settling the National Expenditure. However, the right hon. Gentleman stated at the same time that this was a question of grave importance and interest, and one which ought to be brought before the country; and, therefore, I have felt no hesitation in taking the earliest opportunity in my power for submitting the matter to the judgment of the House. The last time that a Resolution of this sort was brought forward was something like 20 years ago—I think it was in the year 1862 that my right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) submitted a similar Resolution for the consideration of the House of Commons. On that occasion the Resolution was met by an Amendment, moved by the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Spencer Walpole), and Lord Palmerston very adroitly defeated his opponents by making it a question of confidence or no confidence in the Government. On that occasion the House of Commons did vote an abstract Resolution, which was not so strong as that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax, though I think that almost every Member of the present Government voted in favour of the stronger Resolution. They, however, were beaten, and a very mild Resolution was agreed to by the Government, and from that hour to this the question has gone on without general attention being called to it; and the National Expenditure has been steadily increasing. It seems to me that we who sit on these (the Ministerial) Benches occupy a peculiar position in reference to this question. At the last General Election we went to the country upon two distinct issues—namely, the Foreign Policy of the late Government and the Expenditure of the late Government; and if we are consistent in what we said when we addressed our constituents in reference to the extravagant expenditure of the late Administration, we are bound to say the same here; and we are bound to carry out the pledges which we gave to our constituents on the hustings, or else, if we are not prepared to do that, we are bound in common justice to tell hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite that we were wrong, that we misled the country, and that the expenditure of the late Government was necessary. I, for one, am not prepared to do that. I believe the expenditure which was sanctioned by the late Administration was an extravagant one; and it is because I believe that the National Expenditure has been still further increasing that I purpose to call the attention of the House to the matter. I see that the Expenditure of the year 1881, which closed on the 31st of March, 1881, the gross Expenditure was £83,107,000. That, of course, appears to be a very enormous sum; but it would be unfair to represent that that amount was the real Expenditure of the country. It would be unfair to do so for this reason—that out of this £83,000,000 a large amount of work is done for the public, for which the public pays, and gets its money's worth for its money. In order to ascertain the true amount of the Expenditure of the country you must, in the first place, deduct the amounts for the Post Office and the Telegraphs, as that is work for which the Government receives payment from the public. You must also deduct the cost of collecting the Revenue, and you must also deduct the interest on Local Loans—that is, loans which the Government lend to the Local Authorities, and in respect of which the Local Authorities pay interest. You must also deduct the payment for the specific loan for the Suez Canal Shares, in respect of which the Government receive interest. These sums amount, in the aggregate, to £8,877,661, which leaves the Expenditure of the country at £74,230,000. Now, that £74,230,000 is made up of three or four different items. There is our Debt, which is a charge of £28,920,000; Civil Fund Charges, which amount to £1,669,000; the Army, £16,658,000; the Navy, £10,702,000; the Civil Service, £15,700,000; and a grant to India of £500,000. In round figures, the Debt costs £29,000,000; the Military and Naval expenditure, £27,750,000; and the Civil Service, £17,500,000. Those are the great items of expenditure, and the House of Commons has the means of exercising power of retrenchment over only two of them. The first thing which I ask the House to affirm by this Resolution is that there has been a considerable recent increase in the National Expenditure, and in doing so I shall call attention to four periods extending over two decades. The years which I will take are the years 1865, 1870, 1875, and 1880; and I think the periods that I have selected have this advantage—that in 1865 and 1870 we had a Liberal Administration in power, and in 1875 and 1880 we had a Conservative Administration in power, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer during the first of those periods is happily still with us, and now occupies the same position, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the two last periods is also happily still with us. Therefore, I am dealing with an expenditure which Members of both the late and the present Governments carried on. Taking those four periods, I find that in 1865 the net Expenditure was £60,900,000; in 1870 it had grown to £62,700,000; in 1875 it grew to £66,500,000; and in 1880 it had reached £76,100,000. If I were to sit down here, without saying another word, I think I should have established my charge that the National Expenditure has recently very heavily increased. Now, Sir, with respect to the details, I find that the greatest items of increase are the Army and Civil Service. In 1865 the Civil Service expenditure was £9,300,000; in 1870 it was £11,000,000; in 1875 it was £13,500,000; and in 1880 it was £16,900,000. Our Naval and Military expenditure in 1865 was £25,280,000; and in 1880 it has reached £30,422,000. The rate of taxation per head during those periods was, in 1865, £2 5s.; in 1870 it was £2 4s.; in 1875 it was £2 5s.; and in 1880 it was £2 9s. It cannot be said that we are at a time when the national prosperity goes by leaps and bounds; because at the present we have had a period of the most unexampled agricultural and manufacturing depression. Every industry in the country is at a disadvantage compared with what it was five or six years ago; and it appears that 1*d.* on the Income Tax this year produces considerably less than last year—a striking indication of the decrease in the earning and saving power of the country. Yet not only do we find in these circumstances an increase in the National Expenditure, but an increase in local taxation. The pure local taxation levied in this country last year, independently of gas rates, water rates, and every rate for which service was directly rendered, was £21,000,000 sterling; and local loans, which were also increasing, amounted in the last two years to upwards of £30,000,000—a fact which surely proves the necessity of placing some check upon local expenditure. Well, the question arises, in what direction is relief to be looked for? My answer is, in two quarters—the Civil Service and the Military and Naval expenditure. The first thing that I shall deal with in the Civil Service expenditure is the great increase in our educational expenditure. I am the last man to deprecate the expenditure of money on National Education; but I think that the guardians of the public purse are bound to see that we get our money's worth for our money. There is such a thing as educational expenditure and extravagant educational expenditure. I rejoice to see an increasing number of children receiving the grant for education; but the increase of late has been owing not only to an increase in number, but to an increase in the grant per head. In 1865 the grant per child was 9*s.* 4*d.*; in 1870 it was 10*s.* 1*d.*; in 1875 it was 13*s.* 3*d.*; and in 1880 it had reached 15*s.* 6*d.* Not 50,000 were presented in Standard VI., and only a percentage had passed in that Standard, which cannot be considered at all satisfactory; so that both as to efficiency and economy very strict supervision is required. I now come to what, after all, is the great source of the expense of this country—a source which is a question of policy—a source which we, as Liberals, invariably attack in the country, and which we ought to be consistent in attacking in this House—the expense for Naval and Military purposes. I am one of those who hold the opinion of Mr. Cobden that our Navy should be supreme above all other Navies in the world. Our Navy is our first and last line of defence, and no Englishman would grudge expenditure to make the Navy efficient in all parts of the world; but our Army is not so much an expenditure for defence as an expenditure regulated by policy; and if we attempt to become a rival of any of the Continental Military Powers, we at once embark upon a great increase of our Military expenditure. Let me draw attention to the increase in our Army expenditure. I exclude the Indian Army. In 1865 the number of men voted was 78,410; in 1870 it increased to 84,361; in 1875, when we had the first dawn of the Imperial policy, the number increased to 92,386; and in 1880 it increased to 108,287.

MR. CHILDERS: When my hon. Friend speaks of 1865, does he mean 1864-5, or 1865-6?

MR. CHILDERS: Then 1880 means 1879-80?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Yes. We have, in addition, created a magnificent Reserve of 450,000 of Militia, Yeomanry, Volunteers, and Army Reserve. I am passing no censure upon the present Government, as they have at present hardly found themselves masters of the situation; but I think the time has now arrived when some serious steps should be taken to diminish the outlay.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. H. H. FOWLER continued: I have said this question of expenditure is, after all, a question of policy. Nothing is so easy as to sneer at those who advocated a reduction in the Military expenditure as the "Peace-at-any-price Party." Well, I am not ashamed to say in this House that I believe all war, except a purely defensive war, is a crime; and as a Christian nation we ought not to engage in any war except in defence. And if we adopt a policy of peace, of non-intervention, of attending to our own interests, of not posing as arbiters of the whole civilized world, of not maintaining that no shot shall be fired in Europe except with our consent, we can adopt one scale of expenditure; but if we adopt an aggressive, interfering policy, we must pay for it. I want to call the attention of the House to the pressure this expenditure has upon the working classes of this country. There is a general opinion that our expenditure is a matter of very little import whether it rises or falls. A penny off or on the Income Tax is a matter of very trifling moment, and so it is to people of large accumulated fortune; but if we would realize how our taxation presses upon the working classes, and upon the class above the working classes, and how unfair and unequal it is in its incidence, you would see that there are other reasons, besides those of economy, in favour of a reduction. Our taxation is not only heavy, but it presses unfairly. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his Budget, proposes to place 3 per cent Probate Duty. Now, suppose a man dies worth £10,000. That is a large sum to be made, say, by a professional man by the exercise of his brain and the sweat of his brow. He is taxed at once £300. Another man dies worth £1,000,000, and you tax him £30,000. Do you mean to tell me the incidence is the same? But where do you levy the bulk of the taxation? You do so upon articles of daily consumption. You levy it upon the pennies; and those pennies are a serious item in the weekly income of the working classes. You levy it upon tea, coffee, tobacco, and beer, and these are the necessities of every working man's daily life. The tax upon tea is from 20 to 25 per cent; tobacco is taxed between 300 to 400 per cent. The tax upon beer is something like a farthing a pint. These are considerable taxes; and if the working classes of this country ever realize—and the day will come when they will realize—the amount they pay out of their weekly earnings for the taxation of this country, they will, as Sir James Graham said about another tax, want to know the reason why. The average earnings of the artizan class are from £2 per week to £1 per week, and with a tax of 25 per cent for one necessity, and 300 or 400 for another, you are subjecting them not only to a heavy pressure of taxation, but to an unequal pressure which no other class suffers. I hope the day will soon come when the working classes will ask to be relieved of this burden; and it is wise on the part of those who manage our financial affairs to make ready for a rainy day by the reduction of the extravagant expenditure of this country. I had intended to call attention to what the Prime Minister uttered during his memorable campaign in Midlothian. No one spoke in stronger terms, or denounced in severer language, the extravagance of the late Administration, and we as Liberals are bound to strengthen his hands. I do not believe he has changed. I believe he is the most economical Chancellor of the Exchequer that ever held the reins; and if the House of Commons will back him, he will be prepared to carry out practically and to good effect those principles which have been the principles of his financial administration, and upon which he took Office. I ask the House to pass no censure on this Government or on that Government; but I do ask you to affirm the fact that the expenditure of this country has gone on recently and rapidly increasing, and to express your opinion that it is the duty—I think it is the first duty of Her Majesty's Government to take immediate steps to diminish that expenditure.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, in the opinion of this House, the recent increase in the National Expenditure demands the earnest and immediate attention of Her Majesty's Government with the view of effecting such reductions as may be consistent with the efficiency of the Public Service.”—(Mr. Henry H. Fowler.)

Order for Second Reading read.

DR. CAMERON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said: After prolonged deliberations, Parliament has again and again, in the cases of England and Scotland, pronounced in favour of compulsory education, and on each occasion on which it has reverted to the subject it has extended the application of compulsion. In the first English Education Act the adoption of compulsory bye-laws was left optional. In the last Parliament, another Act was passed, and the result is that, according to the latest Report of the Committee of Council on Education, 73 per cent of the entire population of England and Wales, and 97 per cent of the borough population, are now under compulsory bye-laws. In the case of Scotland, a more summary method was adopted; and on the passing of the Scottish Act, I am happy to say, compulsory education became law from one end of the country to the other; but in the case of Scotland, during last Parliament, legislation was again invoked to make that compulsion more ready and effective. Having adopted the principle of compulsion in education, it was open to Parliament to follow one of two logical courses. It might either have laid it down that to educate his children was the duty of every parent quite as much as it was to feed or clothe them. It might have enacted that every parent must educate, as he must feed, his children, at his own cost, providing, in the one case as in the other, that where the parent, through poverty, was unable to do so, the parish should step in to ward off from the child intellectual, as it now does physical starvation. This course might have borne harshly on parents of the poorer class; but it would have had the merit that it would have left us free trade, which in education, as in other matters, insures competition and economy. The one duty of the State, through such local machinery as it might appoint, would have been to see that the minimum of education required was afforded; and we should have been saved from much responsibility, from many inducements to extravagance, from all interference with private enterprise, and from a costly machinery for the collection and distribution of grants and rates. Or Parliament, in dealing with the question from a logical standpoint, might have adopted another view. It might have held that as compulsory education had been enacted in the public interest, it was the public business to provide that education as far as it was compulsory. It might have decreed that schools of the sort required should be scattered over the country wherever needed, and that the education therein afforded should be free to all. But in dealing with this question, as with every question of practical politics, the Legislature found itself face to face with existing interests; and the result was, of necessity, a compromise. Notwithstanding the great simplicity and the many advantages of non-subsidized compulsory education—of a system compelling the parent to provide education as he provides food for his children—Parliament put that course and the arguments on which it would have rested entirely aside. It acknowledged the principle that, the compulsion being decreed in the public interest, the public should pay for it, and that wherever through poverty the parent was unable to contribute anything to the education of his children, the entire cost should be defrayed out of public funds, without entailing upon him the stigma or disabilities of pauperism; but when, in addition to contributing his quota to the educational rates and taxes, the parent could be made to pay fees as well, Parliament decreed that he should do so. There was no logical justification for this course; but Parliament adopted it in the interest of existing voluntary and adventure schools. Or, probably, more correctly speaking, in the interests of the voluntary denominational schools alone, for the elementary adventure schools, having neither rates nor subscriptions to fall back upon, are rapidly succumbing to the subsidized competition to which they are exposed, and will soon in Scotland be a thing of the past. The result is, that for every child in average attendance at our Scottish board schools—and, as the House knows, school boards are universal throughout Scotland—for each child in average attendance at our board schools the public pays, in the shape of grants and rates for instruction and school maintenance, £1 10s. 11½d. a-year; and in the shape of interest on the cost of buildings at least another 8s., or, say, £1 19s. in all. On the other hand, the parent of each child so attending, besides paying his share of the rates and taxes required to make good the public subsidy, has to pay on an average 12s. 5½d. in addition in the shape of fees. According to the last official Report, more than half the children at board schools in Scotland pay between 4d. and 6d. per week of fees, and a little over a third of them less than 3d. The fees at our board schools have, in fact, been generally fixed on the principle of being as nearly as possible those which ruled in the different localities previous to the passing of the Education Act. I know that this is the case in Glasgow, and I believe that the same principle was generally adopted elsewhere. The parent, therefore, finding himself charged very much the same as before, though probably for a superior education, is not sensible of the advantage which he derives from the State subvention. The school fees of his children continue to be to him the same burden as they were before. He must send them to school; but he need not send them regularly, and when they are absent he feels—I speak of the class of parents for whom compulsion is necessary—he feels that he can not only turn their services to account at home, but that he is saving the fee, which, being equal to the old fee, is to his mind full value for whatever benefit they gather from school attendance. The consequence is, that whatever obstacle the fee presented to regular school attendance before the passing of the Scottish Education Act, it presents still, and in order to overcome it we are obliged to employ an elaborate and costly machinery of compulsion. We endure in that respect all the drawbacks that would have been incidental to the adoption by Parliament of a policy of unsubsidized compulsory education; while we have sacrificed all the advantages which the adoption of that system would have carried with it. Free trade in primary education is defunct. Primary adventure schools are already all but extinguished. Voluntary schools supported by those denominations to which the mass of the population of Scotland belong—Presbyterian denominational schools—are being so rapidly absorbed into the public school system that their total extinction is also only a matter of a few years. The only class of voluntary schools which, in Scotland, can possibly hold their own against the public schools are the Episcopal and Roman Catholic schools; and their number is only 196 out of 3,003 schools in receipt of Government grants. Under our present system of maintaining what, in the course of a few years, must become almost entirely a public school system, the collection of the fees, which yield less than a fourth of the total cost of the education of each child, involves as much book-keeping and time and labour as would the collection of the entire sum by fees; and the exaction of those fees conduces to absenteeism and irregular attendance practically to the same extent as the fees did before 1872. The retention of the fee necessitates lavish expenditure to carry out compulsion in towns, and in the country makes effective compulsion impossible. On the other hand, putting aside the grants in aid, which are competed for by all alike, the payment in the case of board schools of about 2d. out of the public rates for every 1d. gained in the shape of fees extinguishes private competition as effectually as if the entire 3d. were thus defrayed and fees altogether abolished. It involves the same cost for collection, and it equally conduces to that extravagance which characterizes public as compared with private undertakings. How deeply the nation is interested in promoting the education of every child may be judged from the enormous sums paid out of the public purse with that object. In Scotland—to which, for reasons presently to be explained, this Bill alone relates—the annual grants to elementary day schools from the Imperial Exchequer amount to close on £350,000, and each year's school rates are over £200,000 more. Already, in six years, £2,200,000 has been provided out of the public funds—£450,000 in the shape of building grants by the Exchequer and the remainder at the expense of the localities, to erect school accommodation. And what results have we achieved? There were in Scotland, in 1879, 650,000 children between 5 and 14, exclusive of about 108,000 who received instruction in schools of a higher grade than those aided by the Education Department. Of these only 482,000, or 74½ per cent, were on the registers of State-aided schools; and of these only 385,000 were in average daily attendance—385,000 out of 650,000—or under 60 per cent. There was accommodation in the Board schools alone for 50,000 more than the total average attendance at all the elementary schools. This was the result of all our expenditure and our elaborate system of compulsion. Now, there is no question that, much as this leaves to desire, it is a great advance upon the state of things which prevailed before the passing of the Act of 1872. But what we have to consider in connection with the question of retaining or abolishing school fees in public schools is this. What effect have these fees in frustrating the object of all our legislation and expenditure—what effect have they in keeping away from our schools the 25 per cent of the children of school age who are not upon the roll, or the 41 per cent of the children of school age who are daily absent from school? Granted that the Education Act has given a great impetus to education in Scotland, how much of that impetus is due to the enactment of compulsion, and how much to the subsidies to public schools which, under that Act, are paid from the rates? Well, let us try, in the first place, to solve the latter question. The essential difference in the case of our primary schools in Scotland before and after the passing of the Act was this—that previously to it the schools were all supported by fees and what they could earn on the principle of payment by results from the Government grant; and, of course, in the case of voluntary schools by subscriptions. Since then the position of schools other than board schools has remained practically unaltered. They, in common with board schools, exact fees and earn their share of the Government grant.

In fact, they remain, so far as the financial arrangements are concerned, as they were; and the only change in their position is that introduced by the competition of the board schools, which, in addition to fees and earnings from the grant, receive from the local rates a subsidy, including interest on buildings, of 22s. per pupil in average attendance. Compulsion has operated all round; and it is a noteworthy fact that, in the one class of schools which has refused to have anything to do with the school-board system—the Roman Catholic schools—the increase has been quite as remarkable as in the case of the board schools, and those Presbyterian denominational schools which are being rapidly merged into them. In illustration of this fact, I may mention that in Glasgow, which possesses by far the largest Roman Catholic population of any town in Scotland, the number of pupils in attendance at elementary Roman Catholic schools had increased from 5,000 in 1873 to 9,000 in 1880, or 80 per cent, which is a little over the increase that the aggregate attendance at the Presbyterian schools, sessional and board, shows over the sessional schools which, in 1873, educated the same class of children. This fact, I think, points out that in Scotland compulsion has had more to do with the increase in number of children attending our schools which has taken place since 1873 than the large subvention, amounting to close on 2d. out of every 3d. drawn as fees, which the board schools receive from the rates. Let us now, on the other hand, look at what can be done in the way of promoting public education, by means of the abolition of fees without the assistance of compulsion. There are in Scotland 758,000 children between 5 and 14, of whom 482,000 are on the registers of schools aided by grants, and we are told that a seventh more of the entire number receive instruction at schools of a higher grade. This would bring the entire number receiving instruction up to 590,000 out of 758,000, or under 78 per cent. In America Free Education has been adopted in one State after another, and since 1871 it has been universal throughout the Union. In some States there has been a nominal compulsion; but, with the exception of Massachusetts, at the date of Mr. Adams's visit, compulsion had been found more or less inoperative, owing to the nature of the method adopted. But, as I have said, fees had been done away with, and the result was that in 1873 in 17 States of the Union—I quote from Mr. Adams's work on free schools in the United States—the enrolment of children, without distinction of age, colour, or nationality, in private and public schools, exceeded the entire number of children between 5 and 15 years of age, and in three other States it ranged from 88 to 91 per cent of the children between those ages. In the Report of the Commissioner of Education for 1872, quoted by Mr. Adams, statistics are given of the school attendance in 50 of the principal cities throughout the Union, ranging in population from New York City to Nashville, Tennessee. From these statistics, the Commissioner arrives at this conclusion—

“If the enumeration of the school population of all the cities were confined to the population between 6 and 16 years of age, and the number of children at parochial and private schools were fully reported, the total enrolment in the public and private schools would probably cover about 90 per cent of the youths between those ages.”

As for the average attendance, enrolment being so universal and the maximum school age being higher, it is not easy to institute a comparison between the state of things found in America and that which exists in Scotland; but in Scotland the average attendance at elementary schools is 385,000, and the total number accounted for in higher grade schools is 108,000. If we assume the latter, then, to be in constant attendance, the total number of children between 5 and 14 being 758,000, it will give us a ratio of average attendance to total children between those ages of 65 per cent. This 65 per cent of the total population between 5 and 14 would be equal to under 59 per cent of the total population between 5 and 15, which is the age on which the American results are calculated; and the figure I have taken, assuming, as it does, a constant attendance on the part of one-seventh of the whole number of children—those attending higher grade schools—is, of course, above anything which could possibly be attained. Nevertheless, from a table in Mr. Adams's book, showing the ratio of average attendance to total population between 5 and 15 in 31 States in the Union in 1873,

we find that in 14 States the figure of 59 per cent was exceeded, and in five States the ratio ranged from 70 to 80 per cent. These facts seem to me to prove that if you want to get the best value in the shape of universal public instruction out of the enormous sums of money annually spent in subsidizing our educational system, you will succeed better—if your choice is restricted between compulsion and Free Education—by adopting the system of Free Education than by the method of compulsion; and that, in a system compulsory and only partially free, you will, while incurring the cost and disadvantages of both systems, accomplish little more than you might accomplish by means of the unsubsidized compulsory system alone. Committed as the nation is, and especially as Scotland is, to enormous investments in school property, I do not think that the possibility of withdrawing all contributions from rates, and insisting on the parent bearing the entire cost of a compulsory education will suggest itself to anyone. The practical problem, therefore, comes to be a comparison between the present system and a compulsory system uncounteracted by the antagonistic influence of fees. If 14 States in America, by means of Free Education, were seven years ago able, without effective compulsion, to show a better state of things than we can yet do by means of compulsion and education free to the extent of three-fourths, it shows, I think, that with a compulsory system such as we possess, and education entirely free, we might accomplish the object for which we pay so much still better than is done in those 14 States. You already pay out of public moneys 15s. of every £1 spent on public education; and if you find that the exaction of the remaining 5s. in the shape of fees largely neutralizes the effects of all your expenditure, it comes to be a very practical consideration whether it would not be wiser to drop the fees altogether and see whether you cannot get full value out of the 5s. they now produce raised in some other manner. I do not think this is an experiment which the nation should be called on rashly to adopt; but I maintain it is one of which it is most important we should have an opportunity of ascertaining the results, and, therefore, one which Parliament should encourage rather than forbid. I therefore propose to make the adoption of

Free Education permissive. The Bill, of which I shall move the second reading, applies only to Scotland. I have restricted it in this manner for several reasons. In the first place, we have the entire country governed by school boards and under a compulsory system of education. Again, as regards voluntary schools, England and Scotland stand upon an entirely different footing. In England there are 14,000 voluntary schools against 3,100 board schools, and the attendance at the voluntary schools is three times what it is at the board schools. In Scotland, on the other hand, the board schools already outnumber the grant-earning voluntary schools by over 4 to 1, and these voluntary schools—with the exception of that portion of them maintained by the Roman Catholics and Episcopalians—are annually decreasing, and in the course of another decade, unless some very decided change occurs, will be almost extinct. To show how diverse is the tendency in the two countries, contrast what has occurred in England and Scotland. In England, in 1870, there were 8,281 voluntary schools in receipt of Government aid, with an average attendance of 1,152,000 pupils. In 1879, the same class of schools had increased to over 14,000, and their average attendance to 1,925,000. In Scotland, on the other hand, since the passing of the Act, the number of voluntary schools has decreased from 1,900 in 1872 to 629 in 1879. In what are called the “sessional and other” schools, a class which may be described as Presbyterian voluntary schools, in Glasgow, for example, the number of pupils on the roll, which, in 1873, was 27,000, has progressively gone down to 12,000 in 1880. In England the public schools may be making rapid strides, but the voluntary schools are also advancing, and still constitute by much the larger part of the national educational machinery. In Scotland, on the contrary, the board schools are monopolizing elementary education of every kind, with the exception of that desired by the Roman Catholics and Episcopalians, who in Scotland constitute but a small fraction of the population. It may take some time before the others are completely absorbed; but absorbed, if the present state of things goes on, they must be in a comparatively few years. In 9 out of every 10 school districts in Scotland there are neither Roman Catholic nor Episcopalian schools. In a vast number of parishes all the Presbyterian schools have been handed over to the school boards, so that board schools are now the only schools in existence. Their revenue consists of rates and fees and what they can earn by results from the Department. So far as the latter are concerned, the Department in its gigantic expenditure can have only one object; and, provided the efforts of the school board tend towards that object, why should they not be allowed to manage their local contributions in their own way? In some districts there may be objections to the abolition of fees. In some places they may amount to a respectable sum, and the number of children educated outside board schools may be such that Free Education, by bringing them in, would largely increase the rates. In a number of instances, the process of absorption of the voluntary schools has not yet gone far enough, and the locality is not yet ripe for the total abolition of fees, though it will be in a few years. But in many others the board schools afford the sole means of education, and the fees amount to a mere bagatelle. There are many districts in which the fees are really not worth collecting; and the local opinion is that it would be much better to do away with them altogether, and meet the entire expense by another $\frac{1}{4}d.$ or $\frac{1}{2}d.$ or $1d.$ in the pound of assessment. I hold in my hand a Return—No. 35 of this Session—which, to be candid, I obtained by mistake. I asked for certain particulars regarding a dozen towns in Scotland; and, through the misplacing of a comma, the information was furnished for all the school boards in Scotland. Sir, I am grateful for the mistake, for it has shown a case for Free Education in many of the remoter districts, of the strength of which I had no conception. It shows that in one school district—Kintail—where $1d.$ in the pound produces £21 15s. 7d., the fees received during the year ending June, 1880, amounted only to 13s. It shows that in Barra, of £2 17s. 4d. received in the shape of fees, £1 5s. 5d. was paid by the Parochial Board; that in Stenscholl, of £3 19s. 3d. received as fees, the parish paid 6s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}d.$; and in Moy, where $1d.$ in the pound produces £35, against £4 5s. of fees, paid by parents, £2 17s. 11d. was paid by the Parochial

Board. It shows that in many other places the net fees received during the year amounted to less than £10; and it shows, further, that in 162 out of 930 school board districts, or one-fifth of the entire number, the total fees not paid by Parochial Boards were less than the produce of a rate of 1*d.* in the £1. This accounts, doubtless, for the fact that at a conference of the Highland school boards held at Inverness in January, 1875, a resolution was passed that—

“Having regard to the fact that in some instances the amount of recoverable school fees does little more than pay the cost of the collector, and for other reasons, it should be at the discretion of school boards to give free elementary education to all children between the ages of 5 and 13;”

and this probably accounts for the fact that the Town Council of Inverness has petitioned in favour of my Bill, which practically embodies that resolution. What is the result of the exaction of fees? I give it in the words of an Inspector of Schools in Scotland, who wrote me privately, in consequence of a report which he had seen of a lecture I last year delivered on Free Education. He says—

“I write to say how heartily I agree with you in the matter of Free Education. No one who has not the sort of practical experience which an Inspector of Schools interested in the matter possesses can have any idea how enormously the efficiency of our present educational system is lessened by the ridiculous custom of making the parents pay 3*d.* for 1*s.* worth of education. Children are kept back weeks and weeks from school in order to save the fees, so that, in many country districts, nearly two months of the school year are practically lost. If a child is ill on Monday, he is kept away from school for the whole week, lest the parent should pay 3*d.* for what he wrongly supposes to be worth only 4-5ths of 3*d.* If the parent cannot pay at all the child is often kept away, while the board, parish, and sheriff indulge in a kind of triangular duel.”

He goes on to say—

“Consider the very common case of a child who thus loses 22 weeks (one-half the school year). He only pays 5*s.* 6*d.* in fees—if he pays them—and the school not only loses the 5*s.* 6*d.* which he does not pay, but the 15*s.*, or other sum, which he might, if qualified, have caused to be added to the general grant. Thus the parish is a dead loser to the extent of 9*s.* 6*d.* A great deal of school-time is taken up in collecting fees. It is said that the people will not value the education they do not pay for. At present we know that they value it at less than what they pay for it, and have no conception of its real value. Wherever it is free, as at our Heriot Schools, in Switzerland, in the Tyrol, in Bohemia, America, &c., people do value it, and feel that the children lose something when not sent to school. It is a remarkable fact that in Switzerland and the Tyrol compulsion is not needed. The compulsory officer does not exist, and the idea of a child of school age not being sent to school is not dreamt of. This I know from personal experience.”

As illustrating further the results of our present system, here is an extract from a letter I received some months ago from the master of a board school in Lanarkshire. The writer says—

“An instance of the absurdity of the present system has occurred in this district. I stated some of the particulars in a former letter to you. We have compulsory education, but the only way our school board has of enforcing payment of fees is to exclude children unless they pay fees weekly in advance. This system has increased the irregularity in attendance very much. No fee, no admission to school. The case to which I allude was that of The children were dismissed for the want of fees in the end of April last year. The Parochial Board refused to pay for them; the Sheriff declined to commit the parent on the ground of his poverty. In a new action the Sheriff found the Parochial Board liable to pay the fees. The Parochial Board appealed to the Sheriff Principal, who dismissed the appeal as incompetent. The Parochial Board took the opinion of counsel as to the effect of an appeal to the Court of Session. This not being favourable to the views of the Parochial Board, they, a week or two ago, signed an order through the Inspector of Poor to admit the children to the public school at the expense of the Parochial Board. But before this decision has been arrived at, four or five times the amount of the school fees have been expended in the various legal processes, and the man's four children have been excluded for the last eight months.”

Under the system of the working of which that is a practical example, the fees of 16,000 children in Scotland are paid by the Parochial Boards; and in a large percentage of these cases there is much wrangling, litigation, and delay. Now, of course, in all these cases you have Free Education—education paid for entirely out of the public purse—in the worst and most demoralizing form possible. Of course, too, the parents of school boards are not always successful in throwing the fees upon the parish, and in these unsuccessful cases there is further wrangling, and litigation, and interrupted education. Again, a vigorous application of compulsion may bring the children to school; but, as we have seen, it cannot make them attend regularly. The more respectable classes of our poor will not send their children to school exposed to the insult of being turned back for non-payment of fees, and if they have not the fee to send with them they keep them at home. The result is that the efficiency of the school is so much impaired. The expenditure of public money on it is in so far wasted, and the board is deprived of the opportunity of earning so much of the Government grant. Now, some of the shrewder boards have come to see this ; and in Glasgow, for example, according to the Return No. 18 of this Session, from which I quote the fact—

“The Board having given instructions to the teachers to deal leniently in cases of arrears when they were satisfied of the willingness of the parents to pay,”

during the year of depression ending in June last, £1,233, or over 6 per cent of the whole fees payable otherwise than by Parochial Boards at the ordinary day schools, was left unpaid; 7,900 pupils, or over one-fourth of all the pupils paid for by their parents, ran into arrear. The result of this—I may mention in passing—was that, notwithstanding the exceptional depression of the year, the average attendance at the board schools showed a decrease of only one-fifth of 1 per cent on the previous year; while in the voluntary schools of Glasgow generally, the decrease was $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and in the sessional schools, which educate the same classes and the same denominations as the board schools, it was $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. To illustrate the kind of no-system with regard to fees which prevails in our Scotch board schools, I may mention that in the case of Glasgow, besides the 7,900 who had the £1,200 worth of their fees practically remitted by the school board and 3,141 who had their fees paid by Parochial Boards, there is a rule exempting from fees the eldest of four pupils of the same family attending school, and charging only half-fees for the eldest of three. Under that rule, 726 children were exempted from fees, and 2,118 were charged only half-fees. Adding these figures together we find that 13,885 children, or nearly half the number on the roll of our Glasgow School Board, last year had their fees either wholly or partially remitted or paid out of the rates, and that, in a large number of their cases, the education so provided was not elementary, but the most advanced provided by our board schools. Notwithstanding all this liberality, it costs Glasgow over £4,000 a-year to keep up its compulsory machinery, and the efforts of the school board in that direction are attended with only this success, that 63 per cent of the children between 5 and 13 are on average attendance at any school. Now, though I have adduced the case of Glasgow by way of illustration, I do not mean to say that Glasgow is at all ripe for Free Education. I believe that in the course of another five or six years it will be so; but at present the same difficulty exists which would exist to the adoption of Free Education in England, though to a very much smaller extent. There are too many children being educated outside the board school system in voluntary schools. These, however, as I have more than once said, are being rapidly absorbed into our board schools; and when that is accomplished to a greater degree than at present, it will be time enough to consider the desirability of abolishing fees. Edinburgh, on the other hand, has already a large number of free elementary schools supported by endowment. Nearly 5,000 children receive Free Education at these Heriot schools, and when, some years ago, it was proposed to charge a small fee in order to enable a larger number of children to receive a very cheap education, the artisans rose in arms against the proposal. They have there seen the extraordinary regularity of attendance, and the success which the free school system has achieved. They know that the percentage of absenteeism at the Heriot schools is a mere fraction of that which exists at the board schools. The result is that Edinburgh is quite ripe for the experiment. In Edinburgh the gross amount derived from board school fees is little over $\frac{3}{4}$ d. in the pound of rating. Various authorities have estimated that the abolition of fees would be met by an extra 1d. of rates, and not merely the artisans, through their Trades' Council, but the Town Council of Edinburgh, have petitioned in favour of this Bill. Elsewhere, where public opinion has found expression regarding it, it has been expressed in opposite directions very much according to the position of those concerned. The working classes, who constitute the vast majority of those whose children attend board schools, who are familiar with the hardships and inequalities of the present system, and who inhabit cheap houses, see that it would be much better for them to bear almost any extra rates than to pay fees. The wealthier classes, on the other hand, whose children derive no benefit from board schools, and who pay higher rates, naturally dislike the prospect of further assessment; and the Roman Catholics, who dislike the entire school board system, have also pronounced against my proposal. Well, it may be said that it is the duty of Government to protect these classes against any act on the part of the rest of the community which would lay additional taxation upon them. My argument is, that the law has given Government no such power, and intrusted them with no such duty. Provided only a fee is kept up each school district is left to adjust the ratio between its rates and fees for itself. Thus, in Birmingham, the fees paid by each pupil in average attendance are only 6s. 7½d., and the rates contribute 17s. 10½d., besides interest on cost of buildings. In London, fees average but 8s. 11d. a pupil, against rates to the amount of 31s. In Glasgow, on the other hand, we pay 16s. per scholar in the shape of fees, and only 10s. 9d. from the rates; while in the neighbouring burgh of Govan, where the fees are 14s. 1½d., the rates only contribute 4s. 7½d. per scholar. Now, what is to prevent us cutting down our fees to one-half of their present amount? The difference would, of course, require to be made good out of rates; but our fees would still be above those of Birmingham, and not much below those of London. Independently altogether of what Government may decide regarding this Bill, I trust that this is a course which the school board electors will insist in adopting on the first available opportunity. It may be convenient that I should now compare the Scotch and English law on the subject. For not only, as I have pointed out, does the public education in the two countries stand on quite a different basis as regards the proportion of the work done by voluntary schools, but as regards the imposition of fees it is different also. The section of the English Education Act which regulates the fees to be charged is the 17th, and reads as follows:—

“Every child attending a school provided by any school board shall pay such weekly fee as may be prescribed by the school board with the consent of the Education Department; but the school board may from time to time, for a reasonable period not exceeding six months, remit the whole or any part of such fee, when they are of opinion that the parent of such child is unable from poverty to pay the same; but such remission shall not be deemed to be parochial relief given to such parent.”

Section 26 of the same Act entitles the school board, with the consent of the Education Department, to establish free schools; but both sections provide that nothing can be done without the consent of the Education Department. In Scotland the law which regulates the levying of fees is laid down in the 53rd section of the Act of 1872, as follows:—

“The school board shall, subject to provision hereinafter contained with respect to the higher class public schools, fix the fees to be paid for attendance at each school under their management, and such fees shall be paid to the treasurer of the board, and a separate account shall be kept of the amount of the fees derived from each school; and it shall be lawful for the school boards, if they see fit, to pay to the teachers of a school the fees derived from such school, and to divide the same among them, as the school board shall determine.”

Now, it will be observed that in these important particulars the law on the subject is different in the two countries. In the first place, while in England fees must be fixed with the consent of the Department, in Scotland they are fixed by the board alone. In England school boards are expressly empowered, subject, of course, to the same repressive control, to establish free schools, a point to which in the Scotch law no allusion is made; and, while in England school boards are authorized to remit fees, in Scotland they can only permit the parents to run into debt, or refer them to the parochial authorities for the money to pay them. Now, Sir, it may very fairly be argued that as the consent of the Department is never mentioned in the Scotch Act, it is not intended that the Department should interfere in the matter, especially as under the Code the only restriction placed upon grants is that only those schools shall be eligible for them whose fees are less than 9d. a-week. But, on the other hand, it is argued that if Scotch boards were intended to have the power of Free Education, it would have been explicitly conferred upon them as under the English Act, and then there would have been no provision for the payment of fees by the Parochial Boards. On this view the Education Department act, holding that it is not legal for a school board in Scotland to abstain from charging fees altogether; but, on the other hand, as it was customary for teachers before 1872 to make a reduction, or even entirely to remit the fees in the case of a third or fourth child of the same family attending school, it is not illegal for a school board to continue the practice now the fees are payable to their treasurer, instead of, as formerly, to the teacher himself. Under this interpretation of the law—which, I may mention, is that of the Scottish counsel of the Department—permission has, I understand, been refused to school boards who wished to abolish fees altogether, or to reduce them to a mere nominal sum. For the Department, although not entitled to be consulted in fixing the fees to be charged, can withhold the grant when the school board acts in an illegal manner; and although there has been no judicial decision as to what are or what are not the legal rights of Scottish school boards in the matter of fees, the Department—as controller of the purse—is master of the situation. Having thus explained the difference between the two countries in their respective laws regarding fees, and the place occupied by voluntary schools in their respective systems, my contention is that the position assumed by the Education Department towards England and Scotland should take into consideration the differing circumstances of the two Kingdoms. In England, where voluntary schools perform the principal part of public education, and where the Education Act has expressly given the Department a veto power on education solely at the expense of the rates, it may be quite proper that the Department should interfere to prevent a system which would alienate the voluntary schools. But in Scotland, where the existence of such a power on the part of the Department is purely constructive, and where the voluntary schools constitute not one-fifth of the elementary school system, when the most important portion of them is being rapidly absorbed by the board schools, and where in hundreds of parishes board schools are the only existing State-aided schools, my contention is that each locality should be left to manage the local finances of the board schools as it likes. If a locality finds—as expressed in the resolution which I have quoted of the Highland school boards—that the fees do not pay the trouble of collection, and frustrate the effort to get the children to school, I maintain the locality should be at liberty to abolish them. I do not ask any money from the Government to enable boards to do so. I do not propose that they should receive any extra grant; but I say that the fact of their preferring to earn that grant in the way that best suits their local circumstances should constitute no bar against their competing for it. This proposal involves no complication, no re-adjustment of grants, no injustice to England as compared with Scotland, no injustice to districts where fees are charged as compared with free school districts. So far as the Department and the Imperial Exchequer are concerned, were this Bill an Act, the present arrangement of grants would work perfectly fairly and perfectly well. You do allow school boards the widest latitude at present as regards the apportionment between fees and rates of their local contributions to public education. You allow them any latitude, from Kintail with its total of 13s. of fees to £174 of rates, to Govan with its 14s. of fees to 4s. 7½d. of rates. On what principle do you insist on Kintail keeping up a system which yields it only 13s. a-year, or a dozen other districts I could cull from the Return levying fees which do not amount to more than £5 or £10? You allow the school board of prosperous North Berwick to levy a rate of 1d. in the pound, and to charge fees which do not amount to what another 1d. would yield; while in other districts the rates run up to 1s. and 2s., and even 3s. in the pound, though the total fees paid—as in the case of Mid and South Yell—may not equal the 70th part of the amount raised by assessment. There is no principle involved in this, except the principle of local self-government; and if you admit that to the extent you do, it is absurd not to admit it altogether. Parliament has swallowed the camel, and I do not see on what ground the Department should strain at the gnat. Parliament has laid down the principle that it is the duty of each locality to tax itself for public schools; but the extent of that taxation it has left to be decided by the school board, and the school board electorate of each district. On these Parliament has laid the responsibility of deciding how much of the local contribution shall be raised by fees from those who send their children to the schools, and how much by the rates from those who may send them, or may refuse to send them, to board schools as they please, but who must pay the rates all the same. These rates may not amount to one-third of the fees, as in the case of Govan, or they may amount to 70 times as much as them, as in the case of Kintail; but the Department has nothing to do with that. That is a point on which the school board and its electorate have absolute power, and my proposal would introduce neither any new principle nor any hardship to which any class of rate-payers are not at present exposed at the hands of the same school boards, which I propose to authorize to decide as to the retention or abolition of fees. Now, I, of course, know all the hackneyed arguments against Free Education in the abstract; but there is not one of them which applies more to education absolutely free than to education three-fourths free, as is the average in board schools in Scotland, or four-fifths free, as is the case in the London board schools. We are told it is incumbent on every man to feed and clothe his children; but the State does not pay for their food and clothing. Of course not; but neither does it defray for the parent 9d. out of every 1s. expended on their food and clothing; in fact, it recognizes no analogy between the two cases. But, again, it has been argued against my proposal that it is demoralizing, and by one or two critics that is un-Christian—that it would pauperize our population and secularize our education. I should like to know how it would pauperize them. If payment from the public purse of the cost of public education pauperizes the beneficiaries, the parents of all children at public schools in Scotland are already demoralized and pauperized to the average extent of 15s. in the pound, and the operation has done them so little harm that I am not afraid of the result of the other 5s. As I have explained, the eldest of the three children is commonly charged only half-fees, and the eldest of four gets Free Education pure and simple. Are they more pauperized and demoralized than their brothers and sisters; and, if so, why is so easily rectified a source of demoralization allowed to continue? As to secularizing our schools, my proposal would leave them precisely where they are. The law provides that the school board constituency of each locality shall elect school boards, who carry out the wishes of the majority with regard to religious instruction. I neither propose to alter this arrangement, nor do I propose to alter the constituency. How, therefore, my proposal could in the slightest degree affect the present situation of religious instruction in public schools I entirely fail to apprehend. The fact is, that the provision of public schools entirely by rates has no more to do with demoralization, or pauperization, or secularization than the maintenance of streets entirely by rates, or the erecting of bridges, or the support of the police, or any other provision for the common safety and welfare which in every civilized community is made at the common expense. That expense, in the case of local services, is borne by local rates, and the incidence of those is regulated by principles which may not be absolutely fair and just, but which are well understood, and which are applicable to rates for every purpose alike. The dirty may not like to pay the cleansing rate, the rogue may object to the police rate, and the ignorant man or the philosopher to the school rate; but while each may grumble each must pay, and the public services provided by the money thus raised are the right of all men, fully paid for by the contributions which the law requires them to make, be those contributions great or small. The present system of Free Education through the agency of Parochial Boards has, indeed, an admitted pauperizing effect; but for a citizen to send his child to a rate-supported free school would have no more tendency to pauperize him than to walk along a rate-maintained street or road instead of paying a toll at every couple of miles. It may be said that there has been no general demand for this Bill from Scotland, and that a number of Petitions from all sorts of people have been sent in against it. Were it a compulsory Bill, that might constitute an unanswerable reason for rejecting it; but it is permissive. If it were law to-morrow, each school board would be at perfect liberty not to adopt it. Because Glasgow is not ripe for Free Education, why should not Edinburgh have it if she likes? But, Sir, I am not in any hurry about passing this Bill. I should not like to see the Government commit itself against a principle which I believe to be the correct principle of public education, and which is being adopted by one great nation after another; but I fully recognize the fact that Free Education, accompanied—as I think it should be—by local control, is not a thing to be forced on a nation. Next year, the school board constituencies of Scotland will have an opportunity of expressing their opinions, not indeed upon the question of free schools, for I am not sanguine enough to imagine that, whatever the fate of the second reading, Parliament will pass this Bill this Session; but they will, under the existing law, be able, if they choose, to indicate their bias, and to return Members pledged to cut down fees. They will have it in their power so far to pronounce in favour of Free Education as to resolve that the tax on school attendance in Scotland in the shape of fees shall not be more than it is in London or Birmingham; and if they do so, they will for themselves have bridged over half the distance to Free Education, they will have accomplished half what I am contending for. With every step they make in the direction of cheap fees, a portion of the financial argument against Free Education will disappear. In the United States education has been free from one end of the country to the other for the last 10 years. One British Colony after another has adopted Free Education. In Europe, for a long period, it has been the system of Holland, Switzerland, and Sweden. In Vienna, in 1878, there were 59,000 children receiving Free Education, and in Berlin 76,000. And this very year the French Government has passed a law abolishing fees in all public primary schools throughout France. If, therefore, as a nation, we are to hold our own with other civilized communities in that intelligence and preparedness for the battle of life which education is intended to call forth, it is evident we must not lag behind the rest of the world in the facilities we afford for education. In Scotland our educational machinery is perfectly adapted for the change, and I propose to have recourse to it only where the public want it. If it should cost a little more money, I do not ask the Education Department to supply it. I ask them only to give us permission to take off the brake. In conclusion, I have to thank the House for the patience with which it has heard me, and I beg to move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Dr. Cameron.)

COLONEL BARNE, in rising to move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, he felt bound to apologize, as an English Member, for having put that Amendment on the Paper; but he did so last night on finding that no one else had given Notice of opposition to such a pernicious Bill. The, as he considered it, first thing that struck one on looking at the Bill, and the names of the hon. Members on the back of it, was the absence of any County Members' names. He would like to know whether the hon. Member who introduced the Bill (Dr. Cameron) had asked any County Members to back the Bill? [Dr. CAMERON: The County Members will, some of them, support it.] If there were County Members who were going to support the Bill, he could not help thinking that in the next Parliament they might, perhaps, not have the honour of their presence. The chief reason he had for objecting to the Bill was, that it must have the effect of demoralizing the artizans and labourers of Scotland at the expense of the rest of the ratepayers. Another reason he had for objecting to the Bill was, that if the principle of the Bill was passed, it would in all probability spread its pernicious influence towards England; and he must say, on the part of his constituents, that they had the strongest objection to the spreading of any such influence in that direction. Another reason that he had for opposing the Bill was that he was very fond of the Scotch, and, generally, he had no wish to see them demoralized. If the Scotch people would drink less whisky, and be a little less Radical, he would like them still better. The Bill appeared to him to illustrate the objections entertained by many persons to the lowering of the franchise further than it was already lowered. They must perceive how prone people were to pander to the desires of the lower portion of the populace, in whom the greatest power in the boroughs was at present placed, and to try in every way to sacrifice the interests of the larger ratepayers to those of the smaller, and those who were not ratepayers at all. It reminded one of the French Revolution—of Robespierre and of Danton, who used to fawn on and pander to the mob, and who called them “Good people, generous people, noble people,” these same people being the frequenters of the lowest purlieus of Paris. No doubt, if the Bill did pass, in many places in Scotland it would come into operation. It was equally true that the small ratepayers outnumbered, as in England, the larger ratepayers; and, of course, it must be to the interest of the smaller ratepayers to have their children educated at the expense of the larger ratepayers, for the abolition of school fees must infallibly increase the rate. The Bill was one directly in favour of the artizans and the labourers, and, in the present agricultural and commercial crisis, it was, in his opinion, the labourers and the artizans who suffered the least, for their wages had fallen in very small proportion to the loss of profits sustained by their employers. If the principle of the Bill was carried out to its fullest extent, they might as well bring in a Bill to give each labourer and artizan a good hot meal every day at the expense of the ratepayer. The principle in both was identical, and he would not despair of seeing some such Bill as that he had indicated being brought in next year. He understood there were many Scotch County Members going to oppose the Bill. He would, therefore, leave the difference between the English and the Scotch Education Acts to their consideration, and to ask for information on that subject, as he must say that he had not studied the Scotch Education Act. The hon. Member (Dr. Cameron) had shown that the school fees formed a very appreciable part of the school expenses, and said that he found, in Scotland, parents were inclined, on various pretences, to keep their children back from school, in order to avoid the fees, and that the school boards were unable to collect those fees, except at a very great expense. In England, they did not find any great difficulty in collecting these fees. There was no difficulty at all in suing the parents for those fees, and if one or two examples were made of parents in this respect the difficulty would not be so great, for the rest would pay up without further trouble. The hon. Member said that Glasgow was not yet ripe for this Bill, but that Edinburgh was. He said the artizans of Edinburgh had petitioned in favour of it, and also the Town Council. Of course, if the artizans of Edinburgh were in favour of the Bill, and as they elected the Town Council, he could quite understand how it was that the Town Council were in favour of the Bill. The hon. Member also proposed to cut down the expenses of the school boards. If he would bring in a Bill to cut down lawyers' and doctors' fees, he (Colonel Barne) would heartily support him; but he was afraid he could not do so on this particular occasion. The Bill must infallibly add to the burden which already oppressed the land and the richer portion of the community; and, therefore, under all the circumstances, he could not support it, and begged to move its rejection.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”—(Colonel Barne.)

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he believed the Bill of his hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) was not supported by the public feeling of his constituents; and he was sure it was not supported by the public feeling of Scotland. He rose at the same time as the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Barne) for the purpose of making an appeal to his hon. Friend, and the appeal he should make was, that his hon. Friend should rest satisfied with having ventilated the question in an able and most interesting speech, and that he should now withdraw the Bill; that he should leave the question to be considered for the next five years, by which time, in the opinion of the hon. Gentleman, public feeling would be ripe upon the question; and at the end of that time, if he then saw necessity for it, he could re-introduce it to the attention of Parliament. For himself, he (Sir Edward Colebrooke) was opposed to Free Education generally throughout Scotland or the United Kingdom; and, having that opinion, it occurred to him whether he should not give Notice of opposition to the Bill. In fact, he should have done so, but that he had been in some difficulty as to the present law on the subject. As he read the law, Free Education was within the discretion of any school board throughout Scotland—that was to say, they could impose such small and nominal fees as almost to amount practically to Free Education; and, therefore, he thought it would be better to allow them to go on exercising their discretion in the matter without interference. Further, they could not well discuss the Bill only as a merely permissive one, applicable to certain places, but must consider its bearing with reference to the whole of Scotland; and, if it were so applied, it would be very difficult for school boards in other parts of the country to get the people to pay fees. The consequences of this Bill were so serious, in fact, that the House should hesitate before committing itself in any form to the adoption of such a proposal. His hon. Friend, he thought, had advocated this question on very narrow grounds. He had discussed it almost from beginning to end with reference to its bearing on compulsory education. It was not said that the fees, as now levied, pressed so unduly on the working classes as to amount to a grievance, in which it was the duty of Parliament to relieve them. On the contrary, his hon. Friend's contention was that, as Parliament had done so much for the working classes, they ought to do everything for them. He could not follow his hon. Friend in that line of argument. He thought that, having put the schools on their present efficient footing, they had a right to expect that those persons who had children should contribute according to their means for their education. Then, with respect to the question of compulsion, he did not see any very great difficulty as to that. In the old times, the feeling in favour of education was so strong that there was little necessity for any compulsion whatever; and, although there were now certain cases in which the parents neglected their duty, still, as a principle, he thought the system formerly existing acted soundly; and he hoped the time would speedily arrive when they could return to it. He considered, therefore, the difficulties to which his hon. Friend had referred were of a temporary character, and he looked forward to the time when there would not be that difficulty of driving the people to school, but that the people would come forward to take advantage of the education offered them, and would not require the adoption of such compulsory rules as those proposed by the Bill under consideration. The question was a very large one, and before they adopted it one ought to consider to what it tended, because it was no light tax. If it were adopted, then the rates to be levied should not be employed for the benefit of a certain class, but for that of all, as was the case in the United States of America, where large sums were raised for education; and that American system was what they would have to look forward to and to face if they agreed to the principle of the Bill. What would be the pecuniary result if the Bill became law? It would throw an additional £250,000 upon the ratepayers of Scotland. Even then it would not have the effect of entirely breaking up the adventure schools, though he believed a great blow had been dealt to such schools owing to the fact that the school boards in general had adopted the principle of religious education. He thought the ratepayers had a right to be considered; and, considering how heavy local rates were now, some better ground should be given than the ground given by his hon. Friend as to why they should adopt so sweeping a measure. Moreover, if they were to go the length of the United States system, they would run the risk of reviving the religious difficulty which had been practically set at rest by the compromise which had now been arrived at. The difficulties to which his hon. Friend had alluded were of a temporary character, although, no doubt, in Glasgow they were very great, as 20,000 children were swept into the schools under the operation of the Education Act, who formerly received no education at all. But he (Sir Edward Colebrooke) was in hopes that in the course of a short time those difficulties would cease altogether, and parents would recognize fully the advantage of sending their children to school without being compelled to do so by law. His hon. Friend said Edinburgh was ripe for Free Education on account of the success of the Heriot Schools. No doubt, there was a feeling in Edinburgh in favour of Free Education; but the question as to the future application of the funds of Heriot's Hospital was still undecided—that was to say, whether the system of free schools should be maintained, or whether they should follow the practice of other schools, and impose moderate fees. One of the difficulties to which his hon. Friend had adverted arose from having these free schools side by side with the board schools; but the solution of that difficulty was, he thought, to be found in a different direction from that advocated by the hon. Member for Glasgow. He (Sir Edward Colebrooke) had the honour of sitting on a Commission which was appointed to inquire into the Educational Endowments of Scotland; and he was led to the conclusion that these schools had a demoralizing effect upon the country, while they tended to increase the difficulty of enforcing education in the board schools. There was at present a Bill before Parliament dealing with these endowments; and if it passed during the present Session, which he hoped it would, he trusted it would be the means of introducing some reforms into these schools, and thus lead to a better system of education throughout the great cities, and Scotland generally. With regard to the probable effect of Free Education, the statements advanced by his hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) were inconsistent with those obtained by former Commissions. The general opinion of these Commissions was that Free Education, instead of tending to raise children, had exactly the contrary effect—a demoralizing effect; and that that was not the case when a moderate fee was charged. Holding these opinions, if this question went to a division, he should certainly vote for the rejection of the Bill; but he hoped his hon. Friend, having ventilated the subject, would save the House from a division by withdrawing it.

MR. WEBSTER said, he had such a sincere respect for the services of the hon. Member (Dr. Cameron) on behalf of Scotch legislation, that personally his feelings would have been in favour of supporting the Bill; but with regard to the present measure, he was compelled to come to an entirely different conclusion. He dissented from the principles of the Bill, and he differed from many of the arguments and statements which the hon. Member had used. The Bill proposed to introduce an entire innovation upon the system of education which had prevailed in Scotland for centuries, and, he thought, to the great advantage of the community. Much stress had been laid by the hon. Member in moving the Bill, and previously in a very able speech he delivered in Glasgow on the compulsory nature of the Scotch Education Act, and his hon. Friend had said that if the State compelled attendance it should also relieve the parent of the child of the fees for such attendance; and the payment of fees, in the words of the hon. Member, was described as a tax, as a drag upon attendance, and as neutralizing the good of all the rest of the Scotch educational system. The fact was that through the greater part of Scotland—at all events, in that part with which he (Mr. Webster) was connected—compulsion had little to do with attendance, because in Aberdeenshire there had prevailed for centuries, and there still prevailed, the laudable, wholesome, and honourable custom of the children attending school regularly without compulsion, and of the parents paying willingly, and being proud to pay to the utmost of their ability, the fees for the attendance of their children. Taking, as an example, Aberdeen, the city he had the honour of representing, he found that the amount drawn from fees was £6,608, and in the adjoining parish of Old Machar it was upwards of £1,000, and throughout the parishes of the county, in all upwards of 92, the amount drawn from fees was proportionately large. The Bill, therefore, in proposing to sacrifice those fees, would waste, and with no countervailing advantage, a very large sum of money, which was at present derived from the parents of the children and devoted to educational purposes, and the consequence would be to throw a corresponding amount upon the local rates, a matter to which the hon. Member did not sufficiently advert. He spoke of the abolition of fees in Edinburgh as involving only an increase in the rates of 1*d.* per £1; but he did not refer to the fact that over the greater part of Scotland the abolition of fees would add very largely to the rates. In the case of Aberdeen the abolition of the fees would cause a loss of nearly £7,000, and would require a corresponding increase in the rates. The school rate there was already 6*d.* in the pound, and it would require an additional rate of 6*d.* in order to make up for the loss sustained by the abolition of the fees. In the county parishes of Aberdeenshire a similar sacrifice and a similar rise of

rate would be occasioned, and many of them at present paid very heavily for the school rate, the rate being in some of those parishes as much as 8*d.* and 9*d.* in the pound. The hon. Member also laid stress upon the alleged expense of collecting the fees, and the loss of time entailed on the teachers; but his reference to the expense of enforcing the attendance of children at school was based exclusively on the experience of Glasgow. He (Mr. Webster) had been at the pains to inquire how that would affect, for instance, the city of Aberdeen, and he was assured that the supposed difficulty and expense of collecting the fees, and all the alleged loss of time on the part of the schoolmaster, were exceedingly over-estimated—that, in point of fact, there was no appreciable loss of time on the part of the teachers in collecting the school fees. Again, it might be quite true that the expense in Glasgow of enforcing the compulsory attendance of children at school amounted to £4,000, and that the cost in the adjoining burgh, Govan, which was part of Glasgow, was £500; but if they took the trouble to refer to the Return which the hon. Member applied to Parliament for, they would find that the cost in Glasgow was larger than the whole expense of the other burghs of Scotland. While £4,500 seemed to have been applied somehow or other in Glasgow, the expense of enforcing attendance in all the rest of the large burghs of Scotland included in the Return amounted to only £2,280—not one-half of the cost of Glasgow alone. In the case of Aberdeen, with fees amounting to about £7,000, the whole expense of enforcing the attendance of children was only £201. The fact was, the expense at present of enforcing compulsory attendance was next to nothing, and there was the Return to support this statement. The House would therefore see that that element of the case might be disregarded, while it had to be remembered that it was not the payment of fees which was the drag upon the attendance at school; it was really the neglect and indifference of parents which made them careless of the attendance of their children at school, and still more their desire to benefit by their earnings; and it would still require the compulsory machinery to be continued, even if the present Bill were to pass. All the elements of carelessness, neglect, and indifference, and that greed for the earnings would be as operative under the proposed new plan as under the existing plan; and it was the deliberate opinion of Dr. Calderwood, one of the witnesses who was examined before one of the Commissions, and who had been Chairman of the Edinburgh School Board, and who was entirely opposed to this proposed system, that, instead of lessening, it would increase the expense of the compulsory machinery which was required to enforce the attendance of children at school. It was his (Mr. Webster's) own opinion, and the opinion of those best acquainted with education in Scotland, that parents are quite willing to pay fees for the education of their children, and it was hardly to be doubted that the effects and value of the education were increased in no small degree by that practice. It is, besides, a stimulus and benefit to the teacher to give him the interest arising from his drawing a share of the fees. He left to others to speak of the effect of the Bill on denominational schools, but he had the greatest sympathy with the objections entertained by parents who might dislike sending their children to the board schools while they continue to be sectarian. He was aware that his hon. Friend did not make his scheme compulsory upon any part of Scotland; but if the Bill were passed, it would be a recognition on the part of the Legislature of the advantage of its principle; and it would be unworkable in practice to have, say, one parish in a large town adopting it, while another, only divided by a street, followed the other system. In conclusion, he maintained that public opinion in Scotland was distinctly, so far as indicated, hostile to the Bill. Only five Petitions had been presented in its favour, while 42 had been presented against it. He trusted the House would not consent to the second reading of the Bill, and if additional funds should be required for the purpose of education, he ventured to say the Educational Endowment Bill now before the House would provide a better means of improving education than would be afforded by this Bill.

MR. J. A. CAMPBELL said, he felt bound to oppose the Bill. The people of Scotland had been for a long time accustomed to pay school fees, which had been very moderate in amount, although they came to a large aggregate, and the payment of fees had been believed to conduce to a sense of independence on the part of parents, and also to the parents taking a greater interest in their children's education. His hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) had argued that if 15s. were already paid for the education of a child, the parent would not be further pauperized or demoralized by a further payment of 5s. He (Mr. J. A. Campbell) thought it might be put that the 15s. represented the interest that the public had in the education of the child, and the 5s. represented the parent's interest. Certain it was that the proposal of the hon. Gentleman, if carried out to its legitimate issues, would do something to impair that healthy feeling of independence which had generally prevailed, would diminish the interest of parents in their children's progress at school, would put a heavy additional burden on the local rates, and would disturb and imperil existing educational arrangements—and all for the sake of an experiment hitherto untried in this country, on a large scale, and, so far as tried, not an absolute success. The object of the Bill, as stated in its clauses, was simply to allow school boards to give Free Education to such scholars as were brought to board schools under the compulsory clauses of the Education Act; but the arguments of the hon. Gentleman in favour of the Bill went beyond that, and went the length of providing Free Education for all children. Let them look first at the immediate object of the Bill. The Bill was, of course, permissive only; but it was obvious that if adopted by one school board, the inconvenience of a different system prevailing in a neighbouring parish would be so great that they must look upon it as intended to be used by all. The Bill had regard to those children brought to school under the compulsory clauses, and they must all feel great sympathy for the very poor parents of many of those children. They required assistance, no doubt, in some form; but the Education Act, he pointed out, provided such assistance to a certain extent, inasmuch as the Parochial Board was authorized to pay the fees of such children as they considered to be in circumstances to require that assistance, and to do so without making their parents paupers in the eye of the law. He found that last year, on account of children's attendance at public or board schools, there were payments by Parochial Boards to the extent of £12,600, and on account of poor children attending other schools—inspected schools, but not board schools—£2,150, altogether nearly £15,000 expended by the Parochial Boards in fees of poor children. Then the school boards had been, he thought, tender and judicious in administering the compulsory clauses. They recognized that it was an objectionable thing to bring parents of poor children even so much in contact with the Parochial Board as to apply for these fees, except when absolutely necessary; and, therefore, they sought other means of getting the fees before directing parents to apply to the Parochial Board. He could speak for the school board of Glasgow in that respect. Then as to cost, it had been noticed that the cost of working the compulsory clauses under the school board of Glasgow was as much as £4,000. The hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Webster) expressed some surprise that it should be so much in excess of the sums reported by other school boards. The explanation was a very simple one. The terms of the inquiry on the part of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) for information on that point were not very clear, so that the school boards understood them in different ways. The Glasgow School Board understood that it was the whole cost of the school attendance department that was wanted, the full cost of the machinery connected with enforcing the attendance of children—and so they included in their Return the salaries of 32 school board officers, a principal officer, and three clerks; a proportion of the office expenses of the board, uniforms for officers, an allowance to a medical officer who attended to cases of sickness among the children brought under the notice of the school board officers—all this in addition to the expense of prosecuting defaulters. Now, the expense of prosecuting defaulters was only £200, or 1 per cent of the whole amount spent in connection with the enforcement of school attendance, as reported by the Glasgow School Board; and if that board appeared to a disadvantage as compared with others, the reason was, not that it had been extravagant where others were careful, but that other boards had not reported their expenses in the same full way as that board had done. For instance, who could believe that the great town of Greenock expended in connection with the compulsory clauses of the Act only £3 16s. 6d.—which, he presumed, was merely the cost of prosecutions—and that the town of Stirling only spent £1 3s.? He said that as vindicating the Glasgow School Board on account of the way it was represented in the Return. Now, what was involved in this proposal of the Bill, that children brought to schools by compulsion were to get their education gratis? What would be the effect? Why, in the first place, it would add greatly to the number of children brought in by the compulsory rules. At present the parent had a motive to avoid the interference of the school board officer. If the Bill were passed he would have a motive to court it. He would have an interest in being careless about the attendance of his children, in order that the school board officer might lay hold of them and bring them in under the compulsory clauses, so that he might get their education for nothing. It would add greatly to the labours and, ultimately, to the cost of the compulsory officers. But more was intended than this. What was argued was that Free Education should be given to all children in public schools. Well, he thought they should ask what that would cost. That inquiry was important, in order to see what additional rate they were to have substituted for fees. He found, from the Return moved for last year by the hon. Member for Glasgow, that the fees received from scholars at the public or board schools, after deducting the fees paid by Parochial Boards, amounted to £194,383. It appeared in this way. The fees received at board schools, as reported in the Return, were £207,000, and of this amount there was paid by Parochial Boards £12,600, leaving, as paid by scholars, £194,000. So much for board schools. But what about the other inspected schools? The Return did not refer to them. But the discontinuance of fees in board schools would affect other schools as well. Now, in the Report of the Committee of Council for 1879-80 he found that the fees paid at other inspected schools amounted to £55,343, so that the total amount of fees paid by scholars in inspected schools, board schools, and others, was £249,726, or nearly £250,000. That was the revenue that would be lost by the adoption of the system of Free Education; and how was it to be replaced? The hon. Member for Glasgow said that a small addition to the rate in Edinburgh, and an insignificant addition all over the country, would do. The same Return, No. 35, gave them the amount of 1d. in the pound on the valuation rental of Scotland, and he found that it was £81,000; so that in order to get £250,000 they would require an additional rate all over Scotland on an average of 3d. in the pound. The school board of Glasgow had the subject under their consideration lately, and came to the conclusion that to adopt Free Education there would involve, at the very lowest, an additional rate of 4½d., or, in fact, double the present rate. He had said that to discontinue fees in public schools would lead to a change in other than public schools. The question was, whether these schools would have to be abandoned, or, if continued without fees, would they receive a share of the rate in lieu of fees? That other schools would have to be considered was clear from the statistics of the school board of Glasgow. That board took statistics last month, in the week of the Census, so that the information was of the most recent character. It was found that in the first week of April there were on the roll of public schools—that was, board schools—in Glasgow 35,000 children, and on the roll of other inspected schools—not adventure schools, but other schools inspected by the Department—22,446—showing that there was a large number of children to be considered when speaking of the attendance at the inspected schools of the country which were not board schools. And the fees of these would have to be considered. But if a share of the rate in lieu of fees was not to be given to other than board schools, then, in addition to the rate which would have to be imposed to replace the fees, they would have to consider the great additional expense of new buildings for the accommodation of the children now attending inspected schools which, under the operation of the proposed system, would have to be discontinued. But were they sure that they could do without those schools which were other than public schools? What about the Roman Catholic schools at which there was in Glasgow an attendance of about 12,000 children—would Roman Catholics have both to support their own schools and pay the additional rate? And what about England?—because, if the system were adopted North of the Tweed, there might be a similar movement South of it. Would England be prepared to discontinue all schools except board schools? The difference at present between being able to support schools alongside of public schools and not was very much a matter of fees. With the fee, a school not a public school could hold its own; but if they took away the fee from the public school, the other would have to give up its fee also, and then there would be great difficulty in supporting it. He would only further refer to what had been said as to the regular attendance at schools where no fees were charged. Reference had been made to the Heriot Schools in Edinburgh. No doubt, in the Heriot Free Schools the attendance was very good; but that was not an illustration to the purpose at all. These were free schools planted in the midst of schools where there were fees, so that the children attending the Heriot Schools, if dismissed on account of irregularity, would be forced into schools where fees were charged. The parents had thus an interest in keeping them in close attendance at school, because there was so much to lose if the children attending those schools were forced into others. If an illustration were wanted of the effect of Free Education, he (Mr. J. A. Campbell) would rather recommend the hon. Member to turn to the 1st Report of the Endowed Institutions Commission, where he would find some curious facts about Wallace Hall Academy, in Dumfriesshire, where there was Free Education. The statistics of that school for four and a-half years from 1875 onwards showed that the percentage of scholars attending, out of the total number of scholars on the roll, was 57 per cent, 64, 62, 62, 68. Another objection to the measure was that the interests of education would be imperilled by it, because, the fees varying with the kind of education given, there was something in the fee that encouraged the teaching of the higher subjects. Take away the fee, and they then took from the school board a motive to do something more than merely earn the grant from the Department, and the consequence might be that there would be a letting down of the standard of education. On that subject he had the honour to present to the House a Petition from the Educational Institute of Scotland; and the opinion of that body, an important association of schoolmasters, was that the Bill would tend, in many instances, to the lowering of the standard of education, and they looked upon it as a measure calculated to excite hostility to educational progress in Scotland. He therefore had pleasure in supporting the Amendment.

MR. DALY, in opposing the Bill, said, that, in his opinion, the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) had failed to give the House any substantial reason why it should adopt legislation of that kind. The hon. Member had shown that the only cause to which the imperfect attendance at public schools was due was the payment of the small sum of 12s. 5½d. a-year for the education of each child. Taking into account the opportunities of education in Scotland, and the fact that certain allowances were made in the fees of a number of children belonging to the same family, he thought the hon. Member paid a very poor compliment to, and did not do much justice to, the educational instincts of the Scotch people, when he put that forward as a reason for the disinclination of parents to send their children to school. It certainly brought to the surface a sentiment not uncommon in Scotland—namely, that parents should reap the advantages of the education of their children, while they wished other people to pay for it. His (Mr. Daly's) main objection to the Bill was the mode of the imposition of the tax. He thought his co-religionists in Scotland were paying quite enough under the existing arrangement, and now they were to be called upon to make a further contribution. He considered it very unfair that they should be called upon to contribute towards the payment of 12s. 5½d. per head for the education of children whose parents should pay it themselves, and under a system of education from which they were debarred by conscientious objections from deriving any benefit. The hon. Member for Glasgow described the principle of the Bill as optional; but it was compulsory on Roman Catholics as far as regarded the contribution of taxes, because they would have no power of making their opinions upon the subject felt in the school boards. Supposing they were to give the power to boards elected by popular suffrage in Ireland to levy a rate for Free Education, what an outcry would there be from the owners of property and others belonging to the Disestablished Church, if these boards proposed to assess a rate on property to educate the Catholic children of Ireland. That principle was just the same as regarded the Catholics of Scotland. Taking into account the disabilities under which his co-religionists in that country laboured, he rejoiced to hear of the great increase in attendance at their schools in recent years, and he thought it would be most unjust to saddle them with a tax which the Scotch workman and artizan should have no objection to pay for the education of their children.

MR. ARTHUR ELLIOT, who also opposed the second reading, said, that all parties benefited by such rates as that for the maintenance of public roads, and the police rates in the public protection which they afforded; but what was peculiar about the rate now proposed was that it was used, not for the benefit of all parties, but for the benefit of those who had voluntarily chosen to incur this extra expense. The object was not to pay those expenses which people could not afford, but which they could perfectly well provide, and which they were at present able and willing to pay. That put the matter on an entirely different footing from anything they had been accustomed to as regards rating. He would admit that that was not a conclusive reason against the Bill; but it showed beyond all doubt that the benefits to be derived from this additional rate were of a very doubtful character indeed. He did not think it had been shown that the general opinion of Scotland was in favour of such a Bill; and even in Glasgow it had been shown that it would be some years before such an extensive educational change could be made. There was accommodation now in board schools for some 50,000 persons who did not go there; but if these 50,000 did go there, there would be an enormous increase in the school fees; so that a far greater proportion of the expense would then be borne by the school fees, and less would be paid by the public rates. Therefore, they had to hope that, as private adventure schools were one after another broken down or driven out of the way by board schools, they might look for a considerable diminution of the rate. But if there were no other reason for opposing the Bill, he would oppose it simply on the ground of its permissive and partial character. Really this was a matter which should be dealt with as concerning Scotland as a whole. It was quite out of the question that in one parish education should be provided entirely by public aid, and in another that fees should be charged. He did not think it right that a question of such very great national importance should be dealt with by school boards in the different parishes. Therefore, although he did not say there would not be many advantages in adopting such a system, yet, considering its optional character and very partial application, and considering also that, in his judgment, the country was not ripe for it, he would vote against the second reading.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. M'LAREN): Sir, I confess to having a strong general sympathy with the object of the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), because I think there can be no better expenditure of public money, whether raised by local or Imperial taxation, than in giving to the children of the population of our country an education fitting them for their station in life and the obligations they have to discharge; and we have already, to a large extent, adopted that principle. At the same time, I feel glad that my hon. Friend has not intimated his intention to press the second reading of the Bill to a division, because it is quite plain that public opinion upon this subject has not been expressed in such a manner as to enable the House to decide definitely whether the opinion of Scotland is for or against this measure, as the ultimate form of our educational system. It is, I think, a question of the future, as to which it is very likely that the opinion of the country next year, or two or three years hence, may be different from the opinions gathered from the Parliamentary representation of the present time. The question is one of a very large and complex character, involving considerations, educational, financial, and social, all of which have to be taken into account before we can arrive at a proper solution of the matter. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow has looked mainly at the educational side of the question, and, viewed from that standpoint, undoubtedly there is a great deal to be said in its favour. It is true, as said by one of the subsequent speakers, that you cannot consider this question apart from the mode of supplying the funds required by our Universities and secondary schools; that you cannot raise the question of Free Education in elementary schools without considering how far you are thereby affecting the relations of these to education in its higher grades. But I think the House may consider, in connection with that subject, that we do already, to a very large extent, support the higher education of the country out of the public funds. In the Universities of Scotland any person who is desirous of studying a particular subject may, for a class sessional fee of £3 3s., obtain all the advantages of that University for the subject which he desires to study. For an expenditure representing not much more than 1s. a-week he may, on any given subject he wishes, obtain the advantages of the University, and the services of its most eminent Professors. That sum represents but a very small proportion of the total cost of our University Education. If you take into account all the capital which has been provided from time to time in University buildings; if you capitalize the annual grants made to those institutions for a very long period of time; if you look at the amount of money which has been contributed to them by private benefaction, and which may in one sense be regarded as public money, since it is appropriated to a public purpose, and when you consider also the various privileges, such as the copyright and other privileges, which have been accorded to them, you will find that a proportion, certainly not less than that which is contributed by the public to the elementary schools, also comes out of public funds towards the maintenance of our Universities. Then you have to consider the schools in which secondary education is given to the children of the Scotch population; although we have no uniform system, yet, to a very large extent, they also are maintained out of public funds. In the city which I represent a large proportion of the children of the middle classes are educated at the Merchant Company's Schools, which are schools founded, no doubt, by private benefactors, but which, under an Act of Parliament, have been converted from charitable institutions into secondary schools, mainly supported from public funds, although fees of moderate amount are charged to the scholars. Our High Schools in the chief burghs and cities are supported, to some extent, from the common good of the Municipalities, and under the Education Amendment Act power is given to school boards out of the local rates to erect and establish schools for Higher Education, without any limit as to the subjects to be taught, or the character of the instruction to be imparted. Now, therefore, it cannot be said that, even under our present system, the Higher Education imposes a burden upon the middle and upper classes of society disproportionate to that which is borne by the working classes in connection with our system of Elementary Education. But when we look to the financial considerations that enter into this question, I think, too, that my hon. Friend has stated facts which are very well deserving of consideration. The statistics which he quoted with regard to some Highland parishes certainly seem to prove that, as far as they are concerned, the imposition of school fees is practically of very little use for the purpose of maintaining the schools, and that they might just as well be abolished in many of those parishes for any public benefit which that system affords. I do not say, however, that you should abolish them in the Highlands and the smaller rural parishes while maintaining them in our large towns. This, I confess, is the chief objection to my hon. Friend's measure, I mean its permissive character. I think it is impossible to deal with this question of Free Education in the manner in which the hon. Member proposes, by leaving it to the ratepayers in each place to say whether they will adopt the system of Free Education or continue the present system. The result would be that wherever the class whose children are instructed in these schools formed a preponderating majority in favour of Free Education it would be established; while in many rural districts, where Free Education is quite as much needed. but where that class have not the same determining influence in the constitution or management of the school boards, you would find that the present system would be continued. This, I venture to think, would not be a satisfactory way of solving the question. I think it must be left to the more matured opinion of the country to say whether they would abolish school fees all over the country, taking financial and all other considerations into account. Now, there is one modification of the present system which I venture to think might be considered by Parliament, even in the present Session, or after a short interval, and which would tend to remove one of the chief objections urged by my hon. Friend to the present system. I think it might become the House to consider whether the mode of exacting the fees of children whose parents are unable to pay them might not be altered. The House is aware that under the English Elementary Education Acts power is given to the school board to grant the remission of fees to children whose parents are unable to pay for their education. I am not aware that any inconvenience has resulted from the existence of that power, or that schools are more facile in granting indulgence to poor parents in England than in my country, where a different system prevails. But under the Scotch Education Act there is no power of remission; but, instead of remitting the fees, the school board is empowered to call upon the Parochial Board, which administers the Poor Laws, to pay the fees for children whose parents are disabled by poverty from paying. Now, I know that in large towns this is felt as a great hardship by parents of the working classes—those, I mean, who obtain the benefit of the clause. The people complain that their children are looked down upon by the children of paying parents, that they are said to be on “the rates,” and that they feel, in consequence, a sort of social degradation. So much is this the case, that I believe many parents who have seen better days, but have fallen into poverty, have been induced to keep their children from school from unwillingness to receive Free Education, in the form of a payment out of the poor rates. What object there is in making this payment in this way I am at a loss to conceive. Under the Education Act the school rate and the poor rate are identical. The school board makes a requisition on the Parochial Board to make a certain addition to the poor rate. The ratepayers are the same. The two rates are collected together, and one and the same receipt is given for both; and what is done under the power of paying fees is nothing more than taking money out of one hand and putting it into the other. The advantage of this mode of keeping accounts I cannot conceive, and the only object gained is that which is not, in my opinion, a legitimate one, of endeavouring to prevent parents from taking advantage of the power granted them by the Act by branding them as paupers and exposing their children to obloquy. I think the objection to pauperizing the poor and working classes might with more force be applied to that system than to the system under which education is given without payment to all classes of the community; and I trust—and I know that on this subject I have the sympathy of my right hon. Friend beside me (Mr. Mundella)—we may be able to remedy that blot, for so I venture to call it, and to enable the school boards to give Free Education without calling in the aid of the Parochial Board to legalize it. That would be Free Education to those who cannot obtain education in any other way, and I trust the hon. Member for Glasgow will turn his attention to that part of the case, and that he may be able to support us in carrying through a reform which, though one of less magnitude, would, I believe, be very much appreciated by the working classes. I hope he will be content with having made a valuable contribution to the information of the House on educational matters, and wait until public opinion has been matured on this question, which must be ultimately decided in accordance with the general views of ratepayers and the feelings and customs of the country.

MR. COCHRAN-PATRICK said, that if he was not disposed to regard as valid some of the arguments used by his hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron), he hoped he would not be accused of want of appreciation of the clearness with which he had brought the subject under consideration. He quite admitted that it was a subject eminently fitted for calm and careful consideration. He also thought it was a subject that involved changes of very great importance and involved a large pecuniary burden on the ratepayers of Scotland; and, therefore, he thought he expressed the feeling of a considerable majority of Scotch Members when he said that it would require very forcible and practical arguments before a change of such importance could be brought about. He regretted that he could not vote for the second reading of the Bill, although he was quite willing to admit that, under certain circumstances and certain conditions, a mode of education supported solely by the rate, not by payments made by the parents or the recipients of the education, might be successful; but he differed from his hon. Friend in this—that he did not think that in Scotland the circumstances and conditions were such as would warrant the change proposed. There were one or two arguments of his hon. Friend which had not yet been answered. The hon. Member based his first argument in favour of his proposed change on the fact that education to a certain extent, that was, so far as Elementary Education was concerned, was made compulsory by law. Now, he (Mr. Cochran-Patrick) entirely admitted that fact, and that it was a valid argument so far as it applied to those unable to pay; but the moment they passed the disability to pay he failed to see the application of the argument. In certain parts of his argument his hon. Friend put himself in conflict with the most advanced educationists on that point. He (Mr. Cochran-Patrick) would not quote the opinions of the great educational authorities in Germany and France, but would mention one whose opinion was entitled to great weight in that House. In an article contributed to The Fortnightly Review, in 1869, Mr. John Stuart Mill used these words—

“The State does not owe gratuitous education to those who can pay for it; the State only owes gratuitous elementary education to those who cannot pay for it.”

Therefore, his hon. Friend went beyond the limit laid down by that great authority. Then his hon. Friend found another argument in favour of his proposal, in the fact that the State already paid for a considerable proportion of the cost of education. He (Mr. Cochran-Patrick) would admit that that had a certain bearing; but it did not go the length that his hon. Friend put it. He agreed with the hon. Member for Glasgow University (Mr. J. A. Campbell) that education was made compulsory because it was a benefit to the State; and when it was advantageous to the State it was fair and reasonable that the State should pay a considerable proportion of its expense. But education had also a very important bearing on individuals. Take two individuals of the same ability; the man with education had superior advantage to the other, and it was unfair and unjust that the State should pay the whole cost of it, but perfectly fair that the individual in question should pay his share of it. His hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) had urged a strong reason in the fact that the matter of fees was one that involved a very large expense in collection. It did involve a certain amount of expense; but his hon. Friend did not propose to make education free in the sense that nothing was to be paid for it. The argument was only valid if his hon. Friend could show that rates were more easily collected than school fees. The hon. Member took a large number of instances from Glasgow; but he (Mr. Cochran-Patrick) found it stated in the daily Press of Glasgow, on the 24th of February, that in that city there were 130,000 ratepayers, and out of that number there were 55,000 against whom warrants were issued for arrears of taxes during the year. He thought that made it a question whether the collecting of these rates would be less expensive than that of fees. As to the effect of the payment of fees for school attendance, he admitted that in some small percentage of cases, more especially in large towns, there might be some persons who withdrew their children from school for the sake of the payment of the fees; but that was obviated not by doing away with fees, but by making fees payable in advance, because then they would have the same reason operating in favour of the fees as that which was urged against them, for it was within his experience, as chairman of a school board, that when parents paid fees in advance they kept their children at school for the purpose of getting the advantage of the full amount of money paid. That was entirely borne out by the experience of those who were intimately connected with education in Scotland, as well as by the general experience of other countries in Europe. In the Report laid before the French Government on the question of Free Education, he found that the Professor of one of the Communal schools in Paris said if the pupil paid a very small sum there would be more regularity in attendance than if he paid none, and this was a fact attested by experience. Other witnesses before the Commission in France bore corresponding testimony. His hon. Friend, he would admit, had reason for his complaints about the unsatisfactory attendance in Glasgow; but he (Mr. Cochran-Patrick) was not sure that he had selected the right cause for that irregularity. He found in the report of the school board of Glasgow in reference to this matter the statement that there was a great deal of poverty and distress among many families, seriously injuring the education of the children. It was not only fees, which in many cases formed a small part of the difficulty, but want of sufficient food and suitable clothing. He thought the fees, therefore, had not the exclusive bearing that the hon. Member was inclined to put upon them. A great deal was said of the example of America and other places where Free Education existed; but he was not altogether prepared to accept the statement that education in America was so superior to that of this country. Of course, the circumstances of America were different from our own. There were large endowments of land in America that were not here. Judging the education of America on three points, its quality, the number receiving it, and the means by which it was given, authoritative reports on each of those points went to show that in respect of each the educational status of America was not better than that of this country. He would only allude to one other point in the Bill—its permissive character. He thought that was one chief objection to it, for this reason. Under the existing law in Scotland there was no power in a school board to order a child to go to any particular school. There was absolute freedom to the parent to send his child to whatever school he liked; and, on the other hand, whenever the number at a given school in regular attendance exceeded the number for which the school was built originally, the Education Department would come down upon the local school board and insist on an addition to the school building. Now, supposing a single school board, in a particular district, were to take advantage of this Act and give Free Education, they would at once have children from the surrounding neighbourhood coming to take advantage of the boon, and an immediate call from the Department to provide accommodation for the parish, although the school was overcrowded by children who did not belong to the parish; and that was a serious objection to the Bill. He did not believe that, at the present moment, the people of Scotland wished the adoption of such a measure. If, therefore, it went to a division he would vote against it.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had listened with much attention to all the arguments stated against the Bill. The most cogent of these was the one that the people of Scotland were not yet entirely in unison on the subject; that public opinion in Scotland had not gone the length of supporting the measure. He thought it was a strong argument, but all the more he thanked the hon. Member for bringing up this subject, because he felt satisfied that every debate like this would have a tendency to stir up public opinion, and bring about the change which he looked upon as necessary, as inevitable, if they were ever to make their education what it ought to be. The argument about demoralizing the people by a free system of education could not be sustained, because this was the principle of education in America, in Germany, in Switzerland, and France; and could they demoralize the people here by the same gift of Free Education? That fact might be taken as disposing of that argument. The reason why Free Education was complementary to what they had already done was because they had done so much. They had established an expensive plant in the country for education; and, having done so, it was their duty as intelligent beings to make the most they could of that plant by educating their people to the utmost they could with it. It was well known that the plant already existing in the country was equal to accommodating 50,000 more pupils in our schools, and why should we not have them in the schools? They were kept back, to a great extent, for want of means to pay for their education. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had said—Give the school boards power to free from fees those who were not able to pay; and he had pointed out what was a well known fact, that their distinction in Scotland of requiring the parent to go to the Parochial Board and get the fees for the child's education was a very bad system indeed. It did tend to demoralize and pauperize the people; but he (Mr. Anderson) did not know that the English system was altogether good. It allowed school boards to remit the fees; but it did not provide for the case of Roman Catholics. But the Scotch system of Parochial Board relief gave allowances to Catholic children, even though they were not attending board schools. Therefore, if there was any power given to Scotch school boards to remit the fees of the children, it should go a little further, and give some grant to those who declined to go to board schools. That, he thought, was the necessary consequence of their having given so much power to voluntary schools as the established system did. It was objected that the supporters of the Bill did not go in for an entirely compulsory system of Free Education; but if they did not leave it permissive, how were they to get the experience which was to prove to the people the advantage of this system? Hon. Members declined to take it from America. They declined to take it from Germany and other countries. They said that in these countries the conditions were different. If they did not adopt it first in a permissive way here, they would not get experience from which they would learn its advantages in this country. Even if the argument against its being permissive was good as regards himself and others who approved of going further, it was not a good argument for Parliament, which had already in its treatment of English education made that entirely permissive. Parliament, therefore, acknowledged that the permissive system was the right thing as regards England. They had no compulsory school boards in England. The English Act did not make boards compulsory in every parish in England, as did the Scotch Act in Scotland. [Mr. MUNDELLA: Compulsion is absolute now throughout England.] Yes, where there was a school board; but there was no compulsory school board in every parish. If the right hon. Gentleman would introduce a Bill to make boards compulsory in England, he, at least, should be most happy to support him in carrying it out. One hon. Member spoke of Elementary Education being a public benefit; that it was the duty of the State to maintain it; but that, as regarded all education above that, it was an individual benefit. He (Mr. Anderson) took exception entirely to that remark. He maintained that higher education than Elementary Education was not a mere individual advantage, but was an immense advantage to the State. It was an advantage to every country to have the whole people brought up to the highest level of education that they could possibly reach. For that reason, he objected to the argument that they could not go beyond the merest rudiments of education as an advantage to the State. It was because they were behind in that Higher Education that he desired to see Free Education given. It was because he saw other countries going before us that he wanted them to adopt the same principle from which they had made their start. He considered that the system of school fees tended to dwarf the system of education under every department. It made it the interest of the schoolmaster to get as many scholars as he could, irrespective of his ability to teach them. The Department compelled him to get larger buildings, but did not compel a larger number of teachers. [Mr. MUNDELLA: Yes, we do.] He doubted whether they did that to anything like a sufficient extent. There had been an attempt made in Glasgow to adopt Technical Education in an endowed school, which had been changed into a technical school. What had been their experience? They could not get pupils from board schools in Glasgow sufficiently well taught to receive even the elements of a Technical Education. They were, therefore, at that moment—notwithstanding their having got an Act of Parliament some years ago to make it entirely a technical school—obliged to keep it still at least one-half elementary, simply for want of a sufficient number of pupils who had received a sufficiently good teaching at the board schools to enable them to receive the rudiments that that school was prepared to give them. He did not think, when they were so far behind in Scotland, that they were likely to be much farther ahead in England. Scotland used to be a very well educated country; but the education they received long ago was only a good education comparatively with other countries at that time. That education was not the same education now. Supposing they had universally in the country the same Parochial Education they used to get, it would not be a good education compared with the education in other countries of this day. He did not want to see Scotland stand still; he wanted to see her advancing. In the stage of education they must, at least, keep on a level with what other countries were doing. They were not doing it, and he did not believe they would do it until they adopted that system of Free Education. They had still to hear what the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Education Department had to say on the subject; and, as he used to be a good reformer, he (Mr. Anderson) hoped he would still show himself in favour of reform. However that might be, he believed, as he had said, that every debate of the nature of the present would materially improve the views of the country upon the subject. He would conclude by cordially supporting the second reading of the Bill.

MR. MACDONALD said, he agreed with the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Anderson), and regarded the speech of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate as one of a most hopeful character. The hon. Member who introduced the Bill (Dr. Cameron) had urged that the present system had the effect of making the people that required to get education, and who had to apply to the Parochial Boards for payment of the fees, feel that they were being pauperized. As one who took a deep interest in these matters, he (Mr. Macdonald) could corroborate that, for, as a member of a school board, his experience was that parents who were unable to pay the children's fees themselves did not care to go and sue or petition the Parochial Board to do so, because their children were stamped with the mark of pauper children on account of their asking relief. That was a thing, in his opinion, which should be got rid of as soon as possible, for he knew of nothing more degrading than the manner in which the privilege of Free Education was at present extended to poor people. There was another point in regard to the school board which the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate very properly noticed, and that was the cumbersome mode that existed at the present moment with regard to the way in which the boards investigated the cases submitted to them. The persons summoned by the school board had to go before a meeting of the board, and had sometimes, it might be, to wait a whole day to make the statement that they were not able to educate their children. They were ordered to go to the Relieving Board for the purpose of getting an order there to educate the children. The school boards had no power, as they ought to have, to order the payment of fees without having recourse to Parochial Boards. The way in which the Parochial Boards dealt with these matters was an outrage on the feelings of the people, and complaints were frequent on the part of Roman Catholics that they had to apply over and over again, simply because the children who were to receive Free Education were Roman Catholics. He thought, therefore, they ought to have the power required to deal with these cases. As the subject had been so well ventilated, he trusted that the hon. Member would not press for a division. He believed in Free Education; but he was also in favour of compulsory education all over the country. In the parish where he was a member of the school board there was a great lack of attendance before compulsion was introduced; but since then the increase in attendance of Roman Catholic children had been enormous. He was glad the hon. Member had introduced the subject, and he hoped they would yet see Free Education all over Scotland.

MR. RAMSAY thought the House must be satisfied that the question raised by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) was well worthy of consideration. Regarding the state of education in Scotland, he conceived the House was indebted to the hon. Member for having introduced this measure. In his (Mr. Ramsay's) opinion, the hon. Member attached more importance to the state of matters in various parts of the Continent than he was entitled to do. He spoke of the state of education in Switzerland and the Tyrol as being satisfactory, and that without compulsion. But that satisfactory attendance was not owing to Free Education, but to the sentiment of the people, which demanded the education of the young. If the hon. Gentleman referred to the state of matters in Germany, where there was a very stringent compulsory law, it would be found that even there regularity of attendance was only secured where the sentiment of the people was in accordance with the requirements of the law. The hon. Gentleman also referred to America; but there, according to the Report of the Rev. Mr. Fraser to the "Schools Inquiry Commission," the compulsory law was wholly inoperative, and irregular attendance was one of the greatest drawbacks to the progress of education. The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Barne), who moved the rejection of the Bill, said that if the Bill were passed the whole of the artizan and labouring classes would be educated at the expense of others. If he (Mr. Ramsay) could suppose that that measure would secure the education of the whole mass of the population, he should be very glad to give it, or any measure which would bring that about, his cordial support. But he did not think it was necessary to take such a step as was proposed, so as thereby to interfere with the existing system of board schools, and it was on that account that he would deprecate the passing of any such measure at the present time. He therefore hoped his hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) would be satisfied with the discussion which had taken place, and withdraw his Motion. In the county of Inverness, to which reference had been made, there was a large Catholic population, and it was said the teachers there favoured Free Education in the hope that it would induce Catholics to send their children to the board schools. Reference had also been made to the parish of Kintail. Now, some years ago a complaint was made to the Board of Education that the school board of that parish had ceased to levy fees, for the purpose of emptying the denominational school which existed there. The Board of Education advised the school board that it was not competent for them to charge no fees or merely illusory fees. A proposal was made by the school board that a fee of $\frac{1}{4}$ d. a-month should be charged, but that was held by the Board of Education to be contrary to the law; and, notwithstanding that they had received that opinion, it seemed, from the figures brought forward by the hon. Member for Glasgow, that they still persisted in collecting a very small amount of fees indeed. Where fees were not collected from such a cause as that, he thought the House would feel that the circumstances would neither justify the proposed change of the law nor the practice. Public opinion on this subject might arrive at the point when it would be desirable to have Free Education throughout the United Kingdom; but the people of Scotland were not prepared for such a measure at present, and, therefore, he hoped the hon. Member would withdraw his Bill.

MR. WARTON said, that, although many Scotch Members had spoken upon the subject, the only hon. Member who had supported the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) was his hon. Colleague (Mr. Anderson), who was famed for his courage, and who was always ready to rush into the breach. He (Mr. Warton) considered the speech of the hon. Member for the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen (Mr. J. A. Campbell) had effectually disposed of the arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Glasgow. The Bill, in its most important aspects, seemed to him a piece of Presbyterian bigotry. It was desired by it that the parents of children of Roman Catholics and Episcopalians in Scotland should be penalized, and made to pay rates practically twice over. He could not join in the praise which had been bestowed upon the hon. Gentleman the Mover of the Bill, whose speech he had found exhausting as well as exhaustive. It had certainly exhausted the patience of all who heard it, and it did not contain one single gleam of light to light up the dulness of that Wednesday afternoon. He had also been struck by the curious fact that all the later speakers in the debate, after having their own say, had deprecated further discussion. He himself would so far follow their advice as not to discuss at length the principle of the Bill. He would only say that that principle appeared to him to be radically wrong, and that he felt bound to oppose the second reading.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY said, he wished to show why, in the interests of Elementary Education, it was desirable that a considerable step forward should be taken in the direction of free schools. They were all agreed in wishing to get the children to school, and in promoting education as much as possible; and he thought that they must feel that the attractive method was better than the coercive and unattractive—that they would do more by setting the door wide open and encouraging the children to come in, than by setting the door ajar and then inflicting fines and penalties if they did not come in. There was at present not only the existence of the fee, but the collection of the fee was a very serious trouble and inconvenience; and his experience of the matter was that the existence of fees in the poorer neighbourhoods, and not only among the respectable poor, but among the dissolute poor, whom we had to consider quite as much, led to great irregularity of attendance. There was nothing that a reluctant parent would take advantage of more readily for keeping a child from school than the excuse that it was sent home for the school fee. Besides, the Education Department had been encouraging school managers to refuse to allow children to enter the schools unless they came with the fee in their hands. All these matters made it very desirable to facilitate the admission of free scholars to our schools. But, unfortunately, the policy of the Education Department for some time past had been adverse, not merely to free, but to cheaper schools, and it all tended to the interests of denominational schools. He contended that the schools did not exist for the benefit of certain sects, but for the benefit of the children, and that was the only matter which the Department or Parliament ought to consider in legislation on this question. It was well known to all who were practically acquainted with the working of schools that there was a great deal of rejecting and shouldering out of the school of unsatisfactory children who did not earn grants, and a great deal of picking and choosing of the best scholars for presentation at examinations. ["No, po!"] Hon. Members knew very little about schools who said "No, no!" for that was a matter of constant occurrence. They heard a great deal about pauperizing children by giving them Free Education; but he asked from what source was the education of the upper classes derived? Was it not notorious that the great mass of the educational endowments of the country were left to furnish higher education for poor and neglected children? And was it not notorious that those endowments had been diverted for the education of the children of parents who could well afford to pay the full price for it? He was not ashamed to say that he was one of those who had enjoyed the advantage of the educational endowments of Eton and Oxford; but he did not feel that he had been pauperized by it. Then he wished to point out to those who said that working men would not contribute for education, that when Parliament declared that the working man should not have the benefit of his child's services until he was 12 or 13 or 14 years old, it deprived him of an income of from 2s. to 5s. a-week, and the working classes had generously accepted that sacrifice for the benefit of the rising generation. There was nothing more surprising than the readiness with which compulsion had been accepted by the working classes; and he thought that when they already paid from three-fourths to four-fifths of the cost of education, it was drawing a very fine line to say that to pay the remaining fifth was to pauperize the people. He did not agree with all the details of the Bill; but he agreed with its principle, as he desired to a great extent either to open the doors of the schools without fees, or by lowering them whenever it was thought desirable. But what had been the policy of the Education Department? There was a clause in the Act of 1870 which contemplated the establishment of free schools in exceptional instances; but not a single free school had been established throughout England under that clause. He should be told, no doubt, that no application had been made for the establishment of a free school; and the reason was, that when proposals had been made of establishing penny fee schools, or, as in the case of the Norwich farthing fee schools, they had met with the determined refusal and resistance of the Education Department. As that clause had been put in the Act by the House of Commons, it must have been meant to work, and he thought it ought to be put in force. There might be 15 or 20 such schools in the poorer parts of London; and he asked, if the school boards were not prepared to ask for it, and thus to give a sensible interpretation to the Act of Parliament, why had not the Education Department, which had shown itself so keen in raising fees, called upon the School Board to open free schools in the neglected and poverty-stricken parts of London? We stood almost alone among progressive nations in respect to this question of free schools. He did not see that the cost for establishing free elementary schools need necessarily fall upon the rates. The country out of the Consolidated Fund might give large grants for them. In Scotland the proposal would cost £250,000, and in England £1,400,000, or, together, less than 1*d.* on the Income Tax. When the country was willing to pay that for wars, he thought it would not be a bad expenditure of public money if we were to throw open the doors of our elementary schools by the establishment of a free school system.

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, before referring to the able speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), I would like to say a word upon some remarks which fell from the last speaker, and which had no reference whatever to the Bill now before the House. My hon. Friend (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) made an attack upon the Department which I have the honour to represent. He stated that in England school boards were hampered by the action of the Department as to fees; that it has too much consideration for the voluntary principle; and that it has not yet sanctioned a single free school. Now, since I have been in the Department, I have not had a single application for free schools, nor have I heard of one, and there has never been fees proposed by the London School Board that I have not sanctioned. There has only been one application about fees that still stands over, and has not been sanctioned, and I have not sanctioned it because my hon. Friend requested me not to do so.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY: I think it is undesirable to refer to a private conversation—which is capable of explanation—when I have no right of reply.

MR. MUNDELLA: At least my hon. Friend will bear out this—that the London School Board has never made a request to the Department to reduce fees that the Department has not granted. With respect to denominational schools,

my hon. Friend seems to forget that three-fourths of the children are educated in these schools, and only 25 per cent in board schools. Whatever he or anyone else may desire that the Educational Department may do, the Department can only do what the law lays down. The Department did not make the Education Acts. We simply administer them; and I have endeavoured so to administer these Acts as to encourage education to the very utmost of my power. With respect to the general discussion which has taken place this afternoon, I think it has been admirable and instructive. The Motion introduced by the hon. Member (Dr. Cameron) was introduced in a speech of very great ability, and everything that can possibly be said for Free Education was said by him; but I am bound to say that I do not think he has altogether made out his case so strongly as to show the necessity, both for the carrying out of compulsion and for the cause of education, that schools should be absolutely free. I approach this question without any prejudice whatever for or against free schools, and I thoroughly agree with my hon. Friend (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) that they would not have a pauperizing effect. I have seen too much of the various school systems of the world to believe that free schools pauperize anybody who enjoys them. There is nobody who has ever visited the schools of America who can suppose that the free citizens of America are pauperized or demoralized by their free schools. It would be laughable to say so. You can say the same of Switzerland and various other countries; but I want to point out to my hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) that his Bill does not go on the principle of the American schools at all. The American school system does not introduce a one-class system, but his Bill does introduce a one-class system. Let him point out what he proposes to enact. He proposes to enact that school boards in Scotland may provide by means of rates, instead of by rates and fees, for the education in board schools of children resident in their districts so far as education is compulsory. Now, let me point out what the law requires in Scotland—

“It shall be the duty of every person to provide elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic for his children between five and thirteen years of age.”

So that really my hon. Friend proposes that the fees shall not be paid for children to be taught reading, writing, and arithmetic within the limit of 13 years of age. But is that the limit of Free Education in America? No; the whole of the education of America applies to the whole community, and every class participates. [The right hon. Gentleman illustrated the American system by a quotation from the Boston Public Schools' Report for 1874, and proceeded.] When I was in Boston some years ago, I saw sitting together in one school the son of a Governor of Massachusetts, the son of an Irish emigrant, and the child of a free Negro. All classes alike avail themselves of the free schools of America, and all schools are alike free. The system does not apply merely to the elementary schools, as my hon. Friend proposes. It applies also to the middle and higher class schools, and that accounts for the hon. Member being wrong in his statistics. In many schools of Boston the average age of many scholars is over 15, and yet their education is paid for by the State. The grammar schools of Boston have more than 20,000 children. They are all free. The high schools have a very large number also. My hon. Friend (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) said the Education Department ought to allow of the establishment of free schools; but I am bound to say there is a good deal directly against it, and we cannot go contrary to the Act of Parliament. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) complained about the high fees, especially in Glasgow; but the Education Department exercised no control, especially over fees in Scotch schools. The fees are fixed by the school boards; and who are the school boards? They are elected by the ratepayers, and it is for the ratepayers themselves to demand a reduction of fees. The hon. Member has said that the payment of fees enforced in Scotland under the operation of compulsion had increased very largely the cost of the working of the compulsory clauses, and he quoted America, to show that America obtained a larger percentage of children in attendance, without compulsion, than England had succeeded in doing with compulsion. Now, is that so? My experience of America is entirely the reverse. The constant complaint of America is the absenteeism and the irregularity of attendance. Boston is where you find the best schools in America, and there the schools have been provided by the State, and are free schools. They have been free from the time of the English Colony going there. Now, what does it cost to work compulsion in the City of Boston compared with Glasgow? Will my hon. Friend believe me that it costs as much to work compulsory powers in Boston as it does in the City of Glasgow, which is the largest city in Scotland? The Report from which I have already quoted shows that, previous to the passing of the first Act in 1850, truancy and absenteeism have been the most serious evils the schools had to contend with, and that they had gradually recognized the system of compulsion. In 1863 an Act was passed to remedy the evils of truancy, and in 1874 the number of their truancy officers had increased to 14. Now, I ask my hon. Friend whether 14 truancy officers in Boston, which is half the size of Glasgow, would not make the expense of working the compulsory powers in Boston quite as much proportionally as in Glasgow? If it costs £4,000 a-year in Glasgow, 14 officers in Boston, at £150 each, would cost £2,000; so that really it is a mistake to suppose that by the abolition of fees you diminish the expense under a compulsory system, because the whole of America now is agitated on this system of compulsion. But let me point out the other side of the question. As I wish to hold the balance perfectly equal on this matter, because I have no prejudice one way or another, I ask where is it that compulsion is achieved with the greatest results? Where is it that compulsion has produced the most regular attendance at school? What part of the world would you fix upon? I will tell my hon. Friend. North Germany, Saxony, and Wurtemberg, where fees are paid regularly, and have been paid from time immemorial, are the countries where there is the best and most regular attendance at school to be found in the world. What is the answer to that? I say, there is no answer to that fact. It shows that the attendance does not depend upon the fees, but on the way in which the compulsion is worked. The senior Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) said the Technical Education given under the school board was not sufficiently good, and that, owing to the present system, you cannot get a class sufficiently large for Technical Education. If the hon. Member had said there were no good technical institutions in Glasgow, I should not have been surprised, because Technical Education is of the highest in those countries where, in the elementary schools, the fees are high. I should be able to give the hon. Member the most convincing proof of that statement, if he desired it, in Papers relating to Technical Education in Saxony. My hon. Friend who introduced this Bill complained very much of the absenteeism of Scotland. Well, since I have been at the Education Department, nothing has struck me more or gratified me more than the zeal of Scotchmen for education. I have received from that country encouragements from day to day which have been in striking contrast to those I have often encountered from some districts of England and Wales. A Scotch country gentleman never comes to me, and complains that Scotch education should be "cribbed, cabined, and confined," or that the expense of it is too great. Nothing can be more liberal than the management of Scotch schools, and the progress they have made is something marvellous. My hon. Friend says there are 758,000 children in Scotland, between 5 and 14 years of age, and that only 590,000 of these are at school. But in that statement my hon. Friend is quite mistaken. I take the last Report of the Education Department, and I think I will be able to show him that he has seriously miscalculated his figures. In 1871 the number of scholars on the school registers of Scotland in public schools was 252,802. In 1880, when the last Returns were made up, there were on the register of public schools alone 534,423, there having been an increase of nearly 50,000 in the last year. My hon. Friend himself admitted that 108,000 were in other schools, and there are 55,000 in schools which are recognized and inspected by the Department and receiving an annual grant. From those figures, I think he will find that 650,000 of the 758,000 of the children of Scotland are thus accounted for; and if there is a balance not accounted for, it is not difficult to show where they may be found, because the compulsory age in Scotland ranges from 5 to 13, and the hon. Member reckoned all the children of school age between 5 and 14. I believe I should be right in saying that the great majority of the children between 5 and 6 years of age do not attend school. Owing to the climate of the country, it is difficult to enforce the attendance of those so young. Besides that, a large number are passed out for labour between 13 and 14; and I ask the House whether there is any real discrepancy between the Scotch population and the number of children who attend school? I ought to say that the average attendance last year in these schools was 404,608. The senior Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) says we get the children to school, and we do not teach them anything; that our object is to get the numbers, and that we do not teach them anything. But in that opinion he is quite wrong. It is only by results that the Education Department pay, and unless certain percentages are passed they do not get their grant. My hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) says we do not insist upon a sufficient number of teachers; but he is also quite mistaken there; because unless the proportion is kept up to a certain number of scholars, the grant is disallowed, and every school is only too anxious to keep up the staff of teachers. My hon. Friend told us about the work of Free Education in the Heriot schools in Edinburgh. Well, that was answered at once by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow University (Mr. A. J. Campbell). The Heriot schools are schools not for the very poorest classes. They are rather for the better working class, and yet there are 5,000 scholars in the Heriot schools receiving a free education. Upon what condition? Upon the condition that they make a regular attendance. Any child irregular in attendance is immediately expelled. But if you had under this Bill Free Education throughout Scotland, how could you expel children from board schools for irregularity of attendance? The fact is, you give the Heriot scholars education as a bribe for regular attendance, and put a penalty upon children who do not attend regularly. It is not a case to be quoted for the advantage of free schools. Now, I will just ask the House to consider for a few moments why my hon. Friend ought not to press his Motion. I believe that so far from being a measure in favour of education, it would be a very serious obstacle to the progress of education in Scotland. I do not say that the time may not come when Scotland may have a free-school system; but I think we shall all agree that it cannot be adopted without the general assent of the Scotch Representatives in this House and the Scotch people. There have been 9 or 10 hon. Members from Scotland who have spoken on this question; but only one, besides the hon. Member who introduced it, has spoken in its favour. What is the feeling of the country? I have here a list of Petitions presented. There have been 40 Petitions presented, many of them from most important localities and representative bodies against the measure. One comes from the Convention of Royal and Parliamentary Burghs, representing the Town Councils practically of 100 different parts of Scotland. Well, only two Members when it came to a division voted in favour of the Bill, and all the rest voted against it. Well, then, a very important school board Petition against it—the school board of Dundee—and eight or nine other school boards, and many other important representative bodies petitioned. On the other hand, there are just five Petitions in its favour, and I do not think my hon. Friend will claim that Scotland cares anything about the Bill, but is rather opposed to it than otherwise. Well, what would be the financial effect of the measure? It was said it was only a permissive measure, and will only be adopted by those school boards where the population are generally favourable to it. Let me point out to the hon. Member how it will operate. There are 220 school boards, and two or three of the boards have only one school. Suppose one board passes a resolution, what are the others to do? How can you enforce the system in the schools where there is competition? It would require all the school boards to agree. You would have a conflict in the parishes. Then what would be the cost of this? My hon. Friend has stated that the rate would be very small. Taken from one end of Scotland to another, the rates would be increased by an average of 3*d.* in the £1. In some cases it would be increased as much as 20*d.* in the £1. Well, with the feeling against rates in Scotland, what would be the result? Would not this be to hinder the work of the school board? How would the higher education fare under these circumstances? Would it not tend to cut the work down to the very lower Elementary Education, instead of widening and raising it so that all classes may enjoy the benefits of a higher education? I have made out a list of the rates required to meet the existing fees of the school board, and I find in 117 parishes they would require 3*d.* in the £1, in 44 it would be 4*d.*, in 35 it would be 5*d.*, in 26 it would be 6*d.*, in 10 parishes, 7*d.*, and so on it goes until it comes to 20*d.* in the £1. But that does not wholly express the financial cost. It will be very much larger than I stated. I want to point out to my hon. Friend how it would affect Glasgow itself. He admitted there were 35,000 children attending board schools in Glasgow, and that there were 23,000 attending voluntary schools. Well, suppose you make the school board schools—the schools with an attendance of 35,000—free, what will happen to those schools where the other 23,000 children are educated, and how are you going to deal with the 12,000 Roman Catholics? Are you going to make the 12,000 Catholics in Glasgow pay their share for the free teaching of those 35,000 children in the board schools, and for the teaching, mind you, of what is practically a Presbyterian faith and the Bible and the Shorter Catechism? [“No, no!”] Why, do you suppose that is not the case in the Scotch schools? Are you going to make the Catholics pay for the teaching of the Presbyterian faith, and require them also to maintain their own children entirely at their own cost? Considering how difficult it is to meet this religious question, considering how necessary it is that you should have freedom of choice for the parents, because without freedom of choice for the parents you cannot enforce compulsion, the proposal is surrounded with objections. Look how you increase your educational difficulties. It is quite true that, if we had to be begin de novo, we should have a different educational system than we have at the present time. We have arrived at a modus vivendi; the Education Act is a compromise, and a compromise that is working well, and under it we may have the best education with the least possible friction. If you introduce this free system, it seems to me that you will have the very greatest difficulty. You will bring about difficulties that you do not anticipate, and I think it would be far better that Scotland should go on improving, strengthening, and widening the quality of her education, rather than involve herself in new difficulties by this mode of expenditure. I do not think it would be so good for the working men all round as the hon. Member thinks. I know he has pleaded it would relieve the working men a good deal. I am not so sure of that. For one of two things would happen—either you must continue to make it a narrow class question, or allow the higher education to be taught as well as the elementary. Well, if you are to do that you will increase the cost to the working men, because you will increase the rates so largely that he will better pay the present school fees. At present a working man has to pay fees only so long as his children are at school; and you say he had better pay 5*s.* a-year constantly than pay 12*s.* a-year for the time his children are at school. But if you increase the cost of education so much that the rates are very largely enhanced, it will be a burden to the working-man, because the rates have to be paid by him before his own children can go to school, and he must pay them after they leave school, or if he has no children at all, and the rates would remain a burden to him as long as he is a householder. If the hon. Member desires to go to a division I will not, for a moment, stand in his way; but I appeal to him to withdraw the Bill. He sees that the Scotch Members are against it; the Scotch people are not on his side. If he wishes an Act of this kind to pass the House, I think he must amend his Bill, and come with public opinion more strongly behind him than he has got it. My hon. Friend the senior Member for Glasgow hoped I had not lost my zeal for education. I hope so too, and that I may be useful to Scotland in my office. I am encouraged by what I do for Scotland and by what Scotland does for education. I hope we shall pass this year that Scotch Endowments Bill which will decidedly build up and improve the character of Scotch education. I often say that if I could be born again I would be born a Scotchman, for the benefits Scotland confers upon her children in the way of education. I hope, therefore, that the reasons I have urged, and many more that might be urged, will

MR. DONALDSON-HUDSON said, that although Members on this side of the House had been twitted by the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) with ignorance upon educational questions, they knew enough to be able to see that the Bill was conceived in a spirit of hostility to denominational schools. During the time in which he had sat upon the London School Board with the hon. Member for Oldham the effect of the policy which the hon. Member, who was supporting the Bill, had persistently advocated was one of injury to voluntary schools. All that the opponents of the Bill asked for the denominational schools was fair play. They did not oppose the Bill solely in the interests of denominational schools; but they protested against the denominational schools being handicapped in the unfair way in which the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) sought to do it.

DR. CAMERON said, that although, at that hour, he could not attempt to reply to the arguments put forward by the Vice President of the Council (Mr. Mundella) against his proposal, he must not be considered as admitting them. He should not, however, ask the House to divide on the Bill, for he did not really care about a division. As to the objection that the Bill did not provide for higher education being free, if that was all, he was willing to amend it in that respect.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL—THE COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I wish to ask the noble Earl opposite, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, a Question of which I have given him private

Notice. I have seen in a London newspaper a telegram, dated Newcastle, Tuesday, in which it is stated that—

“The Commission has arrived at a very important decision with reference to the non-delivery of the Potchefstroom guns. They have determined that until the guns are surrendered they will not enter the Transvaal.”

I should like to know, Whether that statement is correct; and, if so, whether it will involve any suspension in the business which the Commission has to transact? It is also reported that—

“There is news from Pretoria that commandeering on an extensive scale is going on there for war against the Native chief Montsuine, who remained loyal to us. The natives near Pretoria are coming in there in numbers to escape being commandeered by the Boers.”

If this be true, the fact is incompatible with the supposition that the Boer Leaders are enforcing their decisions upon their followers; and if such a state of things were allowed to continue, it may result in fatal consequences. I will not trouble the House at present with any further comments on these two statements, except to observe that they are statements of extreme gravity.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, it was decided a month ago that for various reasons, and especially the absence of telegraphic communication with the Transvaal, the Commission should sit at Newcastle, in Natal, and we have not heard of any proposal to change the place of meeting. The most recent intelligence of any disputes between the Boers and Native tribes was received on the 12th instant, when Sir Evelyn Wood reported that Major Buller and Mr. Joubert were going to the Keete Award territory to part the Boers and the tribe of Montsia, a Bechuana Chief. It is not stated that the Boers were commandeering Natives.

AFFAIRS OF TUNIS.

POSTPONEMENT OF MOTION.

EARL DE LA WARR gave Notice that he would postpone his Motion relative to the affairs of Tunis till an early day, when he hoped that the Papers promised by Her Majesty's Government would be upon the Table of the House.

EARL GRANVILLE: I beg to present to the House Papers with respect to the affairs of Tunis. I hope that a large portion of them will be in the hands of your Lordships to-morrow; but I can scarcely hope that they will all be delivered by that time.

TRAMWAYS (IRELAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 74.)
(The Lord Monteagle.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clauses 1 to 4, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Regulations as to speed of locomotives on tramways).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON wished to draw attention to the fact that, while the width of road on which tramways might be constructed was reduced from 25 feet to 18 feet, the cars were authorized to run at a speed of 10 miles per hour. It seemed to him that there was no necessity for such a speed, and that it could not be unattended with danger to the public.

LORD MONTEAGLE observed, that in regard to tramways in the neighbourhood of London, similar to those sought to be authorized by the Bill, a speed of 10 miles an hour had been agreed to by Parliament. The tramways were to be constructed in country districts; but even in the case of cities, such as Bristol, a speed of eight miles through busy streets had been sanctioned.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON thought that even in country districts 10 miles an hour was too high a rate of speed.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, he could not concur in that opinion, and hoped their Lordships would not adopt the over-cautious view of the noble Duke.

THE EARL OF COURTOWN, in supporting the clause, said, that the consent of the Grand Juries of the counties in which the tramways were to be constructed was required; and they were well acquainted with the roads and with the nature of the traffic which might be expected to be carried over them.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to, with Amendments: The Report thereof to be received on Tuesday next.

QUESTION.

LORD MONTEAGLE, in rising to call attention to the "First Report of the Controller of Her Majesty's Stationery Office," lately presented to Parliament by command of Her Majesty, said, that the Report showed a very great increase in the cost of stationery and printing during the last few years, but that a saving, estimated at £55,000, had been effected by making certain changes in the contracts for printing. It was a remarkable fact, that whereas in 1823 the cost of the Stationery Department had been only £68,000, it amounted last year to £460,000. It appeared that each House had a separate printer, and this involved in some cases duplicate printing, the cost of which could be saved if both Houses had the same printer. Their Lordships' printing was done at a much more moderate rate than that of the other House; and the figures seemed to show that a considerable saving might be effected if the printing contracts of the Houses were subject to competition, as were the printing contracts for the Government Departments. He, therefore, begged to ask, in the terms of his Notice, Whether Her Majesty's Government proposed to institute inquiries as to the possibility of effecting improvements in the printing and publishing of Acts of Parliament, and other Official papers?

Earl Granville

LORD THURLOW said, the Report to which the noble Lord had called attention was one of considerable interest, being the first of its kind presented to Parliament by a Department which had been steadily growing in importance ever since its creation, just 100 years ago, and which now exercised annual control over upwards of £500,000—its gross expenditure in 1879-80 being £568,377. In reply to the Question of the noble Lord, he had to state that the Report of the Controller of Her Majesty's Stationery Office had received the careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government, who proposed to institute inquiries as to the possibility of effecting improvements in the printing and publishing of Acts of Parliament and other Official papers. In the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, this Inquiry should take the shape of a joint Committee of both Houses; and the exact scope of the Reference to that Committee would remain to be hereafter determined, but would certainly include a revision of what was known as the "promulgation list," a somewhat anti-quoted and obsolete document, more particularly described at page 12 of the Report. It would also include all points connected with the printing, storage, and publication of Acts of Parliament, Orders in Council, and Parliamentary Papers which required consideration. The Committee would further inquire in what manner the many reforms and economies recently introduced and proposed in Her Majesty's Stationery Office might best be supplemented and carried out. The Report was a singularly concise and satisfactory document, and would well repay the perusal of all interested in the subject. He begged to give Notice that on that day week he would move on behalf of Her Majesty's Government for the appointment of the Committee in question.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD LAMINGTON asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether the report is true that certain Foreign Powers had made representations to them respecting the right of asylum for political offenders in this country; and, if so, whether the correspondence will be laid on the Table? He attached considerable importance to the report, because early in April the German Parliament all but unanimously passed a Resolution advocating International Treaties for the prosecution and extradition of persons guilty of attacks against the Chiefs of States. It was pointed out that the attempts of the Nihilists and other political refugees were often directed not only against one, but against all Governments, and therefore the action taken should be of an international character. Instigation to these crimes was to be regarded as conspiring, and the nationality of the offender was to make no difference in the application of the law. To provoke to murder was more wicked than to murder, and to tempt more devilish than to fall. Their Lordships would agree with him that the feeling abroad was almost universal that there should not be any right of asylum in the case of political murderers, or would-be murderers. In Austria it was proposed recently in the Reichstag that a Treaty should be negotiated with other Governments to extradite foreigners guilty of the offence of conspiracy to assassinate Sovereigns. In 1876, even Belgium, which was one of the freest countries in the world, declared that an attack on or murder of any Sovereign or of any member of his family was without the pale of the right of asylum. His attention was drawn to a meeting held in this City, on the 16th of April, at the rooms of the Slavonic Club, Hampstead Street, Fitzroy Square, which was attended by persons of all nationalities, when it was proposed and carried—"That this meeting expresses its profound sympathy with the martyrs of liberty hanged at St. Petersburg;" and it was added—"The present Czar must not think that he would reign long if he did as his father had done." He was perfectly aware of the difficulty the Government had to deal with in this matter; but though Englishmen had a right to pride themselves on the fact that England afforded a safe asylum for political refugees from all nations, still, when such a Chamber as that of Belgium had taken measures to provide against the abuse of the right of asylum, we ought not to neglect co-operating with other countries in the endeavour to exclude conspirators from our midst, and those who did not hesitate to instigate to murder. He trusted, therefore, that Government would not hesitate to give a favourable reply to any representation which might be made to them on the subject by foreign Powers.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I cannot help thinking that the noble Lord has spoken under some misapprehension of the facts of the case. No representation has been made to Her Majesty's Government in regard to the right of asylum for political offenders. This question has been repeatedly raised, and the decision of this country is now so well known abroad that it is not likely that any representations will be made again. In 1852 I held the Seals of the Foreign Office only for two months; but during that short time it was my duty to issue a Circular in answer to strong representations from all the Great Powers on this subject. In that Circular principles were laid down on which the right of asylum to political offenders was granted. First, it was laid down that foreigners had a right to be admitted and to reside in this country; secondly, being here, that they had a right to the protection of our laws, but at the same time they were amenable to them; and, thirdly, that the Government had no power to send them away from the country except under the conditions of Extradition Treaties. That Circular went on, on the other hand, to denounce in very strong terms the flagrant abuse of the hospitality given to foreigners in attempting to incite insurrection in the countries they belonged to. It was formally stated that Her Majesty's Government would exercise all legal powers at their command to prevent such attempts being made. That Circular was very much criticized in many parts of the Continent; but, I believe, it was universally acknowledged in this country to be a sound exposition of the national doctrine on the subject. Ten years ago, when it happened that I was again at the Foreign Office, I had a similar representation from the Spanish Government. I made an answer, and in so doing put into a more condensed form the same statement and phrases. My despatch was presented to Parliament as the Circular had been, and I think, if I am not mistaken, there was no one person, either in this House or the other House of Parliament, to call it in question, excepting my noble Friend (Lord Lamington). I might further allude to another circumstance that no doubt all remember—namely, what occurred at the time of the Orsini attempt on the life of the late Emperor of the French. Count Walewski wrote a strong letter at that time, not discreetly worded, reflecting on the state of our law in relation to the conduct of refugees in this country. Lord Palmerston's Government, having considered the subject, came to the conclusion that there was something in our laws which required amendment, and prepared a Bill by which the crime of conspiring to murder or inciting to murder, whether the murder was to be in this or in any foreign country, should be a felony, and not a misdemeanour, as it then was. Upon that occasion the matter was very carefully considered in the Cabinet. As it is so long ago, I may mention that I remember hours being spent in discussing the Bill and the prudence of presenting it to Parliament at that time. As we were about to separate, the despatch of Count Walewski was referred to, and Lord Clarendon said—

Earl Granville

“How am I to act with regard to the despatch? I think I had better not answer it at all.” Lord Palmerston said—“I think that will be the best way.” And in that the whole of the Cabinet acquiesced without saying a word. The Bill was introduced and read a first time without comment; but on the second reading was opposed not only by Mr. Milner Gibson, Mr. Cobden, and Mr. Bright, but by Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Gladstone, and Lord John Russell, and the result was that they obtained a majority, and the Government of Lord Palmerston was destroyed and a Conservative Government was formed. The ground the majority took in opposing the Bill was not objection to the improvement of the law, but to no answer having been sent to Count Walewski to vindicate the state of our laws. A year or two later that improvement in the law was agreed to without a single dissentient voice in a clause of another Bill. I only mention this to point out how exceedingly jealous the feeling of this country has been, and how strong I believe it will continue to be, in case of any notion of foreign interference with regard to our own domestic legislation. I have said that no representation has been made this year with regard to the right of asylum. I am glad to repeat that that is the case. What has happened is this. The Russian Government applied to Her Majesty's Government, with the approval of the Government of Germany, to join a Conference to consider what practical measures should be adopted in order to prevent criminal efforts on the part of certain associations, but guarded herself against any interference with our internal laws. I do not think, my Lords, it is surprising, after the frightful catastrophe of the murder of the late Emperor, that Russia should have desired, among other means of dealing with Nihilism, to seek the co-operation of other Powers. It is certainly no feeling of sympathy with Nihilism that has induced Her Majesty's Government to think it would not be advantageous to join such a Conference. If Nihilism means, as it seems to do, a general war against the laws and institutions of organized societies, not by appeal to opinion, but by murder and other crimes, it is the duty and the interest of this country to oppose and to punish it by all the legal means in our power. To go beyond those legal means is impossible; but we believe those means are sufficient for the purpose. It seemed to us that to join the Conference would not have led to any practical results, but would have had a contrary effect as to the objects proposed. In no country has the national indignation against such crimes been more strongly shown both in and out of Parliament than in England; but I am convinced that to accept the Conference would not have been approved by Parliament or by the nation. But this refusal only makes it more incumbent upon us to exert all legal powers to prevent acts prejudicial to foreign and friendly Governments, more especially with regard to murders, whether such murders or attempts to murder are directed against private individuals, or against Sovereigns and Chiefs of States.

AFFAIRS OF TUNIS—THE PAPERS.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I would ask leave to explain that in order to avoid delay, the Correspondence relating to the affairs of Tunis has been divided into five parts, of which the first (Tunis No. 1) contains the Correspondence previous to this year. Tunis No. 2 will contain the more recent Correspondence up to May 7. No. 3 will contain some important Despatches written within the last few days, which will be given separately. No. 4 will contain complete Correspondence up to date; and No. 5, that relating to the Enfida case.

ISLANDS OF THE WESTERN PACIFIC—MURDERS OF BRITISH SUBJECTS.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he can state the number of British subjects murdered since the 1st of January 1880, including the officers and crews of the "Ripple," "Esperanza," "Lolia," "Mystery," "Borealis," "Dauntless," "Annie Brooks," and H.M.S. "Sandfly," in the Pacific, and how many of the murderers have been tried at Levuka or elsewhere?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, at least 40 British subjects have been murdered, to say nothing of Chinese and others not British subjects, though sailing under the British flag, and very probably more, for I fear that even the long list of ships given by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman is not exhaustive. Not one of the murderers concerned in these outrages either was or could have been tried at Levuka or anywhere else by any British authority, even if he could have been found. The High Commissioner of the Western Pacific has merely jurisdiction over British subjects. The only punishment that could be inflicted in these seas on savages who are not British subjects is by acts of war, and with acts of war the Department which I have the honour to represent has nothing directly to do. The repression of such acts as those to which the Question refers belongs to the Admiralty.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—GUN LICENCES.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the alleged refusal by a magistrate (Mr. R. Pratt) attending Ballincollig, county Cork, Petty Sessions, to grant certificates for licences to keep a gun to several respectable farmers of the locality, stating that he would not give certificates to any Land Leaguers or persons who attended Land League meetings; whether the said magistrate did not refuse a certificate to the parish priest; and, what steps will the Government take so as to enable the persons thus unjustly treated to obtain a re-consideration of their case by some other magistrate than Mr. Pratt?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had received a letter from the magistrate referred to, in which he stated that he did not refuse a certificate to the parish priest, nor did he refuse certificates to respectable farmers. As to the last paragraph of the Question, the Government could not interfere with the magistrates in the exercise of their discretion as to the granting of certificates.

TURKEY—REPORTED RISING IN MACEDONIA.

MR. SUMMERS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can give the House any information with regard to the reported rising of the Christian population of Macedonia?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I regret to say I can give no information on this subject. We have no information whatever at the Foreign Office.

VACCINATION ACT—VACCINE LYMPH.

DR. CAMERON asked the President of the Local Government Board, What has been done since Dr. Cory's appointment to provide for the public supply of vaccine lymph direct from the calf; whether the Vaccination Department has been, or will be, instructed to issue lymph free for purpose of revaccination to all medical men who may ask for it; and, what steps have been taken to supply adequate hospital accommodation for smallpox cases, and so put an end to the public danger which arises from the treatment of so many cases of that disease in their own homes, and the consequent maintenance of so many separate foci of disease?

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he will state what is the result of his communications with the Metropolitan District Asylums Board with reference to the insufficiency of the existing hospital accommodation for smallpox.

patients within the Metropolitan district; and, if he will state whether steps will be taken forthwith to provide the necessary increase of hospital accommodation to meet the growth of the epidemic?

MR. DODSON, in reply, said, that great and unexpected difficulty had been found in obtaining the necessary premises for the public supply of vaccine lymph direct from the calf. He was glad, however, to inform the hon. Member that premises had now been secured, and the necessary preparations would be completed without delay. Preliminary arrangements had been made under which the requisite means would be supplied as soon as the buildings were ready. He feared it would not be practicable for the Department to undertake the supply of calf lymph for re-vaccination to any medical man who might apply. In reply to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), he had to say that hospital accommodation had been provided for a limited number of convalescent small-pox patients on the property of the Metropolitan Asylums Board at Darenth, and that, owing to the unremitting efforts of the managers, 251 convalescents had been removed there in the short space of one week, to the great relief of the Metropolitan hospitals. Negotiations were in progress with the view of obtaining additional accommodation for patients; but the matter was one of difficulty, owing to the proceedings taken in some cases and threatened in others, for closing some hospitals, and preventing the opening of new ones.

MR. SCLATER BOOTH asked whether the Government would undertake to propose legislation with a view of clothing the Local Government Board with power to carry out the objects of the Act of 1856?

MR. DODSON said, he would like very much to hear from his right hon. Friend, or some other person, advice as to what were the requisite powers.

STATE OF IRELAND—SKULL BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the following Resolution adopted by the Skull (county Cork) Board of Guardians on May 10th:—That we strongly protest against the conduct of Mr. R. H. Notter, J.P. on the 26th of April, in using threats of arrest under the Coercion Act calculated to intimidate and prevent us from discharging our duties as representatives of the people of the Skull Union, inasmuch that when we alluded to the arrest of our Chairman Mr. Richard Hodnett, now in prison under the Coercion Act, Mr. R. H. Notter quickly replied by saying "more will soon follow!" and we request the clerk of the union to forward a copy of this Resolution to the Lord Chancellor; whether the Mr. R. H. Notter, J.P. complained of is the same Mr. R. H. Notter, J.P. who recently expressed a hope from the bench that "the people would soon get powder and ball;" whether, in consequence of a question put in this House thereupon, Mr. Notter was cautioned against the use of inflammatory language; and, whether, as the Lord Chancellor's attention has a second time within a few months been called to the conduct of Mr. Notter, the Government can now hold out any hope, whether by removal from the bench or otherwise, that some restraint will be put upon the language of this magistrate?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he did not think the matter alluded to in the Question was worthy of the attention of the Government or of the House.

POST OFFICE—SERVICE OF WRITS— LETTER CARRIERS.

MR. HEALY asked the Postmaster General, Whether, as the Irish Courts now frequently allows writs to be served by postmen instead of by bailiffs as formerly, any complaints have been received from rural postmen in Ireland at having to deliver registered letters known to contain writs; and, whether, in view of the known disfavour with which persons threatened under those writs with eviction regard their service, the Government think it necessary to send a sufficient force of police to accompany the writ-serving postmen in future?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, no complaints on the subject had been received. As to the latter part of the Question, he had to remark that there was nothing in a letter containing a writ to show that it did contain a writ.

STATE OF IRELAND—"SLAVE DRIVING" IN GALWAY.

MR. BURT asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, with reference to the alleged slave driving and cruelty practised on the labourers of Galway, his attention has been called to a letter in the "Newcastle Chronicle" of the 12th instant, written by Mr. Patterson, one of the miners' agents who recently visited that part of Ireland; whether he has seen that Mr. Patterson reiterates his previous statements, and says he is prepared to prove them; and, whether he will order a thorough investigation to be made into this subject to ascertain what are the facts?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the Question of his hon. Friend related to a Question which was asked him a few days ago. He replied to that Question without inquiry, to the effect that he did not believe there could be any truth in the statement. The inquiry he had made proved that he was correct in that view. The statement in the paper referred to considerably exaggerated the miserable condition of the labourers. There was no so-called slave-driving.

THE GENERAL REGISTER HOUSE, SCOTLAND—RE-ORGANIZATION.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, When he will be able to announce the decision of the Government with reference to the several questions now pending as to the Register House, Scotland?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, the re-organization of the Register House Departments, and the future position and emoluments of the existing staff, has been now settled by a Treasury Minute, which received the consent of the Home Secretary, as required by the Lord Clerk Register Act of 1879, on the 13th instant. Directions have been issued for giving immediate effect to the scheme as from April 1 last. The Minutes will forthwith be laid before Parliament under the 11th section of the Act.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS—NOTICES OF EJECTMENT.

MR. LITTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that about 240 ejectments for non-payment of rent have been served at the instance of the Commissioners of Endowed Schools against their tenants in the neighbourhood of Coalisland, in the county of Tyrone; and, whether, considering that the Commissioners hold the lands for public purposes, he will use his influence to induce them to give further time to the tenants, so as not to impose upon them the enormous amount of cost so many actions will entail?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he was himself an ex officio Commissioner of Endowed Schools; but he had never, nor, he believed, had any of his Predecessors, taken any active part in the business of the Commission. He had, however, received from the secretary a statement of the facts of that matter. Seventy-eight ejectments had been given out for service. The rental of the land was £1,765; the Government valuation, including buildings, was £1,777; the rents being much below those of the adjoining estates, the Commissioners declined to make any abatement this year, first, because the sum of £200 had been advanced to the tenants in the shape of seed, only a small portion of which had been repaid, and next, because crops were above the average. In February last the agent reported that only £700 had been paid by the tenants. With a few exceptions the tenants were able to pay, but refused to do so, though the agent had attended on several occasions. Proceedings had, therefore, been directed to be taken against those who were able to pay; and it was only against those tenants that ejectments had been obtained. Furthermore, the agent had been authorized to offer time to those who might promise to pay; but no applications for time had yet been made. The particulars as to that estate would be found in the Report of the Endowed Schools Commission.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked whether the Commissioners had not remitted 15 per cent of their rents last year?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he believed that they had.

ACT, 1881—PROCLAMATION OF BELFAST.

MR. EWART asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

Mr. Litton

What are the reasons which have induced Her Majesty's Government to proclaim the Borough of Belfast under the provisions of the Peace Preservation Act, seeing that there have been no agrarian outrages, and that crime is generally on the decrease in the district?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the Peace Preservation Act had been applied to Belfast only as far as the sale and the carrying of arms and ammunition went, and not as to the possession of them. That had been done after consultation with the authorities in consequence of the fact that party feeling prevailed in the town some times in the year. One of the strongest arguments in favour of the renewal of the Peace Preservation Act was that danger would arise in places where party spirit ran high at the time when processions took place, and where unlicensed fire-arms were carried. The Government had no reason to doubt the general loyal and peaceable demeanour of the inhabitants of Belfast, but they felt that they would not be justified in neglecting to take proper precautions against armed men taking part in those processions.

TELEGRAPH ACT, 1868—POSITION OF TELEGRAPH CLERKS.

MR. MACLIVER asked Mr. Attorney General, If Clause 7 in "The Telegraph Act, 1868," by which the clerks transferred from the Companies to the Government are admitted to the rights and privileges of clerks in the "permanent Civil Service of the Crown," is still in force; and, if so, whether the clerks can be legally deprived of the position conferred upon them by the said Act; and, whether those clerks who joined subsequently are not entitled to the same advantages by the Superannuation Post Office and War Office Act of 1876, which was supposed to place the pre-transfer and post-transfer clerks on an equal footing?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): Sir, I have had some difficulty in following the Question of my hon. Friend. In the first place, Clause 7 of the Telegraph Act of 1868 has no bearing upon the subject of the Question. I presume that the hon. Member intends to refer to one of the sub-sections of Clause 8. If my surmise be correct, I answer the first part of his Question by saying that I believe that enactment is still in force, and whatever may be the legal rights of clerks under that enactment they are entitled to enjoy them. As to the second part of the Question, I say I cannot admit that my hon. Friend is right in saying that the Superannuation Act of 1876 "is supposed to place the pre-transfer and post-transfer clerks on an equal footing." Certainly that is not the correct interpretation of the Act of 1876, which places certain post-transfer clerks, irregularly appointed, on the same footing as other clerks in the Civil Service regularly appointed, but not on the same footing as pre-transfer telegraphic clerks.

TURKEY AND GREECE—THE GREEK FRONTIER.

MR. SUMMERS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to a telegram published in the "Daily News" of the 14th instant, in which it is asserted that Turkish troops are continually arriving in Thessaly; that the Turks are throwing up fortifications near Volo Domoko and the entire length of the frontier; that Dervish Pacha is reported to be offering terms to the Albanians on condition that they prepare to descend to Thessaly and oppose the Hellenic occupation; and that Austrian agents in Thessaly, Epirus, and Macedonia are strenuously engaged in representing the Vlach inhabitants as protesting against the annexation to Greece of the districts belonging to them; and, whether he is able to confirm or to contradict any of these statements?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the latest report we have received of the strength of the Turkish Army in Thessaly was dated April 12. It was then estimated at 42,600 men; but there had been a cessation of reinforcements since the end of March. The fortifications along the frontier and the port defences at Volo were stated to be complete at the same date. The last accounts of Dervish Pasha's proceedings show that he had nearly succeeded in reducing the Albanians to submission; but we have no reason to think that he had proposed to them to oppose the occupation by Greece of the territories to be ceded. With regard to the Vlachs, we have received a copy of a Petition against annexation to Greece, which was to be presented to the Porte by six Vlach delegates; but no great importance was attributed to this proceeding, and we have heard nothing that would connect Austrian agents with it.

FRANCE AND TUNIS—THE FRENCH PROTECTORATE.

MR. MAC IVER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the recent proceedings of France in Tunis are in accordance with European concert; or if it is true that France has, by force of arms, possessed herself of Biserta without regard to the views of any other Power; and, whether it is the case that France has practically assumed the protectorate of Tunis without friendly consultation with Her Majesty's Government, notwithstanding that there are upwards of ten thousand Maltese residents there who, as British subjects, have hitherto enjoyed rights and privileges which may or may not be secured to them under the new arrangements?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the Papers which will very shortly be published will contain all the facts known to Her Majesty's Government relating to the French Expedition to Tunis, and I must repeat the opinion which I have already expressed, that it will be the more convenient course to defer any statement on these points until the House has had the opportunity of considering the Papers. I must request the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) to take the same answer in reference to the Question he has placed upon the Paper.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he was sorry that he could not accept that view.

ENGLAND AND WALES—INCLUSION OF MONMOUTHSHIRE.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether the definition "Wales" in an Act of Parliament would be legally held to include Monmouthshire?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) had no difficulty in answering the Question in the negative. The Acts of Henry VIII. created a portion of the Welsh Marches into an English county—that of Monmouthshire. Many statutes, such as the Boundary

Acts following the Reform Act of 1832 and the Representation of the People Act, 1867, had recognized Monmouthshire and the Monmouth Boroughs as being in England. He was afraid that the hon. Member must give up all hope of claiming Monmouthshire as a Welsh county.

ARMY ORGANIZATION — THE NEW REGULATIONS—COMPULSORY RETIREMENT.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will state, as nearly as he can, the total number of Officers of the Army who will be retired, under the proposed new regulations, for compulsory retirement, on the 1st July, or on whatever date the new rules may come into operation?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, it is almost impossible to say how many officers will be retired on the 1st of July until the Warrant has appeared and officers have elected between the different courses open to them. But, as a matter of fact, the number of retirements under the new system will be in the aggregate much less than those impending under the system now in force.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, If, under the new Warrant to be issued on the 1st July, Colonels of fifty-eight years of age will be allowed to complete their service in those situations to which they have been appointed for five years, or if they will be compulsorily retired on pensions before the completion of the five years' term from the command of Depot Centres and other equivalent positions; if the latter is the case would he inform the House what is approximately the additional expense which will be entailed on the Exchequer by such compulsory retirements, and if any compensating saving will be effected; and, what will be approximately the gross loss incurred by the officers who would be thus compulsorily retired before the completion of their five years' term?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, the Question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman is word for word the same as that he asked me three days ago, with the addition of the word approximately. My answer on Monday precisely answers his present Question. I told him that the estimate showed the aggregate change; but that it was almost impossible, and it would be until the Warrant issues useless, to break it up into detail.

ARMY—MANUFACTURE OF GUNS AND PROJECTILES.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, If he can state what is the value of guns, carriages, and projectiles now ordered from or being manufactured by private firms on behalf of the War Department; and, if this includes all guns, &c. being manufactured by private firms for the Government?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, the value of the guns, carriages, and projectiles now being manufactured by private firms on behalf of the War Department is a little over £46,000. I know nothing of any orders for other Departments of the Government; but if the hon. and gallant Member refers to the Admiralty, their requirements are met by the War Office, and the material at this moment in course of manufacture for them is included in the £46,000.

INDIA—GOLD MINING COMPANIES.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been called to the number of Indian Gold Mining Companies whose prospectuses have been issued during the past two years; and, whether the Noble Lord or Secretary of State in Council could not issue some warning note to the public to guard them against investing their money in these highly speculative concerns, at the same time without interfering with the legitimate operation of capital?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I can only say that the Report to the Government of India by Mr. B. Smith on the gold yielding capabilities of Wynaad has been made public. That contains all the information in my possession on the subject, and having made it public I think I have done all in my power to enable the public to form their own opinion as to the various schemes which have lately been presented to them.

INDIA (ARMY)—CASE OF CAPTAIN CHATTERTON.

MR. GRANTHAM asked the Secretary of State for India, as he has now received the promised reports from India on the case of Captain Chatterton, If he can tell the House whether by the report of the Medical Board, dated September 5th, 1868, signed by Surgeon Major Peskett, Surgeons Lowdell and Condon, and Assistant Surgeon Walsh at Myne Tal, Captain Chatterton was not recommended to take twelve months leave of absence for the purpose of returning to England to undergo an operation, viz., the division of the left tendon achilles, on the ground that it was not safe to perform the operation in India; whether Surgeon Major Powell, acting as garrison surgeon in Fort William, Calcutta, did not afterwards in April 1869 confirm the above recommendation on the same ground; and, whether the only report on which the Despatch of June 5th, 1869, ordering the compulsory retirement of Captain Chatterton was founded, and which practically alleged that he was shamming, was not that made in November or December 1868 by Assistant Surgeon Macdermott, who was shortly afterwards removed from the medical charge of that and other cases previously under his care; and how it was that Captain Chatterton was dismissed the Army in 1869 on the report of an assistant surgeon, when Captain Chatterton was acting on the reports of very eminent surgeons made both before and after the report of the assistant surgeon?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, it was a fact that the Medical Board, by a Report dated September 5, 1868, did recommend that Captain Chatterton should be sent to England to undergo an operation. Their Report required to be confirmed by superior authorities, and they decided that there was no occasion to send Captain Chatterton home, as the operation, being a very simple one, could be performed in India. The whole matter was carefully considered by a Court of Inquiry consisting of three combatant officers of superior rank. They took the evidence of several medical officers, and their Report was considered by the Commander-in-Chief in India and by the Government of India; and on this Report Captain Chatterton was placed on half-pay. Captain Chatterton had not been dismissed from the Army. He had 15 years of service, six and a-half of which were spent on medical leave. On these grounds alone there would have been ample justification for placing Captain Chatterton on half-pay.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—TERRITORIAL TITLES OF REGIMENTS.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he thinks it necessary to insist on calling the territorial Regiment formed from the 67th Brigade Depot the Prince of Wales' Royal Canadian Regiment, consisting as it does of five Regiments of Irish Militia, and of the 100th and 109th Regiments, in not one of which is there now a single Canadian; and, whether he will consider the recommendation of Colonel Stanley's Committee, that the Regiment should be called the Prince of Wales' Royal Leinster Regiment, and be made Fusiliers, if the Militia Regiments are no longer to remain Rifles?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to my hon. Friend, I may say that in settling the titles of the new territorial regiments we are most anxious to minimize changes, but at the same time to meet local objections; and it is impossible to deny that the title "Royal Canadian" of a purely Irish regiment refers rather to the past than to the present state of things. We are at this moment in communication with those interested.

THE MAURITIUS—A HINDOO "CHURCH RATE."

MR. CAINE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If it is true, as stated in an advertisement in the "Mercantile Record and Commercial Gazette" of March 21st, published at Port Louis, Mauritius, that the Colonial Secretary had in a letter dated February 5th last, authorised the charge of a fee of two cents of a rupee on all bags of grain, cases, casks and bales of goods sold by all Hindoo Merchants for the maintenance of their church situated at the place called Pont Nicolay, Port Louis; whether he will lay a Copy of that letter upon the Table; and, whether this step has been taken with his approval; and, if not, whether he will cancel the authorisation.

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, some time ago the Hindoos, who are numerous in Mauritius, petitioned the Lieutenant Governor of the Island for aid from the public funds for the maintenance of their religion, or if that were out of the question, for power to do as the Mahomedans did—that is, to levy a small percentage on their trading transactions for its maintenance. As the petitioners had, of course, the most absolute right to tax themselves for the maintenance of their religion without asking his or anybody's leave, the Lieutenant Governor directed them to be informed that he could not promise them any aid from the public funds; but that they were perfectly free to follow the example of the Mahomedans, and to devote to the purposes of their religion any voluntary tax or percentage upon their trading transactions which they might think proper to levy among themselves. Now that the circumstances are explained, I need hardly add that the Secretary of State for the Colonies sees no reason to interfere with the voluntary arrangement made by the Hindoos for the maintenance of their religion.

MR. CAINE: Then I am to understand that it is a purely voluntary church-rate?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Undoubtedly.

ISLAND OF REUNION—COOLIES.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the French Government has as yet communicated to the Foreign Office the long promised "decret" regulating the treatment of the oppressed Indian Coolies in the Island of La Réunion?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the decree referred to has not yet been communicated to Her Majesty's Government; but Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris is in communication with the French Government respecting it.

FOREIGN JEWS IN RUSSIA—EXPULSION OF A NATURALIZED BRITISH SUBJECT.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, with reference to a statement that Her Majesty's Government had received no invitation from Foreign Governments to interfere in the question of the outrages committed on the Jews in Russia, it is the present policy of Her Majesty's Government not to remonstrate in cases of oppression of Jews in Foreign Countries, except on receiving an invitation from another power to do so; and, whether it is not the fact that since the year 1869 representations have been repeatedly made by Her Majesty's Government, without waiting for such invitation, on behalf of oppressed Jews in Roumania, Servia, Morocco, Tunis, Tripoli, and Persia?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the principal consideration which would regulate the action of Her Majesty's Government would be that of whether interference on their part would be likely to be efficacious; and, in answer to the next Question, I fear that I may have to show that it is not probable that that would be the case in the present instance.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What is the Russian Law which, as stated by him in the House on Monday last, forbids Foreign Jews to remain in St. Petersburg; whether he will obtain a copy of such Law through Her Majesty's Ambassador in the Russian capital, and lay it upon the Table of the House; if such Law is enforced by the Russian Government, whether he can explain why the Russian Consul General in London viséd the passport of Mr. Lewisohn, a British subject of the Jewish faith; and, whether public notice will be given in the "London Gazette" that Jews who are British subjects of Her Majesty are not allowed to visit or remain in the Russian Empire, but are liable to be expelled at a day's notice, by the Russian Police, even when provided with a duly viséd British passport?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the laws referred to are couched in the following terms:—

"Jews who come to Russia on business can remain for one year in those places where Jews are allowed to settle."

Then here follows a long list of the governments in which they may settle, one of which is St. Petersburg:—

"Jews who are foreign subjects arriving in Russia from abroad, who have come on business or for the purpose of extending their business transactions, are allowed to carry on business and to open banks in Russia, provided they obtain a special permission to trade as members of the first guild, issued by the Ministers of Finance, of the Interior, and of Foreign Affairs, to be specially applied for in each case."

Combined complaints have been addressed by the Governments of Germany, Austria, and the United States, as well as by Her Majesty's Government in Mr.

Mr. Grant Duff

Lewisohn's case, against the harsh treatment of their subjects under the provisions of these laws, and the United States Congress requested the Executive "to take immediate action to have the Treaties so amended as to remedy the Jewish grievance in Russia." The Government of the United States, which had always been on peculiarly friendly terms with that of Russia, protested, in 1880, against the expulsion from St. Petersburg, under circumstances of peculiar hardship, of an American citizen of Jewish faith; but neither in this case nor in that of another American expelled under circumstances exactly similar to those in Mr. Lewisohn's case, were they able to obtain redress. I may add that more than a year ago all foreign Jews were ordered at once to leave St. Petersburg and certain other large towns by order of General Loris Melikoff. With regard to the visa given by the Russian Consulate-General in London, it may have been given in ignorance of Mr. Lewisohn's faith, or under the impression that he was proceeding to Russia, and not specially to the Government of St. Petersburg. With regard to the public notice which the hon. Member suggests, perhaps the publicity given by this reply will meet the requirements of the case.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: Is it to be understood that, in the case of Governments of importance like Russia, Her Majesty's Government do not intend to protest in cases of oppression, but that their protests are only to be directed against weak Governments?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the Government has not come to any conclusion as to addressing any protest to Russia in this matter. The essential consideration in these matters is whether any protest is likely to be of use, and I have shown that in the cases of the protests of the United States, Germany, and Austria no good has come. But I may say that we have protested strongly with regard to the case of Mr. Lewisohn.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: The Question of my hon. Friend refers to the persecution generally, and not to the second question. Will the Government protest on this question?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I have said that the Government have not come to any final determination, but that the essential consideration is whether representations will be efficacious; and, frequent representations having been made in vain, I fear a protest would not be efficacious.

MR. J. COWEN wanted to know how the Government could tell whether their representations would be efficacious or not? The present Government was a special friend of Russia.

AFFAIRS OF TUNIS—THE CAPITULATIONS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any communication has been received from the French Government as to the validity of the capitulations in Tunis; and, if he can state what will be the position of British subjects in Tunis as to the administration of civil and criminal justice?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I fear I cannot give any further reply to this Question.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have recognised or acquiesced in the state of things established at Tunis by the recent action of the French Government; and, whether they will defer any decision on their policy in this respect until Parliament has been enabled to consider the Papers about to be laid upon the Table on the subject?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I make the same reply to this Question.

ABYSSINIA—A RED SEA PORT.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If any steps have been taken in consequence of the correspondence regarding the concession to Abyssinia of a free port in the Red Sea; and, if he will lay that correspondence, which took place in the year 1877, between the Earl of Derby and Her Majesty's Consul General in Egypt, upon the Table of the House?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, no steps have been taken to obtain for Abyssinia a port in the Red Sea, and Her Majesty's Agent in Egypt reported that there was no evidence to show that the Abyssinians, who did not claim a port, and could not manage it if possessed by them, were desirous of obtaining one.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL AND CHRIST CHURCH COLLEGE, OXFORD.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked the honourable Member for Southwark, Whether he intends to put to the Government the question of which he has given Notice, and which has been long upon the Paper, such Notice reflecting on the character of a distinguished college at Oxford, and on the conduct of important public bodies?

MR. THOROLD ROGERS, in reply, said, he should certainly put the Question of which he had given Notice; and he hoped he might be allowed to explain why he had placed it upon the Paper. He saw it stated in one of the newspapers that an appeal was about to be made to the First Lord of the Treasury to allow the Dean and Chapter of Westminster to take away from the Westminster Schools the property they were legally entitled to on the death of one of the canons, and the acquisition of which by the schools was absolutely necessary to carry out their requirements. There were other statements. [Cries of "Order!"] Unfortunately, there was no Department of the Government entitled to give an answer to a Question upon higher education. ["Order!"] He might take some little exception to the terms of the Question of the hon. Member. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER said, it would not be regular to debate the form of the Question.

MR. J. G. TALBOT wanted to know when the hon. Member would put the Question, and whether he thought it proper to make an attack upon a distinguished body without notice, that body having no opportunity of replying?

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, that he had no intention of making an attack upon a distinguished body.

MR. J. G. TALBOT wished to know when the hon. Member would put his Question?

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, that he should put his Question on Friday.

KERRY.

MR. DALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that at Ballybunyon, in the county of Kerry, on the estate of

Mr. Gunn Mahony, an absentee landlord, a man named Broder was with his large family evicted from his house, and, though apparently dying, was thrown upon the road without any shelter whatsoever; and, whether it is true that Broder had received the last sacraments of the Catholic Church administered only to dying persons?

MR. BRODRICK asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in the case referred to, the tenant was not still alive and well; and whether he was not at the time of the eviction three years in arrear of a rent fixed in 1862 by the Court of Chancery, and not since raised; and whether it was not the fact that the state of his health was now such as to have permitted him on the 9th inst. to join a mob of about 1,000 persons in cutting turf on the property of his landlord in open defiance of the law?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that he would give the House what information he could. The name of the evicted tenant was Brodrick, not Broder, as stated in the Question. He was tenant of an 80-acre farm, of which the rent was only £65. He had become a tenant of the farm under the Court of Chancery, at a rent of £75, in the year 1855. In 1862 the rent became £65. There had been a decree in June, 1880, for non-payment of rent, which was not executed until the time had almost expired; not, he believed, because the man was in a dying state, but because the landlord had been informed that the tenant was in a delicate state of health. The eviction took place on April 22. On the 9th instant, he was present as a spectator when a large crowd of persons assembled, but took no active part in the gathering.

MR. DALY said, that he was not responsible for the error in the name, as he received his information in a telegram from the parish priest.

POST OFFICE — SAVINGS BANK
ACT, 1880.

MR. BUXTON asked the Postmaster General, with reference to the working of the Savings Bank Act of 1880, What sum of money has been invested through the Trustee and Post Office Savings Banks in Government Stock; in what proportion has the sum been supplied — (a.) by withdrawals from current deposits; (b.) by moneys specially deposited for the purpose of investment; whether the amount thus withdrawn for investment has caused any diminution in the number of deposits in the Trustee and Post Office Savings Banks respectively, or in the amount of the deposits; how much of the amount invested has been taken in the form of stock certificates to bearer, and whether there have been many applications for stock certificates for smaller amounts than £50, the minimum amount now granted; and, whether any of the figures as to the above mentioned details could be given separately for Great Britain and Ireland?

Mr. FAWCETT: Sir, in reply to the Questions of my hon. Friend, I have to state that the Act for allowing small investments in Government Stocks through the savings banks came into operation on the 22nd of November last, and in less than six months between that date and the 14th of May, the amount so invested through the Trustee Savings Banks was £68,400, and through the Post Office Savings Banks, £455,800. Of this latter amount £177,500 was withdrawn from existing deposits for investment, and £278,300 was specially deposited in the Post Office Savings Banks for immediate investment. In spite of this withdrawal, the amount of Post Office Savings Bank deposits has increased since the 22nd of November by no less than £1,010,360, and the number of depositors has increased in the same period by 331,795. Of the amount invested in Government Stocks through the Post Office Savings Banks, £5,850 has been taken in the form of Stock Certificates to bearer, and there have been only one or two applications for Certificates of smaller amount than £50. With regard to the last Question of my hon. Friend, it may perhaps be sufficient if I state that of the aggregate amount of £455,800 invested in Government Stocks through the Post Office Savings Banks, £394,700 was invested in Great Britain and £61,100 in Ireland. Of the amount invested in Great Britain only £17,100 had been sold, and of the amount invested in Ireland only £2,400 had been sold.

TUNIS—THE PORT OF BISERTA.

Mr. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs,

Whether the Paper drawn up by Mr. Wood, Her Majesty's late Consul General, containing a reference to Biserta Bay, is within the control of the Foreign Office; and, if so, whether he will lay it before Parliament with the other Papers on the subject of Tunis?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the Report referred to is one of a confidential scheme, and, as my right hon. Friend is aware, it is contrary to the custom of the Foreign Office to publish documents of this kind. I may, however, add that, although allusion is made in it to Biserta, it gives no details as to the character of the harbour, or the expenditure necessary to convert it into a harbour of value.

Mr. BOURKE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether he can, without detriment to the public service, lay upon the Table any Reports which are in possession of the Admiralty from naval officers, upon the importance, strategical or political, of Biserta Bay?

Mr. TREVELYAN: Sir, there is no Report in the Hydrographical Department of the Admiralty bearing on Biserta Bay. There is a short letter in the General Record Office from Admiral Spratt to Lord Clarence Paget, written in 1864; but it contains nothing that is not still more emphatically and fully said by the gallant Admiral in his letter published in The Times of last Monday, and there are expressions in it which justly impelled the writer to mark it confidential.

HOUSE OF COMMONS ARRANGEMENTS —REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF 1868.

Mr. H. H. FOWLER asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether there are any Copies of the Report of the Committee of 1868 on House of Commons arrangements which are available for distribution?

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, in reply, said, that a certain number of copies had been ordered to be printed, and that any Member wishing to have a copy might have one on application to the Speaker's secretary.

ARMY—MOUNTED INFANTRY.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of the Government to take any steps this year towards the formation of a permanent corps of mounted infantry?

MR. CHILDERS: No, Sir, no provision is made for such a force in the Estimates for 1881-2.

AT SANDHURST—STUDY OF FRENCH AND GERMAN.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for War, with reference to his correspondence with the public schools regarding education in French and German, Whether it is not the case that hitherto there has been absolutely no instruction in those languages at Sandhurst, so that young men qualified up to a certain point before entrance have every encouragement to forget what they know of modern languages from the moment they enter as cadets into Her Majesty's Service; whether he will introduce the study of modern languages at Sandhurst; and, whether he will consider the possibility of doing anything to assist and encourage junior officers, after joining their regiments, to continue and improve their knowledge of these languages where circumstances permit?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, I have not overlooked the point suggested in the Question of my hon. Friend; but he, perhaps, is not aware that cadets only pass something over eight months at Sandhurst, and that the course is one of purely military subjects, which necessarily take up their whole time. When I was at Sandhurst lately, I especially looked into this question; but the real fact is, that unless French becomes part of the education of an English gentleman at school, a very small proportion will acquire facility in it afterwards. It is with this object that I hope the authorities of our public schools may be induced to do something more for living languages even at a moderate sacrifice of Greek, and that we have appealed to them to assist us if they wish to increase or even to maintain the present proportion of entries into the Army from these essentially national institutions.

WAYS AND MEANS—INLAND REVENUE
—BEER AND SPIRIT LICENCES ON RAILWAYS.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, To whom it is intended that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue shall grant licences at £5 per annum to sell wine, beer, spirits, and tobacco in travelling public house Railway cars; whether such travelling public house Railway cars will be authorised to supply first class, second class, and third class Railway passengers with any liquor they may require; and, whether all Railway Companies will be permitted to attach such travelling taverns to any train they may think advisable, whether express, excursionist, or Parliamentary, and without limit as to distance travelled?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I will give the particulars of the Question to my hon. Friend if he desires to have them; but I doubt if this is a convenient moment to explain them to the House. If it is agreeable to the hon. Member, I would rather suggest that we should wait until I make the proposal, of which I will undertake to give him due notice.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE: This is a question which is of great interest in the country. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: After the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, I not think it would be regular to press the Question.

AND GALASHIELS.

LORD HENRY SCOTT asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether he has any objection to mention the name of the gentleman connected with the manufactures of Hawick who informed him that the trade of that town and Galashiels and other manufacturing towns of the district was good and satisfactory; whether he is aware that, since 1875, eleven woollen manufacturing firms had failed in Hawick alone, and their liabilities, varying respectively from £4,500 to £400,000, had reached a total sum of over £830,000; whether it is not the fact that the export of tweeds is greatly hampered by foreign tariffs in America and other countries, while at the same time the price of home-grown wool had so declined as to be actually unremunerative to the grower; and, whether any steps will be taken by Her Majesty's Government in any treaty of commerce now negotiating or to be negotiated to secure that so important a home manufacturing interest is relieved from the unfair and unequal duties now imposed on it by foreign tariffs?

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: Sir, I am bound to rise to the Question of the noble Lord. To the two or three paragraphs of that Question I will give such an answer as it will admit of. The House will see that the first portion of the Question merely asks the name of the gentleman who stated to me some facts concerning trade on the banks of the Tweed to which I referred in a recent speech. I do not think it necessary to give the name of that gentleman; but I will mention that he has occupied a high position in the municipality of Hawick, and is one of a family who are largely interested and connected with the trade in the district. The next Question relates to the bankruptcies in Hawick since 1875. Now, I did not know of this Question till I came down to the House. But I have just received a telegram from Hawick, which, by the statement of two or three facts, furnishes a sufficient answer to the Question. The telegram comes from the secretary of the South of Scotland Chamber of Commerce, and is to the effect that some serious failures of manufacturing firms took place in 1875 owing to circumstances altogether outside the manufacturing industry of the place; that trade was healthy; that the heaviest failure took place in consequence of the wild and foolish speculation of one of the partners resident in London, and had nothing to do with the trade at Hawick, which was profitable at the time, and has been since in a very satisfactory state, especially when the condition of trade in many parts of the country is taken into consideration. Then he says that the other manufacturing firms have failed for trifling amounts; that the trade has been steadily increasing; that last year higher wages were paid than in any preceding year, in spite of the depression of trade, and that the Census shows an increase of population of 42 per cent in the decennial period. He also says that wool—there was no reference in my speech to the price of wool—is certainly low in price; that farmers took land anticipating that prices would be higher by 50 per cent; that rents are too high; and that the Border pastoral farmers are paying rent wholly or partially out of capital. He says, in continuation, that if I ask the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan), I shall probably get further material with which to answer satisfactorily the noble Lord opposite. The noble Lord opposite asks whether it is not the fact that the export of tweeds is greatly hampered by foreign tariffs? Well, no doubt, if all foreign tariffs were as free as our own there would be a larger trade in this country. The night before last I was speaking on this very practice to a gentleman eminent in the political life of Canada, and he told me how in that very article of tweeds there was an interference with the trade of this country by the imposition of tariffs in the Colony. He added that the time was not far distant when the policy at present pursued would be reversed. The Question asks—

“Whether any steps will be taken by Her Majesty's Government in any treaty of commerce now negotiating or to be negotiated to secure that so important a home manufacturing interest is relieved from the unfair and unequal duties now imposed on it by foreign tariffs?”

Unfortunately, this Parliament can only deal with the tariffs of this country; but, of course, any Government in Office would do its utmost in case of any negotiations to obtain as favourable terms as possible for the trade of this country. This is what the Government has tried to do with France, and what it will do as occasion offers in the case of negotiations with any other country.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL—THE COMMISSION.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true that the Commissioners have refused to enter the Transvaal territory until the guns taken at Potchefstroom have been restored; and whether they have taken this step under instructions from the Secretary of State?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, in consequence of the want of telegraphic communication and for other reasons, it was decided more than a month ago that the Commission should for the present sit at Newcastle, in Natal, and we have heard nothing whatever about any proposal to change the place of meeting.

NAVY—ROYAL NAVAL ENGINEERS.

MR. MACLIVER asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he has given the attention which he promised to the position of the Royal Naval Engineers, and whether he can state how far he is prepared to revise their pay and status?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Engineering Department of the Navy is the only Naval Service of importance which has recently sprung into existence, and its organization has not yet been arranged on a final and satisfactory basis. When the Estimates are introduced next year I shall be prepared, if I still hold the Office which I now have the honour to fill, to submit to the House a scheme which I hope will meet with approval.

In answer to a further Question,

MR. TREVELYAN said, that the Navy Estimates would not be taken until an opportunity should present itself to the Government of obtaining a clear night for their discussion. As to the Royal Naval Engineers, the Lords of the Admiralty would be very pleased to hear the opinions of hon. Members; but he could not promise that the reorganization to which he had referred would be explained at the time which might be fixed for the discussion of the Estimates. The general outline of the scheme had already been sketched, but no reason existed for taking any premature step in connection with this subject.

ARREST OF MR. DILLON.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will not, after the Second Reading of the Irish Land Law Bill, endeavour to afford some facilities for the discussion of the Notice which stands on the books of the House with reference to the arrest of Mr. Dillon, M.P. and the general conduct of the Irish Executive?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, in answering this Question I cannot but express my great regret, inasmuch as everyone must desire that a matter of this kind should be disposed of with as little delay as possible, that the hon. Member has not availed himself of any of the opportunities for bringing forward his Motion which were open to him as an independent Member. In all likelihood, if the hon. Member had thought fit to put down this Motion for Tuesday night last, and if some of the hon. Members interested in the Question had attended on that evening, the Notice would have received the attention of the House. Instead, however, of following such a course as I have indicated, the hon. Member now asks me to give him facilities for the discussion of his Motion. But he knows perfectly well what are the facilities at my disposal, and I cannot do better than repeat what I have stated many times in this House, and what cannot be unknown to the hon. Member—namely, that with regard to the whole of the time as to which we consider we have a moral option, our intention is to give it to the Irish Land Bill. But between the second reading of the Bill and the Committee it may be proper to allow an interval of a week to elapse. That being so, there will be one evening at the command of the Government, and it is a matter of necessity that that evening should be given to the consideration of a financial measure without the authority of which the taxes of the country cannot be levied. This measure is absolutely necessary for authorizing the levying of the taxes, and with regard to it some inconvenience has already arisen. I must therefore treat this measure as a question of paramount importance. It may also be necessary to renew our demand for a Vote of Credit. That is a matter which I hope will not give rise to any discussion; but, in the present day, it is extremely difficult to anticipate what will and what will not give rise to discussion. But I certainly shall not interpose anything, in regard to which I consider we have option, so as to prevent the hon. Member from bringing forward his Motion if he is determined not to avail himself of the opportunities which he has as a private Member. On Tuesday next, for instance, he might probably bring the matter forward, there being very little indeed to be discussed on that day, except certain Irish Motions, with regard to which there would probably be a disposition on the part of Irish Members to accommodate the hon. Member. It appears to me that the hon. Member ought then to have an opportunity of bringing forward his Motion; but in the meantime he might reserve the discretionary power of making use of any portion of Monday that may be free after the Financial Bill is disposed of.

Mr. MacIver.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY observed, that he had a Motion down for Tuesday relating to the industrial development of Ireland, and added that he certainly should not give way in the manner suggested by the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR suggested that the right hon. Gentleman might propose a Morning Sitting on Tuesday for the discussion of his hon. Friend's Motion.

MR. MAC IVER hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not be too sanguine about the rapid progress of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill.

STATE OF IRELAND—ILLEGAL PLACARD—ARREST AT MULLINGAR.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If it is a fact that a man named Clarke was, on Thursday May 12th, arrested without warrant at Mullingar on a charge of carrying an alleged illegal placard; if four magistrates at once, without having given the man any chance or opportunity of finding bail to answer the charge at petty sessions, proceeded to pass sentence on him for the alleged offence, such sentence being that he should undergo a month's imprisonment unless he found bail for good behaviour during six months; if it was only on the protest of the prisoner's solicitor, Mr. Downes, that the magistrates ultimately consented to remand the charge to petty sessions; if the magistrates had power, under the circumstances, to adjudicate as they proposed, out of sessions; and, if they had not, will he take steps to insure that justice shall be done in similar cases in which prisoners may not be able to procure for themselves the protection of a legal defence?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW): Sir, I have inquired into this occurrence. On a market day in Mullingar, Clarke was carrying about and exhibiting a placard of an inflammatory character. The constabulary on duty requested him to desist, and on his refusal took him before the resident magistrate and three other magistrates who happened to be in town. They heard the charge at the police barrack, heard what Clarke had to say about it, and then told him he must find sureties for good behaviour, or in default be committed to gaol for one month. Clarke said he would provide the sureties required; but just then a solicitor,

Mr. Downes, with another gentleman, came up, and on being informed what had taken place, protested against the case being heard out of petty sessions. The magistrates, though not bound so to do, yielded to Mr. Downes's objection, and accordingly took bail for Clarke's appearance at the next petty sessions, on the 21st instant, to answer the charge. As to the legal part of the Question, I have to state that the magistrates had jurisdiction to deal with the case out of petty sessions as they proposed to do.

MR. PARNELL asked if the magistrates had power to sentence a man to a month's imprisonment in such a case?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW): Yes, Sir, in the default of finding sureties for good behaviour.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked if the placard could be correctly described as inflammatory? It was as follows:—

"Landlordism on its last legs. A sale will take place at the courthouse, Mullingar, on May 13, at 12 o'clock. Men of Westmeath, assemble in your thousands at the above sale, for the purpose of beholding the last struggle of landlordism against democracy. A contingency of the Land League branch of Westmeath will attend. God save Ireland!"

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked if they were to understand that it was owing to the accident by which a solicitor was present that the man was not sent to gaol?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW): Sir, the man, as I understand the case, was not about to be sent to gaol at all, for he was ready to provide the sureties required. The proceedings were had under the Common Law jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace. In answer to the hon. Member for Westmeath, I have to say that I do consider the placard in question an inflammatory one. It encouraged, and was meant to encourage, disorder, and the interference of the magistrates was, in my opinion, quite justifiable.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN wondered if it was within the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman that placards were issued by the Nonconformists inviting people to witness the seizure of ministers' money in Ireland?

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN remarked, that the Attorney General had forgotten to answer whether the man was given the option of bail awaiting trial, and whether the course was legal.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW): Such a course was perfectly legal.

MR. H. H. FOWLER asked if they were to understand that by the law of Ireland a man would be sent to prison for a month for carrying a placard like the one in question?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW): For any breach of good behaviour a man may be sent to prison in England and in Ireland alike, if he does not give the security required for his future good behaviour.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Not in England.

SOLWAY FISHERIES—GEO. IV. c. 45, s. 9 —REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS—LEGISLATION.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been directed to the Report of the Commissioners on the Solway Fisheries (1881); and, if he proposes to introduce some legislative measure to mitigate the present excessive penalties to which persons are liable under the ninth clause c. 45 Geo. III. 1804, as recommended at page xiv. of the Report?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the Report, and he would be extremely glad if he could bring in a Bill to give effect to it. He would, however, see whether a Bill of the kind might not be introduced in the other House, with the hope that there might be time to get it through both Houses in the present Session.

INTERNATIONAL LAW—TORPEDOES.

MR. T. C. THOMPSON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If the attention of Government has been called to a notice from the Greek Consul that torpedoes have been laid down for practice in the Gulf of Corinth; and, if the Government will endeavour to put a stop to the use amongst civilized nations of these secret weapons in naval warfare?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I have no reason to suppose that the statement referred to by the hon. Member is incorrect. With regard to the latter part of the Question, Her Majesty's Government have certainly not formed any intention of negotiating with foreign Governments on the subject of torpedoes as being secret instruments of warfare, for this reason if for no other, that there are other secret instruments of warfare, such as mines and countermines, and that it would be very difficult to sanction the one description and prohibit the other.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND) COUNTY
MONAGHAN.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he has yet received further information relative to an inquest held on the 30th ult. on Lord Rossmore's property, in the townland of Dumbarton, county Monaghan; if, in addition to the report of the circumstances he saw in the "Freeman's Journal," which created an impression that the case was unjustifiable and harsh, he also observed a letter from Lord Rossmore's agent, Colonel Lloyd, in that paper, on the 5th instant, explanatory of the transaction; and, if he is aware that Stewart, the tenant sought to be evicted, and on whose evidence the original charge was made in the newspaper referred to, has been returned for trial on a charge of wilful and corrupt perjury said to have been committed at the inquest already alluded to?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that when he had before answered a Question on the subject he had not seen the letter from Lord Rossmore's agent, which gave a different aspect to the transaction. He saw, he might add, a paragraph in the newspapers to the effect that Stewart had been brought before the magistrates on a charge of perjury, and that he would be tried at the next Assizes. Pending the trial he could give no opinion in the matter.

PARLIAMENTARY OATH—MR. BRADLAUGH.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the two Acts of Parliament passed in the last Session for the relief of Lord Byron and Lord Plunket from the liabilities incurred by them by reason of their having voted as Members of Parliament without having taken the oaths prescribed by Law, the Government are prepared to promote a similar measure in relief of Mr. Bradlaugh; and, if not, why not?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it is certainly true that this House was pleased to pass Bills of Indemnity on behalf of Lord Byron and Lord Plunket, and it is likewise true that those Bills were taken in charge by Her Majesty's Government. But they were taken in charge by the Government, first of all because we were given to understand that the votes of the two noble Lords in question were given inadvertently; and secondly, because on a question of the kind, where there was no matter of difference of opinion, we thought it right as a matter of courtesy affecting the jurisdiction of the other House of Parliament to take the course which we adopted. With regard to the Question as it relates to Mr. Bradlaugh, I give no opinion upon it, beyond saying that it is evidently a different matter, and the Government have not thought it their duty in the present state of affairs to make any proposal to the House on the subject.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL— THE NATIVE TRIBES.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government are in possession of any information respecting the commandeering expeditions which it is said are being organised by the Boers of the Transvaal against certain of the Native tribes, to punish them for their loyalty to Her Majesty's Government during the recent insurrection; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have still authority to protect the natives of the Transvaal against outrages during the sittings of the Commission; and, if so, what steps are being taken to insure that such authority will, if disregarded, be enforced?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, the most recent intelligence of anything of the kind we have had was on the 12th, when we were told by Sir Evelyn Wood that Major Buller had been sent with Mr. Joubert to part a Native tribe and some Boers said to be hostile to it in the Keate Award territory. In reply to the hon. and learned Member's second Question, I have to say that we have such authority, but that the steps to be taken must necessarily depend upon the circumstances of each particular case.

MR. GORST asked whether the Government had heard anything of expeditions being organized at Pretoria?

MR. GRANT DUFF: No, Sir; we have heard of nothing of the kind.

THE ROYAL MILITARY ASYLUM, CHELSEA—ROMAN CATHOLIC BOYS.

MR. CALLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of a Memorial from the Roman Catholic Clergymen at the Royal Military Asylum, Chelsea, on the subject of the provisions in force for the religious instruction and training of the Roman Catholic boys at that Institution, and of the reply, if any, given thereto by him?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that I received through Lord O'Hagan a Memorandum by Canon M'Mullen about the times of service and remuneration for the officiating priest at Chelsea Hospital and the Royal Military Asylum. I duly represented the rev. gentleman's views to the Commissioners of the two Institutions, over whom I have no administrative control, with the result that some change in the service has been approved; and I have somewhat increased the remuneration of the officiating clergyman. I do not think it necessary to lay any Papers on the Table.

THE LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. CALLAN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in case the Irish Land Bill should be read a second time this evening, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to proceed with the Bill in Committee on Monday next, and, if not, when; and whether the Bill in question shall have precedence in the Orders of the Day of other Government business, more especially the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had, in effect, answered the Question in the statement which he had already made. It was, he thought, reasonable and proper that some time should be allowed to elapse between the second reading and the Committee; and, in the hope that the second reading would be agreed to that evening, that day week might be fixed for the later stage.

FRANCE—THE NEW COMMERCIAL TREATY—NEGOTIATIONS.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government had received an invitation from the French Government to enter into negotiations with them with regard to the Commercial Treaty?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I would ask permission to inform the House that an invitation has been received from the French Government to commence at once formal negotiations for the renewal of the Treaty of Commerce with France, and that those negotiations will take place in London. The Commissioners for France will be his Excellency the French Ambassador, M. Marie (Director at the Ministry of Commerce), and M. Bouillat, French Consul General in London. Her Majesty's Government will lose no time in appointing a Commission; and it is hoped that the first meeting will take place on Tuesday morning next. I may add that we hear from the French Government, that should a Treaty be concluded, it will not need to be presented to the existing Chamber, but would come for ratification before the new Chamber after the General Election. This will give ample time for negotiation.

WAYS AND MEANS—INLAND REVENUE —MALT DRAWBACKS.

COLONEL BARNE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Is it the case that the malt drawback was allowed to some of the London brewers on the quantity as shown by their books, and not taken by gauge; is it the case that Mr. Morse waited upon Mr. Forcey at Somerset House on the 4th October to protest against the injustice of the way dry malt was gauged, and offered on behalf of his firm to forfeit all the drawback if the quantity of malt did not measure six per cent more than they were allowed upon; is it the case that Messrs. Morse and Woods were allowed only £4,491 4s. 4d. drawback on malt they had in stock, and on which they were compelled by the Act to allow the parties to whom it was sold £4,763 5s. 8d. drawback; this £4,491 4s. 4d. was the return of three collections, Ipswich, Norwich, and Lynn—Ipswich, £1,879 15s. 3d.; Norwich, £692 4s. 6d.; Lynn, £1,919 4s. 7d.: total, £4,491 4s. 4d.; and, will he restore to Messrs. Morse and Woods the £272 1s. 4d. so received from them?

Mr. Jacob Bright

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, as regards the first portion of the Question, no drawback has been allowed upon any malt stocks that were not gauged by the Inland Revenue. With regard to the second portion of the Question, it cannot possibly be ascertained on what day the gentleman named called at Somerset House; but an answer can be given to the substance of the Question—namely, that the proposal which he appears to have made was a proposal which the Board of Inland Revenue were not able to entertain, because the legal time which was allowed for stock-taking, within which it might have been acted upon, had at that period expired. With regard to the third portion of the Question, the Board of Inland Revenue contended that upon the figures supplied to them by this firm, their stocks were properly and accurately taken, and the Board are quite ready to abide by any judgment on the subject.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Does the answer of the right hon. Gentleman apply to the Dublin brewers as well as the London brewers?

MR. GLADSTONE: The information given to me makes no exception.

In reply to Mr. NEWDEGATE,

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Parliamentary Oath Bill would not be taken on Monday, and ample Notice would be given of the time when it would be taken.

TURKEY—DEATH OF THE LATE SULTAN ABDUL AZIZ—ALLEGED COM- PLICITY OF MIDHAT PASHA.

MR. M'COAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government had received any information from Her Majesty's Embassy at Constantinople, in reference to the conditions under which Midhat Pasha had either voluntarily surrendered himself or had been given up by the French Consul to the Turkish authorities?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, we have not very definite information upon this point, and I would ask the hon. Member to accept my reply subject to possible correction. We have heard that Midhat Pasha, after having sought refuge at the French Consulate, himself left that Consulate and surrendered himself to the Turkish authorities. He probably had reason to believe that he would have been surrendered to the Turkish authorities in any case, because there can be no doubt that, looking to the circumstances, it would not have been legal for the French Consul to have given him his protection. We have reason to hope that Midhat Pasha will receive a public trial by the ordinary Courts.

FOREIGN JEWS IN RUSSIA—EXPULSION OF A NATURALIZED BRITISH SUBJECT.

MR. J. COWEN said, that, in order to elucidate the answer to a Question asked by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Baron Henry De Worms), he would inquire, Whether the Government meant to make any definite representation to the Russian Government as to the treatment of Jews who were British subjects in Russia; and, in the second place, whether the Government intended to give distinct notification in the "Gazette" that Jews being British subjects would not be protected by Her Majesty's Government in Russia?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked, Whether Her Majesty's Government had received information as to a considerable massacre and plunder of Jews which had taken place in a town, the name of which he was not able to pronounce, on the Galician Frontier, and as to a large number of Jews being forced to cross the Frontier? He also wished to ask whether a considerable massacre and plunder of Jews had taken place in the town of Odessa, and whether Her Majesty's Government had called for or intended to call upon Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at St. Petersburg, or the Consul General at Odessa, for reports on the subject?

MR. O'DONNELL asked, whether the Government, if they made any representations to the Russian Government, would in turn listen to representations that the Russian Government might make with regard to the treatment of peasants in Ireland?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, with respect to the second portion of the Question of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen), I have to say that a notice was inserted in The London Gazette, before the present Government came into Office, stating that Jews in Russia were subject to certain disabilities—that they could not hold land, for instance—and generally warning the community. That publicity was sufficient, I believe, without the insertion of a further notice. With regard to representations made to the Russian Government, I stated to-day that no final determination had been come to on this subject, and it would be obviously improper for me to go beyond that reply. We have received no information as to massacres on the Austrian frontier, there being no representatives of Her Majesty in the frontier districts. With regard to Odessa, I have seen a paragraph in a paper, but we have heard nothing on the subject from Her Majesty's Consul at that place.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Will the hon. Baronet make formal inquiries into the matter?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: It is highly probable that we shall receive information in the course of a few days.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked, whether it was the fact that the Government had lately made representations to Persia in regard to the Nestorian Christians, and whether Persia was included in the category of places in which representations were likely to be made with satisfactory results?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes, Sir; representations not only as to the Christian but also as to the Jewish population in Persia have been made within the last few weeks.

PARLIAMENT—THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.

COLONEL MAKINS asked the Prime Minister, Whether he was aware that on the Wednesday before Whit Sunday a race meeting would be held near the Metropolis, in which the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) and other Members were much interested; and whether it would be by any chance possible to combine the secular and the ecclesiastical holidays.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am afraid that there is no chance of our being able to combine the two holidays. In the present state of Public Business I should not be justified in proposing anything further than the ordinary Whitsuntide holiday—namely, from the Friday preceding Whit Sunday to the following Thursday. Perhaps it would be for the convenience of the House if the House would accede to that arrangement, that we should have a Morning Sitting on the Friday I have mentioned.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Forster, Mr. Bright, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

[EIGHTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [25th April], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, while willing to consider any just measure, founded upon sound principles, that will benefit tenants of land in Ireland, is of opinion that the leading provisions of the Land Law (Ireland) Bill are in the main economically unsound, unjust, and impolitic,"—(Lord Elcho,)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. CHAPLIN: Mr. Speaker, I do not doubt that I shall express a very general feeling when I say that the introduction of another Irish Land Bill in the year 1881, cannot fail to suggest to the minds of hon. Members reflections of the gravest, I will even say of the most painful character; and especially when we remember that it is not yet 11 years ago since the last great legislative measure dealing with this question was accepted by Parliament and by the country. To me, I must say that it seems but the other day that I heard the right hon. Gentleman, the author of this Bill, in language as eloquent as, and not dissimilar from that which he used the other night, unfold to a crowded and anxious House of Commons the details of his great scheme of Land Reform in 1870, by which, to use his own description, his very words at that time, he desired by a manful effort "to close and seal up for ever, if it might be," this great question so intimately concerning the happiness and prosperity of Ireland. Well do I remember the scene on that occasion, presenting as it did so marked and striking a resemblance, in many respects, to the scene we witnessed here again the other night before we parted, on the eve of the Recess. Then, as now, I need not say, the case of the Minister was urged with a power and an eloquence which was not surpassed even upon this occasion. Then, as now, there was the same conviction, the same sincere, I do not doubt, and deep conviction of the goodness and justice of his cause; the same bright hopes and sanguine anticipations of a happy and a favourable future; the same popular acceptance of his views beyond these walls; the same powerful support of a great majority within them. Nay, more, as if to make more striking still the marked resemblance on these two occasions, the Minister himself conducted then, as now, with a magnificent and powerful appeal to the eternal principles of justice, in a speech which fascinated friends and foes alike, and which contributed, I do not doubt, Sir, in no small degree to the ultimate passing and the final triumph of his measure. I need not dwell on the progress of that measure. Suffice it to say that it shortly took its place on the Statute Book, and I think that hon. Members on both sides will bear me out in saying that for months—nay, more, and for many years—the Liberal Party, as a whole, were never wearied of singing pœans in the praise of what they called this great heroic measure of legislation. But, alas! Sir, for the vanity of human aspirations. What is the position of that Act to-day? What have been its fruits? What are its friends and supporters saying of that measure now? There it is, unhappily, recorded in a short and simple sentence in one of the Reports of one of the Commissions, not the Commission appointed by a Tory Government, and presided over by the Tory Duke of Richmond, but the Bessborough Commission—his own Commission—appointed by the Minister himself, to consider his own act and deed. And it recommends, Sir, nothing short of its total and absolute repeal. So much for heroic legislation. After 11 years' operation of its working, I think I might say—Sic transit gloria mundi. I commend the careful study of that sentence to the consideration of the Government. I think it cannot fail to be of use to hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House, who were enthusiastic supporters of that measure at the time, and who, for aught I know, are trying hard to be again enthusiastic in support of the latest proposition of the Prime Minister for the regeneration of Ireland. I cannot help thinking that the Minister will himself acknowledge and allow that, with this knowledge and experience now before our eyes, we are bound more than ever to scrutinize most narrowly the grounds on which Parliament is invited to enter upon and sanction, for the second time, what seems to me to be the strange and revolutionary proposals contained, at all events, in one portion of this Bill. Now, let me ask the House to consider what are the grounds upon which this measure is brought forward. The right hon. Gentleman, upon the introduction of the Bill, gave us three reasons for his Bill. The first was that old and long-standing evil—namely, the land hunger, which permeated, as he said, the people of the country. The second he based on the fact that the Land Act of 1870 was defective, and had become inadequate for its purpose; and, as he called it, a third and a conclusive reason consisted in the fact that there were a limited number of bad landlords in the country, distinguished by conduct that differed from that of the greatly preponderating number. I am not here to-night to deny the justice or the truth of any one of those three reasons. But I utterly and totally deny that they are the only reasons for the introduction of this Bill; and I say that, on the other hand, the right hon. Gentleman has omitted altogether all mention of that which I conceive to be the chief and the principal reason of them all. I shall have a word to say on that point before I bring my observations to a close; but I desire, in the first place, to examine the reasons that the Prime Minister has given us himself. I quite admit that the first two reasons are deserving of our most serious attention; but I cannot say with any truth that I attach the same importance as the right hon. Gentleman to the third and final reason which he gave us—namely, that there are a limited number of bad landlords in Ireland. That, I am afraid, is no new information. We have known it all along, and for this reason—that there are always some black sheep in every flock. It is, unfortunately, true—no one here has attempted to deny it—that there are a certain number of landlords in Ireland who do not perform their duty; but I must remind the right hon. Gentleman that that is equally true of the possessors of every other kind of property in the world, and I certainly never heard before that that supplied a reason for mulcting the property of the great majority who do perform their duty. And that that is the case with the great majority of the Irish landlords we know, from the high authority of the Minister himself, for he told us that they had been tried and honourably acquitted—and really, if doctrines of this nature are in future to prevail, I cannot imagine where they are to stop, or what is to prevent the extension of this kind of argument to the partial confiscation of all kinds of property whatever. I cannot admit that the third and final reason of the right hon. Gentleman affords sufficient justification for the introduction of this Bill. But, Sir, with regard to the first two reasons he gave us, there, I must say, I think that the right hon. Gentleman does stand on stronger ground, when he tells us that the Land Act is defective, and points to the land hunger in the country as the rooted and the standing evil which demands legislation at our hands. Sir, it is, undoubtedly, too true that the Land Act, so far, has failed almost entirely to fulfil its objects. And why? Because that measure proceeded, if I may presume to say so, in the wrong direction from the outset. That Act erred not only in what it did, but even more, perhaps, in what it left undone; and it therefore failed—as it was doomed to fail, and as many people always said it would and must fail from the first. No policy of spoliation and injustice, I cannot and I will not believe, is ever really successful in the long run; and that Act was founded on injustice and nothing else, when it took the property of one class and transferred it to another class, without the smallest compensation being made. For instance, when the principle of compensation for disturbance was made a leading and vital principle of that measure—and here I would like to correct what I think is a wide-spread misapprehension on this point. I have heard it said that the Conservative Party, as a whole, accepted the principle of compensation for disturbance on the second reading of that Bill. They did nothing of the kind. Compensation for disturbance was not in the Bill at the time of the second reading; at all events, not in our view—not in our view of the Bill as it came before us on the second reading—but when it was altered in Committee, and Amendments were moved by the Government to make the principle of compensation for disturbance as clear as it is in the measure now before us, then by vote, and speech, and division, and every means in their power, it was opposed by the Conservative Party as a whole. But I have said that Act was worse even in what it left undone; and there are, I think, hon. Members on both sides of the House who will agree with me in this—that it must have been conceived in error and in total ignorance of the real interests of Ireland, when not the least attempt was made to grapple or deal with, or even to recognize, what has been so often spoken of as the “cancer” of the country, the acknowledged and undoubted source of nearly all its evils—namely, that frightful competition for the land which arises entirely out of the circumstances and peculiar conditions of the country. In 1870, the right hon. Gentleman said we take the facts and circumstances of Ireland as we find them; and there, I think, with all respect, the right hon. Gentleman was wrong. That was the cardinal blot of his Bill, when not the least attempt was made to deal with the evils arising from the competition for the land; and the consequence was that the circumstances of Ireland proved stronger than the Bill, and because he took them as he found them and left them as he found them, they have rendered the provisions of the Bill for the most part practically useless, and of no effect. It is generally admitted, I think, on both sides of the House, that in discussing the Irish Question one fact must always be kept in mind, and that is that apart from the land of Ireland there are few if any other means of subsistence for the population, and, consequently, there has always been for its possession an excessive and an unnatural demand. This, again, has led to most serious abuses, including nearly all those constant causes of trouble and complaint we are for ever hearing of in Ireland. The commonest of all is this—that the rent is constantly being arbitrarily raised. But admitting, for argument's sake, that it is so, let me ask the House what it is that enables the bad landlord to profit by his greed and exercise his power? It is the competition for the land, and that alone, which, if one man will not give the rent, always induces another to come forward and take his place. The same thing accounts for the extravagant prices we hear of as being given for tenant right. We were told by one witness before the Agricultural Commission of the case of one estate—and it was said to be by no means an uncommon one—on which the lowest price given for the tenant right was 20, where it averaged 40, and where, in one case, it had been known to reach the incredible sum of 63 years' purchase of the rent, or considerably more than the value of the fee simple of the land itself, irrespective of all considerations of tenant rights altogether. Why, what a monstrous and intolerable state of things this is. Again, I ask, what is it owing to? Certainly not to the greed and rapacity of the landlord in this case; because it could only have happened on an estate where the most unlimited right of free sale was in existence already, and where there is perfect freedom from all office rules, which it is fashionable now to call objectionable, but which I must say, for my own part, in a case of this kind, I should be disposed to speak of as of the most necessary and salutary character. It is owing to the same competition for the land, and nothing else. The same thing accounts for the overcrowding of the population in certain districts of the country, which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland spoke of, in almost the closing sentence of his speech the other night, as the greatest evil of the country. And it accounts as well for the sub-division of their farms into miserable little plots of land, many of which, were they let rent free, would not enable the tenant to obtain a decent livelihood. And when I have mentioned the minute sub-division of the farms, the overcrowding of the population in certain districts of the country, the extravagant prices given for tenant right, the arbitrary raising of the rent, and still more, perhaps, the fear that it may be arbitrarily raised, I think that I have named nearly all the most prominent of the causes of disaffection and discontent in Ireland. It is easy, therefore, to perceive why the Land Act failed so completely as it did. Instead of trying to devise some other means of livelihood for the population; instead of trying to divert their attention as far as possible from these miserable little plots of land, to which, I fully admit, with a feeling with which we must all sympathize, many of them are passionately attached, it linked them more inseparably than ever to the soil. It made the occupation of the land more to be desired and more to be coveted than ever, by giving to the tenant a share in its possession which did not belong to him before, and instead of lessening the competition it tended rather to aggravate and to increase it. It afforded, in consequence, fresh opportunities to landlords who desired to do so to raise the rents; it stimulated and encouraged still more extravagant payments for tenant right; and, instead of doing anything whatever to promote a wise and judicious consolidation of the worst and most miserable holdings, by inflicting the fine of compensation for disturbance, it made that process more expensive and more difficult, and in many cases impossible for ever. Now, that I believe to be a fair and not inaccurate description of the working and effects of the Land Act of 11 years ago. And that being so, and competition for the land being, as I say, the great evil of the country, is the Bill now before us likely to be more successful than its predecessors? Well, Sir, I will say at once that in some respects I think that perhaps it may. It differs from the Land Act of 1870 in this—that the land hunger, at all events, is recognized, and there is some evidence in the Bill of a real intention and desire to deal with it; and, so far as these parts of the Bill are concerned, we have some reason to hope that perhaps it may be. But the Bill is of so varied and so intricate a character that I must ask the House to allow me to consider it under three distinct heads, each one of which would form, in my opinion, the subject of a Bill itself. In the first place, there are the clauses by which it is intended in the future to govern the relations between the landlords and tenants in Ireland, and these I shall call for the sake of distinction—not from any wish to use the words offensively, but because I think that they most accurately describe their real effects—the confiscation clauses of the Bill. Then there are the clauses by which it is intended to convert those who are tenants into owners of the land, and these may be fittingly described as the proprietary clauses of the Bill; and, lastly, there are the clauses by which it is intended to deal with the evils arising from land hunger. Such are the clauses relating to the reclamation of land and emigration, and these, I think, may very properly be termed the remedial clauses of the Bill, because they seem to me to be by far the most important in their probable permanent effect on the condition of the country. Let me, therefore, take the remedial clauses first. And here, I think, it must be evident to all that if we are really in earnest in our desire to go to the root of the whole question, we must begin by doing something to lessen the competition for the land and to relieve the overcrowding of the population in certain districts. That, in my opinion, is the starting point of all, without which, whatever reforms you may adopt, you may be certain will be rendered practically useless and of no effect as long as you allow the state of things in the West of Ireland to continue as it does. But, Sir, if they are to be relieved, it is equally clear that some of the people must be moved, and then comes the question—how are we to move them, and where are we to move them to? It would be too inhuman and too barbarous to turn these poor unhappy people out of their present homes, wretched and miserable though they be, until you first provide for some improvement, and, I hope, some real improvement, in their hard and in their bitter lot. I will be no party to turning them adrift to find their way across the Atlantic or elsewhere for themselves. But there are, now-a-days, facilities for schemes, which, if adopted, by emigration or other means, would confer great benefits on one and all. And however distasteful it may be, and however much they may be disapproved of and disliked by those who live by agitation in that country, by the professional politician, to whom continued agitation in Ireland is as the very breath of life, and whose occupation and whose means of livelihood, in many cases, wrung from his wretched dupes, would be gone without it; there is no real, and no true friend of Ireland, who can deny that, in their proposals for emigration, the Government have taken a step, and a long step, in the right direction. However, I cannot, on the second reading of a Bill like this, enter into the details of any scheme of emigration. There may be difficulties, no doubt, but they are by no means insuperable; and to those who have been enabled to make themselves acquainted with the views and opinions of men competent to form an opinion on the subject—men, for instance, like Lord Dufferin, who has enjoyed peculiar facilities—in arriving at a judgment on the merits of Irish emigration, both in our Colonies and at home, like Mr. Tuke, and others, who have written or have spoken on it, there cannot be a question, or a doubt, that a scheme of emigration, properly organized, and conducted with due and proper safety wards made for the reception of the emigrants, and for starting them upon their new career on their arrival with their families, would confer a blessing and untold boon, not only upon those who go, but on those as well who stay behind. But I would not stop at emigration, and at that alone; I should like myself to offer to these people an alternative as well—namely, that of migration to other parts of Ireland. In fact, to give them the choice between emigration and migration wherever it was possible; and wherever land could be reclaimed with advantage for that purpose. I cannot give my adhesion to the scheme proposed by the hon. Member who sat near me the other night, that the grazing lands of Ireland should be purchased, broken up, and adapted for the purpose. To me, it seems that to require that the grazing lands should be cut up in the worst and most inconvenient manner, for the purpose of affording means of livelihood to the surplus population, would be as wise as to require that machinery and all the modern improvements of science should be banished from our manufactories to give employment to the surplus population in our towns. But with regard to reclamation of land and migration to those parts of Ireland, I may say that nothing was more strongly urged by witnesses before the Agricultural Commission, who, I believe, were thoroughly competent to give evidence and form opinions on that subject, than the advantages and the necessity of providing for the surplus population of the West, by an offer of migration as well as emigration from the country; and I hope that the Government, if Amendments should be moved in that direction, will see their way to accept them, in order to enlarge their scheme as far as migration is concerned. Now, Sir, I suppose it would not be proper if I said anything as to the establishment, or re-establishment, of manufacturing industries in Ireland. I was struck by something that fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster the other night on this point. No doubt, Ireland does possess exceptional advantages in water power which might be turned to great advantage; and I cannot think that any reforms or remedial legislation that may be adopted can be considered satisfactory or complete which does not include encouragement, and, if necessary, assistance for the re-establishment of some of those industries in Ireland which, in former days, were destroyed by the bitterly unjust and selfish policy of England. Well, now, Sir, I come to the proprietary clauses of the Bill, the darling project, I presume, of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—his beau ideal of rural happiness and prosperity, not only in Ireland, but, I believe, throughout the world. Now, I quite admit the social and political importance of adding largely, if possible, to the number of owners of land in Ireland at the present time; but I do not think that your Bill is in the least degree happily designed for the accomplishment of that object. All I can say is this—that if I had to choose between the position of an occupier or owner, a landlord or a tenant, under this Bill, I should not hesitate for an instant in taking the position of the tenant. I cannot conceive what is to induce people to become owners of land under this Bill which you have brought forward. But, at the same time, I am not indisposed to give a fair trial to the experiment of the right hon. Gentleman. Still I must remind the House that it is a great experiment, and I cannot share his sanguine expectations as to the result. I am not speaking now of the enormous liabilities and risks you are about to impose on the taxpayers of the country.

Mr. Chaplin

And remember that is a subject in itself of importance that cannot be overrated. What you are going to do is this—you are going to make the State the chief and greatest landlord in Ireland, at a time when the whole institution of landlordism is being violently denounced and assailed. But I am looking more to its future effects on the condition of the people and the fertility of the land itself; and I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman what precedence and what experience has he for his guidance? I was disappointed with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the other night. He told us, from despatches he quoted, that vast numbers of the serfs in Russia had been converted into owners of the soil, and that a large proportion had repaid the money they borrowed to re-purchase the land. But why did he not say something of their condition at the present time? Was he ignorant of their condition, or was it that he knew that a statement of their condition would tell against his proposals? I was reading a remarkable article the other day bearing on this question. It gives a description of the Russian serfs now owners of the land in Russia, well worthy the attention of the House, and what it says is this—

“From one end of the country to the other the so-called peasant proprietors”—that Radical ideal of the agrarian status—“are in a state of semi-starvation; while in several of the Volga Provinces, once the richest in agricultural produce, the starvation has assumed the form of a widespread famine which the Government is engaged in alleviating by considerable grants of money. This calamity has not overtaken the country casually and without warning. It has been approaching systematically for the last 10 years, and cannot be ascribed in any important degree to the simple visitation of God or the operation of abnormal climatic phenomena.”

Well, now, Sir, the evidence given with regard to the purchase of land in Ireland under the “Bright Clauses,” as they were called, or from the Church lands, is of a most conflicting character; but I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he looks to any other foreign countries and the systems that prevail there? If he does, all I can say is this—that the evidence that it has been the duty of the Agricultural Commission to take on this point does not warrant that conclusion, but rather the reverse. But it is not necessary to look abroad at all. We have experience much nearer home. It is an entire mistake to suppose that there is no peasant proprietary in England. In the county I represent there are hundreds—thousands of freeholders and peasant proprietors at the present time. Vast tracts of country, vast areas of land—I am not speaking solely of the Isle of Axholme; but on the East Coast of Lincolnshire, between the Humber and the Wash, you will find vast tracts of country peopled, to a great extent, if not exclusively, by them. And I have seen, and I know something of the lot of these people for myself, and I will say at once, from my experience of them, that a more exemplary and industrious, a more deserving and hard-working class does not exist in England. I wish to Heaven I could say the same of their prosperity. But, alas! with them, Sir, at the present time, prosperity and comfort are unknown; their work is harder and their fare is worse than that of any labouring man in England. But, notwithstanding this, and all their efforts, and all their admirable conduct, many of them—aye, far too many of them, for they are a class that I should wish to see increased—have been utterly undone by an unhappy combination of unfavourable seasons and the relentless foreign competition which for some years now they have been called upon to undergo. The complaint of even those who have been able to bring them to maturity is this—that their crops make nothing, and that ruin stares them in the face; and their lot is harder far than that of either labourer or tenant for another reason too, which I commend to hon. Gentlemen opposite below the Gangway, who are always ready to denounce and to declaim against the territorial system of this country; and it is this—you may rest assured that the mortgagee at all times will demand the punctual payment of his interest far more sternly than the landlord ever does, or, in unfavourable seasons, ever did demand the punctual payment of his rent. In this distressing and deplorable state of affairs, the land is steadily losing its fertility, and, pari passu with its owners, is going rapidly from bad to bad, and from worse to worse. And if this is what is happening in England, why are you to expect such a very different and so much more favourable result in Ireland? The fact is, and I often think it is the irony of fate, that it is the right hon. Gentleman himself, more than any other man in England, who has rendered a successful peasant proprietary, as I believe, in this country impossible in future. There were yeomen, and there were peasants too, who flourished at one time in considerable numbers in this country; but they have disappeared in a great degree, and much to my regret, as I regard the class of yeomen as a class we can ill afford to lose, and one that it will be still more difficult to replace. But they have disappeared and died out in a great degree, and they did so, for the most part, with the advent of Free Trade. Now, I am not going to say one word about Free Trade to-night. It may be a very good thing in its way; no doubt it has been, and a peasant proprietary may be the same. No doubt, they are both of them excellent things in their way; but you may depend upon this—that, under existing commercial conditions, the two things cannot flourish in England together. And, as I suppose the right hon. Gentleman is not at present prepared to part with Free Trade, or to occupy that suite of apartments in certain public establishments in this country, which he is always ready, I observe, to offer to those of his Friends who make that proposal, I am afraid that he must give up for the present his dream of a peasant proprietary in Ireland. That, however, is only my opinion. I do not presume to dogmatize upon it, nor to offer more or less, perhaps, crude opinions of my own, to the views of the right hon. Gentleman, who, I understand, has made a life-long study of this question; but I have ventured, and, indeed, I have thought it my duty to place this view of the case, which I have seen something of myself, before the House of Commons, because it does seem to me to be one that is deserving of our most careful and serious consideration before we finally adopt proposals of enormous importance like those which have been put forward by the right hon. Gentleman. At the same time, although I cannot share his sanguine views, and while I must decline all responsibility for them, I should not feel either justified or right in refusing, at all events, a fair trial of his scheme. Sir, the House, then, will perceive that while I am prepared to give a qualified assent to what I have called the proprietary clauses of the Bill, I go heartily and completely with the Government, perhaps I go further than the Government, in what I take to be the remedial portion of the measure, and specially intended to deal with that which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister himself has described as the old and rooted evil of land hunger in the country. But when I come to what I have described as the confiscation clauses of the Bill, there, I am afraid, I must adopt a very different attitude indeed. I am quite aware that hon. Members on that side of the House are sometimes apt to be indifferent to charges of confiscation, especially when made by hon. Members on this side. But that is not the case with the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. He takes quite a different line. He stoutly denied the other night that there was any confiscation under the Act of 1870, and he has challenged us to prove that there is confiscation in the Bill of 1881. And, further, he supported his statement as to the Act of 1870 by alleging that, according to statistics, rents have risen, and with the rise of rents the value of property which has been sold in Ireland has been increased since the passing of the Act of 1870. Now, even supposing that allegation is correct, it does not necessarily prove that he is right. It is the natural tendency of everything in these days, as years roll by, to increase in value, because gold has been daily becoming more plentiful; and what we have to consider is, not whether land in Ireland has increased at all in value within the last decade, but whether the increase would not have been considerably greater if it had not been for the passing of the Land Act 11 years ago. That is supposing this allegation is correct. But is the right hon. Gentleman correct? The right hon. Gentleman gave us no statistics the other night; but he did give us some last Session, I remember, in regard to this question. They stopped, however, with the year 1878. Why did they stop there? Why has he not given us statistics down to the year 1881? They would have thrown considerable light on his assertions. I have not myself been able to obtain statistics for 1881; I have not had time to do so. I had no idea, for a moment, that such an argument would be advanced; but it so happens that I have some statistics that were sent to me from Ireland last Session in regard to the year 1880, and I will read three cases which bear directly on the value of land. They are taken from sales in the Land Court, before Judge Flanagan, and the date is June 25, 1880—not quite a year ago—

“Lot 4, 387 acres of the lands of Molloy, producing a yearly rent of £156 9s.; Mr. T. McCreedy, solicitor, offered £2,000. There was no other bid; and after waiting for some time, Judge Flanagan said—‘It is a perfect farce to be putting property up for sale now. For all I know, Mr. McCreedy, you may get it for half £2,000 next year. No mortal man can tell. Your bidding, however, is not quite 12 years’ purchase.’”

Now, Sir, I do not know what the statistics of 1881 may say; but if they at all bear out the records of sales in the Land Court in the year before, I think the House will agree with me that the right hon. Gentleman has certainly not disproved the charge of confiscation against the Act of 1870 by the singularly unfortunate illustration he has selected upon this occasion. The right hon. Gentleman challenged us to give him proof of confiscation in the Bill which is now before us. Perhaps I may be allowed to offer to the House a short and simple definition of what I mean by “confiscation;” and if the House accepts my definition, and if I am able to show, as I think I shall be able to show, that it is strictly applicable to this part of the Bill, I may at least hope that some hon. or right hon. Gentleman opposite will do me the favour to attempt, at all events, to meet the arguments I shall use, and, failing that, to acknowledge the truth and justice of my position. Now, what does “confiscation” mean? I understand confiscation to mean this—we are guilty of confiscation if we take away property or valuable rights, which at present they enjoy, from those who are entitled to them, without making compensation to them for the property or the rights of which they are deprived. Will any hon. Member on the other side of the House deny that proposition? If not, then I wish to ask the House this question. Does or does not the Bill perform that operation? I think I can undertake to show in the course of about three minutes that it does. Take the case of present tenancies alone, where tenant right did not exist before. What happens under this Bill? The day this Bill passes, every tenant will be able to take his landlord into Court, and, whether his rent be a high rent or a low rent, to call upon the Court to fix it in future. If the tenant once goes into Court, the Court is bound to fix the rent, and it becomes in future, in the language of the Bill, a “judicial rent.” Thereupon, a judicial rent being established in that way, the farm from that time forth is held subject to what are called the “statutory conditions” of the Bill. These “statutory conditions” really include fixity of tenure for 15 years for certain, and a renewal of fixity of tenure for successive periods of 15 years as long as the tenant may desire. It may be described without exaggeration as being really an actual fixity of tenure if the tenant so desires. But “fixity of tenure,” in the words of the Prime Minister in 1870, is virtually the “expropriation of the landlord!” It undoubtedly deprives him at once of all real control and management over his estate in future, and it deprives him of all what may be called the advantages and pleasures of ownership. It deprives him, in a word, of nearly every right you can mention that attaches to the possession of an estate in Ireland, excepting the receipt of whatever rent-charge the Court may think fit to allow him. Now, nobody can deny that these rights do possess a certain value, whether they be little or whether they be great, and you are going to take them from the landlord without giving him the smallest compensation whatever. I say, then, that if my definition of confiscation be correct, the fixity of tenure, as embodied in your Bill, even for a period of 15 years, is neither more nor less than sheer and simple confiscation. And that is not all. Every tenant in future will have the right to sell his interest in his holding for the best price he can obtain, subject, I admit, to this limitation, which the Prime Minister pointed out the other night—that the landlord may claim his right of pre-emption; and in that case he may call on the Court to fix the price of sale. But though the Court may be called on, in this way, to settle the price which the landlord is to give to the tenant for the tenant's interest in his own estate—a somewhat novel and remarkable state of things in itself—I do not understand that the Court may fix the price at zero; the Court, I understand, is bound to allow the tenant something for his interest, otherwise the right of sale, so ostentatiously paraded in the first line of your Bill, would be nothing but a farce. And if that be so, what is the landlord's position, if the tenant should elect to sell? If, for instance, the tenant wishes, for some cause, to give up farming and take to something else, the tenant will at once be able, however liberal may have been the terms in point of rent or otherwise on which he has held the farm up to the time of sale, to realize a sum of money for an interest for which he gave absolutely nothing upon entry, and every penny of which is just so much taken directly out of the pocket of the landlord, and deducted from the rent which he would otherwise receive from the tenant who succeeds him. It makes no difference whatever to the tenant who comes in. In either case he will have to pay the same, either in increased rent, or in the shape of interest on the sum of money he pays for the goodwill; but the tenant who goes out, although he may have held the farm at the lowest of low rents, and on the most liberal terms for years, is to receive from the tenant who comes in a sum of money which, on every principle of right and of justice ever known, is the property of the landlord, and of no other person in the world. You give him no compensation for this, and if my definition of confiscation is correct—and it is, I believe, generally accepted by the House—this, again, is nothing less than mere and sheer and simple confiscation. Let me test it on another and most simple ground. You are going to confer on the tenant a great boon—"a pecuniary advantage" you tell us. Where is it to come from? Does it come from the estate? Out of whose pocket does it come? It comes out of the pocket of the landlord and of nobody else. How do you get over that point? I hope, when the right hon. Gentleman or some other Member of the Front Bench comes to speak, he will be able to explain more clearly than has been done that this Bill does not embrace the principle of confiscation. Now, Sir, having shown, to the best of my ability, that they both mean confiscation, let me say a word as to the policy of fixity of tenure and free sale, as embodied in this Bill. "Free sale" may be summed up in a sentence. Free sale, however you may try to limit it—for whatever rules the Court may make will be evaded, just as office rules are evaded at the present time—free sale, I say, is only another word for rack-rents everywhere in Ireland in future, and fixity of tenure is even worse; for fixity of tenure, in plain English, means taking the property of one man and giving it to another, and my authority for saying so is a Member of the present Cabinet—the highest legal authority in England, Lord Selborne, the present Lord Chancellor, who said it as Sir Roundell Palmer in this House, at a time when he and his Colleague, the right hon. Gentleman, were fighting tooth and nail against this very principle, its advocate to-day. Truly, what a marvellous specimen of policy and statesmanship this fixity of tenure is. What does everybody who knows anything about Ireland tell you is her first requirement at the present time? Why, capital, and the investment of capital in that country. And what sort of inducement do you think it is that you are offering to capital, and to those who are its owners, at the present time? Why, your own Lord Chancellor has told us that your great and grand specific for the troubles you are placed in at the present moment, and which you have so thoroughly brought upon yourselves, is, in plain English, taking the property of one man and giving it to another! Was there ever, out of Bedlam, such as policy as this put forward by a Minister for the regeneration of Ireland before? I pass on to consider what I understand to be the principle of this part of the Bill. The House will have observed that, although this Bill embodies what are known as the "three F's," yet that fixity of tenure is contingent on judicial rent, and the right of sale is, to a certain extent, controlled by the power of the Court to fix and regulate the rent. I take it, therefore—and it has been admitted by more than one Member of the Government—I take it, therefore, that Judicial rent is the centre and pivot on which the remaining portion of this Bill must turn. In other words, the main principle of this part of the Bill is the valuation of rents by the State. That being so, I confess I listened with the utmost curiosity to the explanation of the Prime Minister on the introduction of this Bill, because it so happens that, in common with a good many other hon. Members of this House, it was my good fortune some years ago to hear him discourse at great length on this very question; and I must do the right hon. Gentleman the justice to say that a more complete, a more able, or a more elaborate destruction of the very principle he advocates to-day I never heard from any other Minister or statesman on any other subject in the world. It is far too long to quote; but it is very instructive and most interesting to read. ["Read, read!"] I have not got it here, and therefore I cannot read it; but hon. Members who are desirous of doing so, will find in Vol. 199 of Hansard, beginning about the bottom of page 1843, some five and a-half columns of what appeared to me to be absolutely unanswerable and conclusive arguments against the very proposition which forms to-day the main and the essential principle of this part of the Bill. I confess that I was not very much surprised, because since I have taken any part in public life I have noticed this—and I do not in the least wish to speak with any offence or disrespect towards the right hon. Gentleman—but I have noticed this, that when he professes a policy most loudly it is always 2 to 6—and that is far from being liberal odds—that, sooner or later, exactly the opposite is almost quite certain to occur. At all events, that is what has happened upon this occasion. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Not at all; not at all.] Well, let the right hon. Gentleman disprove it if he can; he will have every opportunity. But how does the right hon. Gentleman account for it on this occasion? I listened with great attention to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman on the introduction of the Bill; but the sole excuse and explanation I could gather from his speech was this—that in the present circumstances of Ireland, and with the authorities before us, this change had become quite inevitable. And what were his authorities? He did not condescend to tell why it was inevitable; but he told us what authorities he looked to. They were the rival and various Reports of the two Royal Commissions. I have not a word to say to the Report of the Bessborough Commission, or to the Minority Report of the Duke of Richmond's Commission; but I have a good deal to say as to the Majority Report of that Commission. The right hon. Gentleman has placed a very remarkable construction upon that Report. But, in the first place, I would refer exactly to what he said the other night. He taxed me with being in some way connected with this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman dwelt at great length, not only on Monday night, but on the first introduction of the Bill, on the Report of the Duke of Richmond's Commission, and he quoted a single paragraph from that Report at least twice or three times. I can assure him we are exceedingly complimented by the attention he has paid us; and here, again, I think that I perceive another of those complete conversions of opinion of which I spoke just now, as amiable, I must say, in this case as it is complete, and which are so eminently characteristic of the right hon. Gentleman. Last year the House will recollect the Richmond Commission was the grossest delusion that ever was practised on the mind of man. This year it is a high and responsible authority, to which the right hon. Gentleman looks for guidance and direction, and the humblest of its Members—the Member for Mid Lincolnshire—is, indeed, exalted to the high honour, for he is suddenly informed that he shares with the Prime Minister the paternity of this Bill. I cannot express to the right hon. Gentleman my unbounded gratification at this complete change of sentiment on his part. I tender to him my grateful acknowledgments and thanks; but both natural modesty of disposition and my strict adherence to truth compel me alike, I am afraid, to decline this signal mark of favour which he presses on me, and I hope he will not think me churlishly ungrateful if my desire to preserve whatever reputation and character I may still enjoy, either of a public or a private nature, impels me to renounce all connection whatever with what I suspect to be the disreputable offspring of an illicit amour of his own with the

Land League, and which the right hon. Gentleman, with an audacity—a happy audacity I have rarely seen equalled—is now trying to father upon me. I really must protest altogether against this attempt on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to father that illicit child on me. But now, Sir, in all seriousness, let me consider for a moment the construction which the right hon. Gentleman has placed on the Report of the Duke of Richmond's Commission. What is that construction? I understand it to be this—that what we have recommended is the establishment of a Court, or of some other public authority, to regulate rents everywhere in Ireland in future. Now, I venture respectfully to say that we have recommended nothing of the kind. All that we have said, and I adhere to every word that we have said, is this, that—

“Bearing in mind”—I am afraid I shall have to read it again—“bearing in mind the system by which the improvements and equipments of a farm are very generally the work of the tenant, and the fact that a yearly tenant is at any time liable to have his rent raised in consequence of the increased value that has been given to his holding by the expenditure of his own capital and labour, the desire for legislative interference to protect him from an arbitrary increase of rent does not seem unnatural.”

Arbitrary increase of rent on what? Why, on the expenditure of his own capital and labour. I think I should be content to submit to the verdict of any legal authority on either side of the House, and I think they would pronounce unanimously in favour of my interpretation of that paragraph of that Report. I do not know what might happen on that side; but I would certainly undertake to submit to the verdict of any legal authority on this side. And now let me ask the House, how does the right hon. Gentleman arrive at this extraordinary construction? First, he quotes one single paragraph in the Report, in which no mention of a Court is even made, and then he went on to tell the House that, in his view of the case, legislative interference with rent could not be disassociated from legislative interference with the right of sale and tenure. In other words, what he says is this—“If you take one of the ‘three F’s’—namely, fair rent—you must take them all”—and having laid down that proposition, he then goes on to say that the language used by the Commission, and the necessary construction of the single paragraph he did read, must mean that and nothing else, when the very following paragraph of the Report, for some reason best known to himself, he thought fit not to read, says, as I understand it, exactly the reverse. Remember the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman is—“If you take one of the ‘three F’s’ you must take them all.” And the following paragraph of the Report of the Agricultural Commission says—

“With a view of affording such security, ‘fair rents,’ ‘fixity of tenure,’ and ‘free sale,’ popularly known as the ‘three F’s,’ have been strongly advocated by many witnesses; but none have been able to support these propositions in their integrity without admitting consequences that would, in our opinion, involve an injustice to the landlord.”

Well, now, that is the language of the Report, and how the right hon. Gentleman, in the face of that second paragraph, could have placed the construction which he did upon the Report of the Duke of Richmond's Commission passes, I must say, altogether my humble, although it may be somewhat limited, comprehension. I frankly own, for my part, that I disapprove of the proposal altogether; because it always seemed to me that the valuation of rents by the State in Ireland, either with justice or with satisfaction to the interested parties, is neither practicable nor possible by any Court whatever in the world; and for the very reasons which were literally driven home by the right hon. Gentleman himself at the time he utterly demolished that proposal when it was formerly brought forward in this House. And I cannot understand how a Minister in this House can either ask or expect the House of Commons to accept proposals, until otherwise explained, of which he has publicly declared in this House he could conceive nothing more calculated to carry wide-spread demoralization throughout the mass of the people of Ireland. I admit that it is desirable that this question should be settled; and if, on some other occasion, the right hon. Gentleman would do what I think he might do, and what I think he ought to do, to remove the difficulties which many of us feel—namely, take his own speech in 1870 and answer seriatim, if he can, the arguments he used on that occasion, then I can only say, as far as I am individually concerned, I shall be disposed to make large sacrifices of my opinion in order to arrive at a happy solution of this question. But, unless that should be done, and until it has been done, I shall feel it my duty to oppose, from first to last, the adoption of these principles into our legislation, and for the very reasons that have never yet been answered, and which were supplied by the Prime Minister himself. I object, then, altogether, both in point of policy and in principle, to this part of the Bill; and I view, I confess, with the utmost apprehension what seems to me to be its probable permanent effects. I agree with what the Prime Minister said in 1870—that it is calculated to demoralize the people. It cannot fail, I think, to lead to the establishment of rack-rents everywhere in Ireland. It will destroy all confidence, and all sense of security. Nay, I think it has gone far already to destroy them in regard to all kinds of property in Ireland, and, with them, will most inevitably banish capital and the investment of capital in that country. And although I admit that it does confer enormous boons on one class of the country—namely, the present occupiers of land, it confers those boons upon them alone; and even that is done at the expense, and at the sole expense, of one other class of the community—namely, those who are the owners of the land in Ireland. And what kind of treatment is it that you ask us to inflict upon them; first, you are going to take away from them all interest in the future management of their estates. You deprive them of the rights, and you release them from all the duties which attach to property in Ireland, and you convert them in future to the position of mere rent-chargers on their own estate. And that is not all, for in all human probability you are going to inflict upon them a large pecuniary loss as well. Under this Bill, you may lower their rents, mulct them of a portion of their income, and fine them of part of their possessions, bought very likely, for anything that you know, on the faith of your public professions and inducements, and on the guarantee of a title which very likely Parliament has given them itself. A case was submitted to me the other day, which I may mention. A friend of mine, about a year ago, bought an estate for £30,000 in Ireland. He bought it in the Land Court. The rent was certified by the Judge, and endorsed upon the title as certified by the Judge. If you pass this Bill, and he is taken into Court, you may reduce his rent by £200 or £300 a-year. [Mr. JOHN BRIGHT: 'The rent was not guaranteed.'] But the title was guaranteed, and what is the use of the title without rent? Does the right hon. Gentleman suppose that people invest £30,000 in estates in Ireland to look at them? They invest as a means of interest, to receive something back as interest. And in this case it is possible that the rent may be reduced £200 or £300 a-year; and are you going to give the man to whom you have sold the estate yourselves compensation, or, failing that, are you not bound to re-purchase his estate on equitable terms? It is the gravest possible question in my mind whether you are justified in doing this under any circumstances at all. It may, I know, be argued, I know it has been argued, that the State has the right to reduce him to that position if it thinks fit. But then the State is bound not so to think fit until it has shown conclusively that it is for the public interest and welfare; and I do not think that you have done so. I admit that may be a matter of opinion; but this is not a matter of opinion, that whether you have shown that it is expedient or not, you are bound—there can be no question upon this point—to give him compensation. And I ask where, in what clause, what line or sentence of this Bill is there the smallest compensation mentioned? You give none, and I say then there is only one description for measures of this nature—you tell us of judicial leases and judicial rents. I say, in the presence of the Government and of the authors of this Bill, that this part of your Bill is nothing else than one great scheme of judicial plunder, more worthy, I had almost said, of a Cabinet of—but I will not use the expression that I had upon my tongue—of anything rather than of Ministers of State. And all this harsh and cruel treatment of the landlord is to be inflicted on him—why? Because you tell us that the circumstances of Ireland absolutely call for legislation at your hands. Granted that it be so. I acknowledge that the present circumstances of Ireland must be dealt with sooner or later. I do not stop to in-
